INTRODUCTION.

THE papers contained in this volume relate almost exclusively to the campaigns of 1799 between the forces of the European Powers forming the Third or, as it is sometimes called, the Second Coalition, and those of Republican France. They are a frank revelation of the policy of the British Cabinet, its hopes, fears, projects, efforts and failures, in connexion with the important events crowded into seven months, from the end of March to the end of October, of that year. But as the volume closes while the war was still in progress, and its issue still doubtful, it has seemed better to restrict the Preface to a brief indication of its contents. Another volume bringing the course of affairs down to the peace of Luneville, the Legislative Union of Great Britain and Ireland, and the fall of Pitt's first ministry, will afford a fitting opportunity of reviewing in their entirety the momentous changes that marked the two last years of the 18th century, and of Lord Grenville's official connexion with Mr. Pitt.

As has been already told in the Introduction to Volume IV., Lord Grenville, early in the year of 1799, sent his brother Thomas as Envoy Extraordinary to Berlin to act as "his other self" in forming an offensive league between Great Britain and the leading monarchies of the Continent, to crush the subverting power of revolution which had its seat at Paris, and restore the systems and landmarks its victories had swept away. Negotiations with these objects in view had already begun. The British Government had made repeated overtures to the Tzar; Austria sought aid against French aggression at St. Petersburg and London. Paul I., Tzar of Russia, had no material interests to serve by waging war against France. But coveting the glory of being everywhere acclaimed as the champion of conservative principles and the saviour of Europe, he yielded to appeals from the Emperor Francis II. and George III.; and spared no effort not only to bring the King of Prussia into the Coalition, but to strengthen it by reconciling the estranged Governments of Austria and Great Britain. Frederick William III., however, clung tenaciously to the neutral policy adopted by his father in 1795. And Lord Grenville, with Pitt's support, refused to subsidize or enter into concert with Austria, until a financial convention signed in London in 1797 had been ratified at Vienna. The matter in dispute was apparently of little real importance. Austria acknowledged her debt; Great Britain did not ask for immediate repayment. But angry reproaches, wounded pride, mutual resentment and suspicion aroused by diplomatic methods, had magnified what seems to have been little more than a formality into a point of national honour on which neither party would give way. The consequence was that, at the breaking out of war, France found herself confronted by a coalition so loosely constructed as to afford little promise of long life. It was a triple league, of which the Tzar was centre, and connecting link: his allies, the Governments of Austria and Great Britain, forming plans in concert with him but without communication with each other; each intent on pursuing a line of action against the common enemy according most with its particular views and interests.

Lord Grenville, partly in deference to his brother's complaints from Berlin, sent Lord Minto to replace Sir Morton Eden at Vienna, with some expectation of being able to influence Austrian counsels through a stronger minister. But he seems to have much under-rated the danger to the Coalition likely to result from his own antagonism to the Imperial Chancellor Baron Thugut, on whose position and character foreign letters included in the correspondence throw considerable light. Thugut having acquired complete ascendancy over the mind of the Emperor Francis II., exercised absolute control over the armies, as well as the policy of the Austrian Monarchy. Even Archduke Charles the Emperor's brother, and already reputed the ablest Austrian commander since Prince Eugene, seems to have been during this campaign, however unwillingly, a mere puppet in his hands. And he pursued his plans with a silent and stubborn tenacity which all remonstrance of an unfriendly or interested character only served to harden.

From the very beginning of the war, and even before Russian succours reached the scene of hostilities, the Austrian generals and armies showed decisive superiority over those of France. Archduke Charles defeated General Jourdan at Stockach and drove his army in headlong confusion across the Rhine. Then passing into Switzerland he dislodged Massena from fortified positions which seemed to defy attack. In Italy the Austrian General Kray opened the campaign by a brilliant victory over General Scherer at Magnano. Immediately afterwards Marshal Souvarow entered the field with a body of Russians and assumed supreme command of the allied troops. Marching from triumph to triumph he routed in succession the three French armies of Moreau, McDonald and Joubert, captured the fortresses of Alessandria and Turin, and expelled the French from the entire peninsula with the exception of the city of Genoa and a few positions on the Maritime Alps. These splendid successes changed the face of the political situation, and stimulated the hopes and efforts of all the enemies of France. Even the King of Prussia allowed Count Haugwitz to resume the discussion of a project, proposed earlier in the year by Mr. Granville, of joint intervention in Holland for the restoration of the House of Orange. But the British Government distrusting the king's timidity—and justly, for soon after he suffered the French Directory to entangle him in an elusive negotiation—now framed bolder plans, embracing the same object, but based mainly on the co-operation of the Emperor Paul. These, as unfolded and discussed in Lord Grenville's correspondence with his brother, resolved themselves into three distinct series of military operations: (I.) A joint expedition of British troops and Russians in British pay, to recover Holland and Belgium from France, and restore the Prince of Orange as ruler of the whole Netherlands, or of the Dutch Republic only, as riper knowledge and experience might determine, but on terms exceedingly advantageous to Great Britain. (II.) The assembling in Switzerland of a larger army composed of Russians, Swiss, Wirtembergers, and Condé's corps of émigrés, also in the pay of Great Britain, but under the command of Marshal Souvarow, who had nearly finished his work in Italy. It was proposed that this force, operating in concert with the Austrians under Archduke Charles, should expel Massena from Swiss territory, penetrate into France, and take up winter quarters at Lyons, to serve as a rallying point and support for royalist disaffection, in the eastern and southern Departments. (III.) Later in the year when the Netherlands had been conquered, the landing of a strong body of British and Russian troops in Brittany, to capture and destroy Brest, and aid a Chouan revolt which Georges Cadondal was organizing with funds supplied from the British Treasury.

The first of these enterprises, requiring the co-operation of the Russian Emperor only, moved smoothly forward through all its preparatory stages. Paul granted a contingent of 18,000 troops, and procured from the King of Sweden an offer of 6,000 more, which the British Government declined. The Hereditary Prince of Orange, who had been living at Berlin in constant communication with the adherents of his House in the Dutch Republic, repaired to Lingon. With full powers from his father at Hampton Court, and money furnished by Mr. Grenville, he despatched trustworthy agents to all parts of the Netherlands to rally and organize the Orange party, collect information, and arrange for simultaneous risings when the time for action should have come. Their reports left no doubt of a general desire among people of every shade of opinion to rid themselves of the oppressive yoke of France; of disaffection in the Dutch army and navy; of the reduction of the French garrison to a mere handful of troops; of the hopeful activity of the Orange party, and the discord and deep discouragement of the party in power. To muster the troops, and provide means of transport for them would require many weeks. But neither Lord Grenville nor his brother seems to have entertained a doubt that, should existing conditions hold good for that period, the occupation of the entire Netherlands by a powerful Anglo-Russian force, boldly led, would be rather a triumphal march than an arduous military operation.

The Tzar also readily adopted the British plan of campaign in Switerland, pressed its acceptance at Vienna, and sent a body of Russian troops numbering, at least on paper, 45,000, to Zurich, under the command of General Korsakow. In this plan Austrian co-operation was an essential ingredient. Baron Thugut at first raised no difficulty. Souvarow's victories in Italy had excited to a very high pitch the jealous anger of the Austrian generals under his command. The Marshal, finding his orders disobeyed, his plans thwarted, and his Russian troops, which had borne the brunt of the fighting, reduced to a mere remnant, complained to his sovereign of the slights put on him, and asked to be recalled. His letter and a disposition already shown by the Austrian Government to aggrandize itself in Italy at the expense of the Pope and the King of Sardinia, whom the Russian autocrat had taken under his protection, incensed Paul. Sharp remonstrances from the Russian Chancellor Rostopchin to Count Cobentzl greatly perturbed the Court of Vienna. And in his anxiety, as it would appear, to remove Souvarow from Italy, without any rupture of friendly relations with an imperious ally, Thugut acquiesced in the British plan of campaign. Assured, as he thought, on this point, Lord Grenville sent back Mr. Wickham as British Minister in Switzerland to re-open communications with the Royalists of eastern France, and hasten the enrolment, already begun, of 20,000 Swiss. Later on, he despatched Lord Mulgrave as military commissioner to the Russian head-quarters at Zurich, to bring Suvarow or Korsakow, as the case might be, into concert with the Archduke, and to take command of the Swiss levies; and he held Count d'Artois in readiness to join Souvarow at the opportune moment. Hardly, however, had the Russian Field-marshal been ordered to march into Switzerland, when Baron Thugut began to show his hand. Having been refused a subsidy, and even concert, by the British Cabinet, he seems to have resolved to reserve Austrian armies as much as possible for the accomplishing of Austrian aims, and, where these were not involved, to allow armies subsidized by Great Britain to bear the brunt of the war with France. With this view he had checked the Archduke's advance in Switzerland, and kept him inactive for two months. On several important points Austrian policy clashed with that of Great Britain. The Court of Vienna had lost all sympathy for the Royalist cause in France. It disliked the French princes, and would not risk a man or a florin to make the Count of Provence Louis XVIII. Neither was it willing to abandon Belgium, which had been for so long a period a possession of the Emperor, and where he still had powerful partizans, to be disposed of as the British Cabinet might determine. Under the pretext that Souvarow's army alone would be strong enough to expel the French from Switzerland, Baron Thugut suddenly announced the intention of withdrawing the Archduke's army to protect Germany against a French attack, recover the fortress of Mayence, and, as Lord Grenville surmised, open the way for an Austrian occupation of the Netherlands. It was in this manner, he declared, that the Emperor could give most effectual support to the movements of his allies. Even if all the other conditions of the British plan had been fully satisfied, this decision must have proved fatal to it, Massena's army having been largely reinforced. But the Swiss recruiting had failed. Owing in a great measure, as Wickham reported, to the faults of British officers employed as commissaries, 2,000 men only out of 20,000 had been enrolled. The Wirtembergers had not arrived. The effective strength of Korsakow's Russian army did not exceed 40,000 men. Lord Mulgrave on reaching Zurich found that military rivalries had already spread from Italy to Switzerland, Austrian and Russian generals being on terms that almost forbade any hope of cordial co-operation. While he laboured to improve their relations, the Archduke, in obedience to orders from the Austrian War Office, moved off to Mayence, leaving General Hotze with an Austrian division in the Grisons, as a link of connexion between Souvarow and Korsakow. Massena, seizing his opportunity, fell with superior force on the armies of Korsakow and Hotze, routed them completely, and sent them flying in wild confusion into Germany. The Archduke hastened back to repair these disasters only to find them irreparable. Souvarow crossed the St. Gothard by forced marches only to find the Austrian positions and magazines, on which he counted for support, in the hands of the French. He extricated himself from the trap into which he had fallen unawares, by a wonderful retreat over frightful passes, amidst almost incredible hardships and privations, to Coire; and skirting Lake Constance, joined the wreck of Korsakow's army. A letter from Mr. Wickham, dated September 30, describes the earlier incidents of the battle of Zurich, of which he was an eye-witness. Other letters from him of later date, most of which, having been published by his literary executors, are not included in this volume, give accounts of Marshal Souvarow. The eccentricities and occasional roughness of the famous old warrior seem to have shocked Mr. Wickham's sense of propriety, and clouded his judgment.

While reverses thus tarnished the arms of the Coalition in Switzerland the Anglo-Russian expedition made little way in Holland. Sir Ralph Abercromby, with the leading British divisions, after tossing about for a fortnight on the North Sea, beaten off by contrary winds from more eligible points of the Dutch coast, had effected a landing at the Helder towards the end of August. A fleet of Dutch warships in the Texel, on being summoned by Admirall Mitchell, hoisted the Orange flag and surrendered. Dutch soldiers deserted in bands growing larger every day after the arrival of the Hereditary Prince at the Helder. General Brune, the Republican Commander-in-Chief, had as yet under his orders only a small body of French soldiers, the only troops on whom he could count with any confidence. But contrary to the intention of the English ministry Abercromby, although reinforced by 10,000 Russians, remained strictly on the defensive for another fortnight, until the arrival of the Duke of York with other divisions brought up the strength of the invading army to a total of 48,000 men. It had been decided in England that four or five thousand of these should be detached from the main body to aid insurrections in Groningen and Friesland. But this design was not carried out. Nor were six thousand Dutch deserters, who joined the Hereditary Prince, turned to any use, no vessels being available to transport them across the Zuyder Zee. After the Duke of York's arrival there was another considerable pause for preparation, during which Brune's army continued to grow in strength and in power of vigorous resistance. Then followed nearly three weeks of alternate advance and retreat along a narrow neck of land, resulting in a convention which allowed the Duke to return with the allied troops to England, on conditions which gave it, in Lord Grenville's view at least, too much the character of a capitulation.

Thomas Grenville had left Berlin in the beginning of September to aid the Hereditary Prince of Orange in organizing revolt in the provinces of Groningen and Friesland; and thence proceed to Holland as British Ambassador Extraordinary to take charge of the political objects of the Anglo-Russian expedition. The sudden departure of the Hereditary Prince from Lingen to the Helder partly upset his plans. Want of certain intelligence from England or Holland, owing partly to adverse gales, kept him for many weeks in painful suspense at Hamburg. And contrary winds delayed his passage for some weeks more from Emden to Holland. His letters during this trying period betray the feelings of astonishment and dismay which the dilatory tactics of the British generals seem to have excited in all well-wishers of the expedition. The staunchest friends of the House of Orange in the two provinces most faithful to it, Friesland and Groningen, refused to run any risk so long as the armed aid they had been taught to look for was withheld. Other letters contain passing references to General Brune's activity and decision in turning to account every available means of defence. His resolute energy saved a situation which, in the beginning, had seemed to men of all parties desperate. Mr. Grenville only reached the Helder to learn that the Anglo-Russian army was about to evacuate Holland, and he returned at once to England. In a letter to Mr. Dundas dated October 28, Lord Grenville protested against the ratification of an article of the convention signed in Holland by which the Duke of York conceded the release of some thousands of French prisoners whom he had not taken, as exceeding the powers of a general-in-chief. Dundas, however, as Minister for War, assumed the responsibility for giving more palatable advice to the King.

When active hostilities ceased at the end of October, 1799, France had lost Italy, but remained mistress of all the Netherlands, and of Switzerland. Internal discord had already brought the Coalition to the verge of disruption. On the other hand, it was very doubtful whether the French Directory, incapable, divided against itself, bankrupt, and representing only a small minority of the French nation, could continue to wage a most unpopular war. The determining fact of the situation, Bonaparte's return to France, was still unknown in England; and for a long time after it became known there, was very imperfectly appreciated.

The Appendix to this volume contains two confidential reports from Mr. Liston, British Minister at Stockholm, of considerable historical interest. They relate to the assassination of Gustavus III., King of Sweden, and the regency of his brother the Duke of Sudermania; and came to light after the publication of the volume to which they belong chronologically.

The present volume, like its predecessors, has been prepared, and the introduction written, by Mr. Walter Fitzpatrick. The Index has been compiled by Mr. A. E. Bland, B.A., of the Public Record Office.

VOL. V.

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, April 5. Cleveland Row.—“I am vexed to see how long you have remained without hearing from us. You will, however, since have had your table and boxes full of my letters, and I will not add to them to-day except only to say how happy I feel that our ideas have so much agreed, notwithstanding the interruption of plan and time.

“I have perhaps gone one step further than you would have done in the communication made to Vienna of the march of the Russians, but I could not in conscience delay the step; and when taken, I knew Thugut would learn it through Woronzow and Panin, so I thought we might as well take the merit of the communication.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, April 8. Berlin.—“I had originally intended to have deferred the expedition of this messenger a day or two longer, but the important account of the progressive success of the Austrians, and the very judicious proclamation of the Archduke upon his entering the Swiss territory, together with the authentic account, which I am told is taken from the Vienna Gazette, of the defeat of the French at Legnano, have determined me to send to you without delay, and to persuade myself that you will easily spare my political reasonings when I sacrifice them to the more speedy communication of such substantial intelligence. You will easily see in all my latter despatches how partial I still continue to be to the plan of the Russian subsidiary army being employed on the Bas-Rhin; and I must honestly confess that I still continue to be so, even after reading, in your despatch of the 15th ultimo to Petersburg, what were the sort of precautions to be recommended, in the case of the Russians acting in Switzerland, to preserve the necessary co-operation, secure the independence of that force, and guard against the chance of its telling in lieu of other force for the benefit of Austria. I own I think that, for objects of military co-operation, such precautions are more likely to create jealousy and embarrassment than to secure the reasonable objects which you wish to obtain by them. In truth I have so much apprehension of this limited co-operation, and of the bad effects it would produce that, though I am, as little as anybody can be, inclined to suffer Austria to profit by her treachery to us, yet if we are to pursue the great object of the war in joint military operations of any description, I should recommend the expediency, nay the absolute necessity, of pursuing that co-operation in the most frank and cordial manner, because no other can be adopted with success; and if their past behaviour makes that cordial and liberal concert impracticable, it is a reason for having nothing to do with them; but I should think limitations and restrictions could never cure that difficulty or do other than defeat the wishes and the efforts of both parties.

"I see by the despatches which were brought to me from you by the last two messengers that you had almost considered my journey to Vienna as being fixed; you know that I will do whatever is thought likely to be useful, but I have considerable doubts, in the first place, whether we had better enter into any detailed concert with Austria; and in the second place, whether more advantage might not be had by my continuing here, at least until all idea of military arrangements respecting Holland should be put aside. Count Panin teaches me to fancy that I might be of more use by keeping up the communications with Petersburg and Austria from hence than I could be in going to either of those places; and he is pleased to suppose that the confidential terms upon which I am put by our Government might enable me to act with more general advantage from hence than from any other spot. I do not, however, see how this could be done without my putting myself more forward than it becomes me to do, and I suspect his opinion upon this subject is founded rather upon his partiality to me and his desire to retain me as long as he can, than from any practicable benefit which any such measure would be likely to produce. For myself, I have no fancy to gratify; I am here because it was thought that I could do good here, and I have no suggestion to make that has any other reference.

"I hope soon to be able to obtain some intelligence from Flanders, and have applied for that purpose to the H[ereditary] P[rince] of Orange and to Baron Lynden who have sent a trusty and intelligent person into the country. I have likewise accepted the offer of General Stamford to pursue the same object by means of a M. de la Palue, son-in-law to M. Riviere, ancien envoyé de Saxe, by whose means, I am told, much may be done with no considerable expense. I have not as yet received from General Stamford any decided recommendation of an officer to command in Portugal, but he is disposed to think that M. de Schwerin might answer this purpose, and his enquiries are directed towards this object, upon which I shall soon be able to write to you. I do not know that any can be found of talents as good as those which he possesses ; he desires you will make what use you please of his pen, and I send you a very good translation of his of a pamphlet on Prussian neutrality, which has had great effect in this part of Germany."

THE HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, April 9. Berlin.—" Je ne crois pas que le séjour de M. de Lynden ici se prolongera, puisqu'il y est superflu dans les circonstances actuelles.

" Mr. Grenville cependant ne paroissoit pas être sans espérances de réussir en dernière analyse à déterminer cette Cour à prendre part à la coalition, mais ne lui ayant pas parlé de quelque temps, je ne puis dire ce qui en est dans ce moment, mais m'en instruirai un de ces jours. Au reste on travaille maintenant à un plan pour opérer la révolution chez nous sans la Prusse, s'il n'y a pas moyen de faire décider celle-ci à la guerre ; et je fais rassembler des matériaux pour cet objet, afin de pouvoir donner toutes les informations possibles quand le moment sera venu. L'objet de la Belgique ne tient pas moins à cœur à Mr. Grenville que celui de la Hollande, et il m' a prié de lui procurer, à cet égard, tous les renseignemens possibles. C'est aussi pour cela que Ragay s'est rendu de ces cotés pour tâcher de procurer des notions justes. Je crois pouvoir présumer que le propos de Haugwitz, savoir, qu'il ne falloit parler que de la délivrance de la Hollande sans nommer la maison d'Orange, a rapport aux déclarations à faire sur cette matière vis-à-vis des François ; savoir, dans le temps où, devant de leur déclarer la guerre, on leur dicteroit les conditions de la paix ; jusqu'à présent je ne crois pas que les Bataves aient fait des démarches directes pour être reconnus, et les liaisons avec la France étant rompues, ce ne peut non plus être par cette mission.

" Mais l'on parle de l'arrivée de Députés qui viennent pour être reconnus, ou pour demander le consentement à la réunion avec la France ; je parlerai au premier jour sur cette matière avec Haugwitz, qui, au reste, n'a plus à beaucoup près le crédit qu'il a eu, et il paroît que Köckeritz, Beyme, et Mencke sont de plus en plus tout puissants : tous les trois sont pour le système pacifique, mais on assure cependant qu'il y auroit moyen de gagner quelqu'influence sur eux, du moins sur celui qui a le plus d'influence, savoir Beyme. Les dispositions de Mylord Grenville pour notre maison me font un très-grand plaisir, et assurent que le cabinet Britannique travaille toujours en notre faveur."

April 16. Berlin.—" Lynden est réparti, sa présence ici étant superflue. Avant de partir il a parlé avec Haugwitz, qui lui a donné les assurances générales de bonnes dispositions pour la République, mais soumettant la conduite de sa Cour à cet égard aux combinaisons générales ; dans la conversation Lynden lui demanda si l'on pouvoit se flatter qu'au cas que les événemens permissent de rétablir les choses en Hollande, ou qu'un désespoir général provoquat une révolution, il seroit possible de compter sur l'assistance du Roi, pour empêcher que les François ne s'emparent de nouveau du pays. La réponse fut affirmative dans le cas où une révolution seroit faite, mais Haugwitz recommanda, en même temps, la plus grande prudence pour ne pas exposer tant de fortunes et de vies. Je crois, au reste, que si les succès de l'Archiduc continuent, il sera probable que nous nous aidions nous-mêmes, et d'ailleurs l'on s'occupe d'un projet pour parvenir à délivrer la République quand même le roi resteroit neutre en dernière analyse ; et je doute qu'on détermine la Prusse à agir, puisque les puissances exigent une coopération directement offensive, tandis qu'on ne veut s'y décider que d'après les circonstances ; et, en attendant, on veut être en état de pouvoir agir à tout moment. On en étoit du moins encore là il y a peu de jours, mais j'ignore si depuis l'arrivée des derniers couriers il s'est passé quelque chose de nouveau. Yvoy doit être maintenant à Emerick, d'où il tachera d'avoir des nouvelles de la Belgique. L'affaire de la Hollande et de la Belgique est d'un intérêt majeur à Mr. Grenville, et il ne les sépare presque plus. A moins de grands revers du côté des Impériaux, je ne doute pas que dans le cours de cet été on ne tente quelque chose de ce côté là, et je m'occupe en conséquence à coucher mes idées sur le papier par rapport à ce que nous pourrions faire. Dès que j'aurai formé mon projet, je le communiquerai chez vous et ici à Mr. Grenville. Les dispositions de la Cour de Berlin ne m'affligent pas moins que Mylord Grenville, et, en particulier, que l'on soit parvenu à éloigner si fort le roi de toute idée de guerre.

“Cependant il y a des moyens d'influencer plusieurs des personnes qui ont du crédit. Peut-être qu'en employant les véritables, on réussiroit à changer le système.” Extract.

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, April 10. Berlin.—“In my hurry to send Shaw with his budget of news, I overlooked one or two points to which your private letters have adverted, and I take this opportunity of adding a word or two to supply that deficiency ; and first with regard to Holland and to Count Haugwitz's doubts about naming the Stadtholder in the first efforts to be made in that country. I do not apprehend there is any finesse on his part in declaring that opinion, but I presume that his information leads him really to believe that more management is necessary on that point, than is in truth either requisite or advisable ; I should feel much disposed to think with you that this is a mistaken view in point of policy, but it is of a description to be easily corrected in the moment of acting, and as I apprehend no underhand design in this view, I have not, in my private conversations with him, pursued any further that topic of discussion. They certainly feel upon the whole gratified by the liberal arrangements proposed from England for re-establishing the independence of Holland, and I have found the description of our disposition on this subject very useful to correct the impression which the French industriously labour to establish here, of an overbearing and tyrannical design in Great Britain to engross and monopolize by force the trade and commerce of Europe. This French artifice is most easily traced here upon a variety of topics, and I am assured that they have succeeded in creating a very general belief that the present high price of coffee (which is in as general use in Germany as tea is in England) is entirely owing to that trade being got entirely into the hands of the English. I never hear this quoted without remarking how much it is our wish to see re-established in Europe the only commercial country which in wealth and industry could ever be compared to us; and I observe that wherever our desire of seeing Holland re-established is believed, we have ample credit for a conduct which seems more liberal and disinterested than in general they know how to think sincere on our part. The last news which I have from thence announces rather an ostentatious imprudence on the part of the French in sending all their force towards the Haut Rhin; but this is so publicly announced that it is impossible not to suspect some artifice in it, more especially as it is so much their practice to work by the operation of these reports; and it is remarkable enough that, in the same moment, the old project of the union of the Batavian provinces to the French Republic is again very much circulated and discussed in Holland.

“My last letters from Sir James Crawford upon our Hamburg project state all the difficulties which he finds, and do not state many resources or assistances; but I regard this the less because it seems to me that in temper and disposition he is naturally more sensible of difficulties than fertile of expedients to remove them; he says the magistrates are frightened at having been questioned by Prussia whether they had desired the assistance of the Emperor of Russia, and that they have expressly disclaimed a wish for any such assistance, but that their fears of offending Russia by this declaration still give him some hold of this subject and the only hold which now remains. I do not feel less anxious than I did as to the ultimate success of an arrangement with Denmark for a combined force on that side either by land or sea; but as that expedition could not succeed for Holland until the main Russian force should have approached to Dusseldorff, all that I now wish is to have that cooperation established; and an arrangement of that nature might be settled by Anstruther so as to be ready when it is wanted without previously challenging the Prussian neutrality, or awakening on that side the defence of the enemy. Meantime a Prussian engineer has been sent to consider of the defence of Cuxhaven, and I understand they mean to send some troops to that neighbourhood; if however I am to give credit to Mr. Harward the agent at Cuxhaven, you have it in contemplation to make Norden your port of passage in future instead of Cuxhaven; at least he tells me that he is ordered to report on this to the Post Office, and I conceive by his letter that he means to report favourably of such an arrangement. There is little doubt but that in point of facility of communication in winter, and nearer and more direct route to the middle of Germany, Norden would have the advantage; but how far the consideration of its being Prussian instead of Hamburgois is an advantage does not appear to me to be quite so clear; and I have likewise some doubts whether the money packets will not be exposed to considerable danger from the small Dutch privateer row-boats which can so easily skulk about those little islands, and shelter themselves on the Dutch side of the embouchure of the Ems. Mr. Harward advises me to avail myself at Berlin of a measure so agreeable to the interests of the Prussian monarchy; but before I do so I shall be glad to be better informed, and assured that such a measure will be agreeable to the interests also of the little island that I belong to; pray let me know what are your wishes and opinions in England upon this subject.

"Fauche and his friend have received passports from Petersburg, and are going thither to make the Emperor their plenipotentiary with Louis XVIII, instead of treating with him through the Duc de Fleury; you will already have seen by my letters how much I agree with you, both in the speculations of the whole affair and in the entire disinclination which I have to have anything to do with it. I never can believe Barras to be such a blockhead as to put his life and fortune so entirely in their hands, and I am persuaded that the Paris negotiation is only a bargain of some under intriguer who buys and sells with the name of Barras whatever he can get by it at any market; we shall see what it will be worth at Petersburg. Before however I entirely quit these northern sovereigns let me again return to suggest to you, in one word, the consideration of the combined project between Great Britain, Russia, and Denmark, as offering no inconsiderable guard against the danger which you seem to apprehend of Prussia engaging the last of these powers in questions of naval jealousy and altercation with Great Britain. Surely any project of concert, naval and military, for any expedition in which Prussia had no part, would very much tend to diminish that danger; and on the other hand it should not be forgot that the transferring to Norden the commerce of English passage, is to put into the hands of the Prussian Cabinet additional means of peevish litigation and dispute, if upon such subjects any unpleasant disposition is in the least likely to shew itself at Berlin.

"Since my last declaration to the Prussian Ministers I have sought for no other discussion with them, and wish only to hear from England what your decisions may be as to the employment of the Russian force, and what assistance you think I can give to that, or to any resolution that you may come to upon these subjects. They will certainly feel much embarrassed here at the solitary figure which they will display in the politics of Europe whenever Russia and England shall publicly have taken their ground with Austria, and I have no doubt but that a good deal of that distrust and dissatisfaction will be shewn here which is the constant result of weak measures, and no bad punishment of the wretched system which has produced them. Of the insufficiency of Count Haugwiz to resist that system and those measures, however he may disapprove of them, I learnt a new and strong proof to-day. In Saxe-Weimar a celebrated professor has published a system of atheism which, when published, was immediately forbidden there, and was denounced at Berlin and Hanover as being a wicked and dangerous publication; in Hanover it is forbidden, in Berlin Haugwiz proposed and urged vehemently the suppressing it; the forms here require however that this question should be submitted to a consistory, who decided in opposition to Haugwiz; and one of the members gave for his reason, that he should be ashamed to believe in a God if he was afraid of any book that could be written to prove that there was no God. This difference of opinion between Haugwiz and the consistory was referred to the King, who decided for the consistory upon these liberal principles, and the book is sold publicly in all the streets of Berlin. I mention this matter to you not only as a proof of the incapacity of those who influence the King, but as a strong instance of the insufficiency of Haugwiz, who, vehemently urging another and a wiser opinion, has not firmness enough to give effect to his own sentiments, but submits to worse and weaker counsels on points which he himself believes to be of the greatest danger and importance.

"It has been whispered here these last two days that the disgrace and infamy of the Austrian negotiation with France is not confined to the shameful convention of Rastadt which you see in all the papers, but that there are secret articles of a still more scandalous description; if I procure them I will send them to you, and I have desired Count Panin to endeavour likewise to get them and send them to Woronzow and to you. My Russian friend is under very great apprehension for the turn which things may take at Petersburg if Woronzow should refuse, and I fancy he writes to him by this messenger to tell him his mind upon that subject. I have a letter from Eden of April 3 with a confirmation of the Legnano victory as I sent it to you in my last; but he speaks of Laudohn's having had a check in the Tyrol, before he could join Bellegarde, which however he has done. The freshest news here is a letter from Schaffhausen of 30th, which speaks of the French at that moment evacuating the town on the approach of the Austrians. By Staray's approach, Jourdan is obliged to cross the Rhine. I have no public despatch, but I send to Cuxhaven as there is no messenger to bring me what despatches you may send there; for Shaw's merits in our escape were so great that I could not refuse him permission to go on to England, and therefore I have on this occasion no back-carriage to bring your letters."

Postscript. "I cannot get these secret articles yet, but as they are sent from Radstadt to disgrace the Austrians here, they will soon enough be known; in my mind it is not easy to add to their shame in the book of Radstadt negotiations.

"The Prussian Ministers are ordered to withdraw from Radstadt. We have it whispered here that Zastrow has had a dispute with the King upon military arrangements which has lessened his favour; and Schmettau, who is considered as being dans les bons principes, is talked of as advancing in the king's favour; but all these are wretched and little pursuits too minute and of too confined a scale to tell with any advantage upon the great objects which ought to engross the attention and influence the conduct of one of the greatest powers of Europe.

"The Prince of Orange has this moment left me, and has promised great activity among his friends for information from the Low Countries. He has given me an extract from the letter of a man very well informed at Paris, which shews that they seriously have the project of attack upon Hamburgh. Haugwitz does not encourage Baron Lynden with an expectation of early support, but distinctly promised that, if the Republic of Holland could re-establish itself, the King would prevent the French from re-entering Holland. The Prince of Orange's correspondents tell him there [are] not above one thousand French left in the country; if so they might almost do the business themselves. I am impatient to hear from you."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 12. Harley Street.—"Je vous envoie ce que j'ai reçu du Comte de Panin de Berlin, en vous prient de me renvoyer ces incluses dès que vous les aurez lue.

"Je vous demande la faveure de me communiquer ce qu'on vous écrit de Petersbourg, tant sur les mesures qui se prennent pour sauver l'Europe, car je n'ai pas reçu des lettres de Russie par cette poste, et de me communiquer ce que le Chevalier Whitworth vous écrit par à port [rapport] à ce qui me regarde. Il doit en savoir quelque chose, puisque par la poste précédente, Katchoubey m'a écrit du $\frac{5}{16}$ Mars, que la nouvelle de l'invitation que l'Empereur m'a fait s'est répandue par la ville, quoiqu'en expédient le courier, le $\frac{2}{13}$ de Mars, l'Empereur ne l'avoit dit à perssone.

"Comme cette affaire comence à s'ébruiter ici, je dis (et cela est vrai d'après ce que j'ai répondu à l'Empereur) que je vais par congé, et que j'espère de revenir l'été prochain. Je me réjouis avec vous sur la confirmation des victoires de l'Archiduc, et je suis tout à vous pour la vie."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, April 12. Cleveland Row.—"Your despatches and letters of the 8th instant were received this morning. I have not time to answer them officially by this night's mail, nor indeed is there anything in them that much presses, but I would not let the post go without a few lines to you. I am vexed beyond all description to find that so late as the 3rd you had received nothing from me. You will since have seen that I have not been so negligent as you must have thought me ; but I am still at a loss to conceive how it is possible that my letters (the first I mean) can have been so long in reaching you.

“ The accounts of the Archduke’s successes on the 23rd and 25th, added to those of the 21st which you have sent, have put us all into high spirits, but I have so total a want of confidence in everything Austrian that I look upon all this only as a prelude to some patched up peace that will give to Austria a score of leagues more in Italy or in Germany, and may possibly (but not probably) restore the King of Naples ; but will leave everything else exactly where the war found it. Still even this is one degree better than the immediate subversion of all Germany, which would have followed Jourdan’s success. How Prussia can be so blind to both those dangers is perfectly incomprehensible on any principle of reasoning, and would be astonishing to anyone who had not been doomed to watch the conduct of these great politicians for six years. Oh that I could speak to them as Gustavus Adolphus did when he occupied Berlin, and told them that as they must pay either for being saved or for being ruined, he might as well force them to do the first, as leave them to be forced by Austria to do the second.

“ I am very sorry that you thought it necessary to respect Sir M. Eden’s seal. Pray do not do so any more, whatever reason he may have or not have for putting it. You had no loss. Your bile would have been still more moved to read how he ‘deplores as hopeless’ the only thing that he is ordered to do, and how he transcribes into that despatch his transcript of Thugut’s nonsense. I am almost tempted to re-transcribe it, only changing Prussia into Austria all through, and then send it him back. It is a sore evil, but God knows how it can be remedied, for one would have not only to remove him, but to supply his place, and there are not two yous in the world, nor would the one you stay there long, after you had seen the impossibility of giving these people one sentiment of honour, honesty, or common sense.

“ You will have seen how, while our letters have been frozen up, or buried in the portmanteau of some lagging messenger more tardy than your friend Fabius Maximus himself, we have been writing the same thing to one another from the two sides of the water. We differ but in one point, and your judgment makes me distrust my own ; but still the more I think of it, the more adverse I am to bring the Russians to the Middle Rhine, where they will fall into the whole chaos of Prussian and Austrian politics, and will infallibly lose their way in that labyrinth, instead of going, as I trust they will, through Switzerland straight on into France, while Lord Hawkesbury’s regiment meets them at the gates of Paris. My heart sunk within me when I read Whitworth’s despatch, which adds to the difficulties, great as I think them, of that plan others absolutely insuperable. There is no part of that frontier on which it would, I conceive, be possible to stir a step without a regular battering train. How are the Russians to bring that with them, or who is to supply it ?

The operation on Holland, either as the Duke of Brunswick proposed it, or by sea, turned that whole defence and took it in the rear. The operation on Switzerland turns it on the other side, and equally brings us behind the fortified line. But the Middle Rhine is the very centre of that defence, where France possesses now all her own iron frontier, and all that was opposed as a barrier against it. Surely then it requires not much more military talents than belongs to a major of yeomanry to see that this is the very worst of all points of attack. Add to this the political labyrinth which I have already mentioned. Add the inconveniency of renewing the system of multiplied and distant attacks, instead of bringing all to bear on one and that the weakest point. Add the impossibility of making any of these Electors and Landgraves stir a step without Prussia, the incurable jealousies which such a project would excite both at Vienna and Berlin, the ten thousand means of intrigues that France would set in motion against it, and fifty other reasons that you would be tired to read of, and surely you will not differ from me in the preference I so decidedly give to the proposition which we have made to Petersburg. All I fear is that they will be entêtés with their own project.

"My eyes will let me write no more. Do not forget maps, if there are any at Berlin worth sending." Copy.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, Apr. 12. Dublin.—"The Speaker opened last night his long expected attack upon Mr. Pitt and the Union. The first hour was passed in a very laboured and tiresome detail of proofs that the arrangement of 1782 was final and conclusive to all objects and purposes; and for this he read a great collection of addresses, resolutions, speeches. He then went at length into the examination of the commercial question between the two kingdoms, with the most violent, unconnected, and unbounded abuse of Pitt to the utmost extent; and with the most unqualified expressions of 'weak, flimsy, paltry, contemptible, wicked, perfidious, designing, dangerous, ruinous' Minister; and the most inflammatory address to all religions and descriptions to unite against this design, to which he expressly stated Parliament incompetent. He controverted every part of the linen question, and dared Great Britain to commence a war of bounties or of regulations that would leave Ireland at liberty to profit by the natural advantages which she had over England. Extolled the vigour, independence, character, and conduct of the Irish Parliament in detecting and putting down the rebellion; stated the incompetence of a Legislature or Government sitting in London to meet the difficulties of this moment; warned Ireland against the oppression and neglect that Great Britain had always shewn to Scotland, and even to Wales, since their union; illustrated this by the neglect of the harbour and dock at Milford from local and national jealousy, considerations which he addressed to Cork; and finished with an exhortation to Ireland to run every risk, and to prefer any possible evil to that greatest evil, the Union. He spoke four hours but very ill, and without Parliamentary effect; but his friends say that his speech is to be printed, and that the effect is to be elsewhere; and I am told that it will be a very seditionous, perhaps even a treasonable publication. All this proves him to be completely desperate, but I am satisfied that the temper of the country is changed, and that he mixes this acid with the mass in hopes of creating a fermentation where it appears wholly to have subsided. You will be told that it is not wise to press it till next year. I, on the contrary, shall persist in my advice to do what alone will carry the question, and then to propose it as soon as may be.

“Adieu; most happy am I in the hopes that this is my last letter to you from this detested scene. I embark on the 17th, and hope to see you as soon as I can get to Stowe.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 16. Harley Street.—“Vous vous souviendrez que quand vous m’avez lue le passage de la dépêche du Chevalier White-worth sur le changement fait à la marche du corp Russe qui, au lieu de s’embarquer dans l’Adriatique pour passer directement à Naples ou en Sicile, devait aller joindre le Maréchal Souwarow, que je vous ai fait observer les grands inconvénients qui doivent en resulter de ce changement de plan. Plus j’ai réfléchi après sur cette affaire et plus ces inconvénients m’on paru graves. J’en ai parlé avec le Marquis de Circello qui en a été aussi très alarmé. J’ai cru de mon devoir de faire quelque observations à l’Empereur sur ce sujet; je vous envoie la copie de ma dépêche en vous prient de me la renvoyer, et en vous suppliant de donner vos ordres au Chevalier Whiteworth d’appuyer, en comun avec le Duc de Seracapirola, les arguments de cette dépêche, pour éviter le mal qui s’en suivra si on ne revient pas chez nous au plan primitif, et à la manière de secourir le Roi de Naples par un débarquement directe dans un de ses deux royaumes.”

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, April 16. Cleveland Row.—“I wrote to you so fully by the last mail that I have little to add to-day to my public despatch. You will readily understand that the only intention of that despatch is to keep you for some time longer where you are, without its being possible to specify any good that you can do precisely in the present moment. But so many different events may alter the present state, or rather it seems so certain that it must be altered in some manner by any course of events, that I should be in despair at seeing you quit la partie just now. I cannot help entertaining sanguine hopes that these Austrian successes, if they continue a little longer, will begin to rouse the Prussians, in order that they may come in for their share of the fruits of victory; but although this would not be a very magnanimous motive of action, I should be well content to take the war, and leave the motive to shift for itself.

"I have however learnt a very curious circumstance which, to a certain extent, I know with certainty to be true. Vander-Goes, the minister of foreign affairs at the Hague, certainly told the Danish Minister there, in confidence, a little more than a fortnight ago, that the French had purchased the neutrality of Prussia at the rate of two millions per month, the first payment of which the Dutch were then taking measures to provide for. Whether Talleyrand has bamboozled the Dutchman, and means to put this money into his own pocket, or whether the Directory makes this a pretence to squeeze more money from their Batavian allies, or whether the Dutch Talleyrand was laughing at the Dane, who is certainly no conjurer, or whether De Luc's magnanimous and virtuous friend really meant that both parties should pay him for doing nothing, I do not pretend to decide. Perhaps you may have some grounds for forming a conjecture on the subject, but you must not mention the intelligence even to Panin.

"Woronzow goes most reluctantly to Petersburg. It is, I really believe, the most sincere nolo episcopari that ever was pronounced, but go he must. He has however stipulated that in the first instance he shall go only par congé, and that no one shall be named to succeed him. This is not without its inconveniences. Lisakewitz, whom he leaves, is, I believe, a well disposed man, but his opinions can have but little weight at Petersburg." Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 17. Harley Street.—"Je vous suis bien reconnaissant pour les excellentes nouvelles que vous venez de me donner. Le commencement de cette guerre est si beau, si encourageant pour l'Autriche, et si propre pour décourager et avilir les troupes Françaises, qu'il y a espérer que la continuation et la fin répondront aux brillants succès de cette belle ouverture de campagne; l'ardeur de l'Archiduc ne peut être assés loué. L'entrée des Autrichiens en Suisse est ce qu'il y a de plus heureux; ce sera une brave nation délivrée, et qui, armée contre ses opresseurs, aidera les alliés en s'armant et en se joignent à eux. Le Comte Panin ne m'a rien écrit par cette poste; mais un de nos Ministres qui est auprès de l'Empereur, M. Rostopchin, m'écrit de Petersburg qu'on est très mécontent du Roi de Prusse, et qu'on vient de lui demander une réponse cathégorique. Je voudrois qu'on ne heurta pas trop ce Roi; mais avec de la douceur et de la patience, jointe aux grand succès des Autrichiens, on pourroit peut-etre le déterminer à profiter des désastres des Français, pour netoyer la Holande et les Pays-Bas. Mais, si on le choque, il refusera net, se rapprochera davantage des Français, et une foi jété dans leurs bras, il sera difficile de l'en retirer."

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 18. Harley Street.—"Je vous envoie ce que j'ai reçu par votre courier de Berlin. Après avoir lue les incluses, je vous supplie de me les renvoyer, afin que je puisse répondre demain au Comte Panin. Sur la différence d'opinion par apport au théâtre de la guerre, je demande mille pardons au Général Stamford; mais je trouve que le Secrétaire d'Etat, Lord Grenville, a mieux jugé que le militaire, et que quarante-cinq milles hommes, isolés et entourés de forteresses, ne seront que sacrifiés, et que le même nombre employé en Suisse feront un bien infini, renforceront l'Archiduc, et pénétreront en Franche Comté. L'harmonie parfaite qui régné entre Monsieur votre frère et le Comte Panin me fait un plaisir extrême. Je vous supplie de m'envoyer une copie de la note de Diedrichstein dont le Comte Panin me parle et ne me l'envoi pas, espèrent que je l'aurai de vous."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, April 18. Cleveland Row.—"I am answering to-day two very welcome letters of yours of the 8th and 10th instant, the first of which I received yesterday, the other to-day. The opening of the campaign is really brilliant, and, whatever else may happen, it must be productive of solid and permanent good to shew that these tigers may be resisted by firmness and courage, at land as well as at sea. We are told that the first column of the Russians cannot arrive in Italy till about this time, so that the Austrians will have had to support their position alone for near a month later than our accounts. Craufurd however writes of a further success obtained by Kray on the 30th. I cannot quite discharge from my mind the apprehension that in the middle of all this we shall hear of some Austrian negotiation with France, and yet, if they do lose the present opportunity of saving themselves, they will deserve their fate.

"Since you wrote your private letter, No. 15, you will have seen at full length all my arguments, stated to Sir C. Whitworth, against the project of employing the Russians on the Bas-Rhin, and in favour of sending them into Switzerland. I perfectly agree with you that, if they go there, their cooperation with the Austrians must be complete and unlimited; and you will have seen that, since this idea has been decidedly adopted, I have dropt all mention of limitations and restrictions. I never indeed had much more in view than to make Russia require that the Cabinet of Vienna should not, on the arrival of the Russians, weaken the Archduke's present force. But even this is so easily evaded that it seems hardly worth insisting upon it. The Emperor of Russia's notion of letting the same army at the same moment act against France and awe Prussia, is with me a strong confirmation of my former opinion that, in trying both, it will do neither.

"I suspect that the Danes and we are on the very point of quarrelling about illicit trade, and seizures of neutrals, and blockade of Dutch ports. They are fitting out ten sail of the line, which can mean nothing but to alarm us, for half that number of frigates would, as things now stand, protect their commerce against France, which is the ostensible pretext they use to us, though they do not mean that we should believe it, but the contrary. All further plans about Hamburgh must therefore be pressed upon them from Russia, who may do at Copenhagen whatever she really pleases to do. You will see how much I agree with Panin in thinking that your continuance at Berlin is in the present moment a point of the utmost importance, particularly with this very view of urging Russian cooperations in every quarter. When you do come away it is settled (and announced) that you are to be succeeded by Paget, with whom the Elector of Bavaria has picked a quarrel, evidently in order to pay his court to France. He will stay at Ratisbon or in the environs, but will not go to Berlin till you have left it, which I trust will not be for some time yet.

"I had heard nothing of the project about Norden, but agree much in your speculations concerning it, and will take some steps to check Mr. Harward's zeal.

"Lord William Bentinck goes to the army in Italy. I had kept this nomination back as long as I saw any hopes of operations in Holland, because I thought his name and connexions particularly fitted him for that; but this dream is over, and he goes to learn a little Russian tactique. He will set out on Tuesday for Vienna, but I suppose, as things now are, will not pass through Berlin. I will do as you suggest about Lord Talbot. It is curious that while Craufurd writes of nothing but the Hamburgh jealousy of Russia, and desire to abide by Prussian protection exclusively, the Danes, who ought to know better, think that the exact reverse of this picture is the true one. I conclude from it that Messieurs les Hambourgeois are not a little afraid of all these great protectors, and I cannot much blame them for it. The Senate have written to me to beg leave to send Napper Tandy and his colleague about their business, but I am adamant.

"Your anecdote about Haugwitz and his master is horrible. If these madmen could but ruin themselves without involving others, who would pity them.

"Woronzow does not refuse, but is quite persuaded that he will not maintain his ground three months, and keeps this mission open that he may return to it.

"God bless you my dearest brother. It would be a vain attempt to describe the satisfaction I have felt from our correspondence, and I beg you to believe that this is not the language only of my affection, for the same opinion is entertained by all who see it. Our master is particularly (and I believe very sincerely) gracious on the subject." Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, April 18. Berlin.—"In the last half hour which I had destined to my private letter the Prince of Orange breaks in, and makes it impossible for me to write more than a few lines to you,

The negotiation here is, as you see, with respect to its original object completely at a stop, and I agree with you in thinking that there seems little chance of my being more useful at Vienna than I have been at Berlin. I should therefore naturally have proposed to you to consider of my return, if I did not see that you still attached some idea of advantage to my prolonging my stay here. You will have seen by my former letters that I do not entirely differ with you as to the theory of extending into the Continent, by the confidence which you place in me, something of a more immediate communication with the leading Courts than their distance from London will seem to admit of; but, tempting as this sounds in the advantage which it seems to offer, I fear it must be found entirely impracticable when it is applied to use, for with all that you know and see of the jealousy of resident Ministers as to the interference of those whom they consider as interlopers, I do not see or know how it will be possible for me to keep up that intercourse with any essential effect. My desire however is, as you know, to be useful, and my peculiar desire would certainly be to be useful to you. I have therefore only to say that any arrangement which seems to promise any public service more peculiarly through me, will certainly be cheerfully acquiesced in by me, if it can be made to seem to promise any real benefit.

"Baron Arnfeldt has communicated to me from his correspondent the intelligence which I send in my despatch respecting Flanders; his correspondent is a man of no abilities or talents, but he says is of most perfect veracity. The intelligence from thence seems so important that I have desired General Stamford to send by estafette to endeavour to establish means of correspondence through M. de la Palue; and I have told him that fair expenses and gratifications shall be allowed according to a plan delivered for that purpose. Haugwitz's information concerning Brest is through Sandos, from the Spanish Minister at Paris."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 19. Wimbledon.—"The enclosed letter addressed to the Prince of Orange was yesterday put into my hands by the Duke of York. It is too general to make any practical system out of it, but if you think any more defined could be obtained, you may think it right to suggest to the Prince of Orange the propriety of the writer of the letter coming over here that we may [learn] precisely his plan, and the means of accomplishing it to any beneficial extent."

EARL TEMPLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 19. Avington.—"I have this instant seen a letter from a gentleman of property in this county mentioning, as a certain fact, that Lord Bolton is to be appointed Lord Lieutenant, and that I am not. I trust there is no authority for this assertion, but as Mr. Pitt has not thought proper to send me one word of answer to my letter to him, I thought it best to apprise you of this circumstance, and to beg of you to exert yourself as much as you can in my behalf; as I cannot help thinking my pretensions to the full as good as Lord Bolton's, and I must confess I feel not a little hurt at the very cavalier manner in which Mr. Pitt has chosen to treat my application."

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, April 20. Dropmore.—"I return the letter you sent me yesterday. Mr. Grenville has already taken, at my desire, some steps in concert with the Hereditary Prince of Orange for sending into Brabant some two or three persons of the description there mentioned. But this is very circuitous and uncertain in its result. The object appears to me so pressing that I think it would be a great pity that so much time should be lost as would be necessary to bring M. de Thuyl from Munster into the Low Countries.

"If the Prince of Orange knows him and has a confidence in his principles, I should think it much better to desire His Serene Highness to write at once to approve of his engaging without delay in this enterprise. It might be necessary for that purpose to remit to him some small sum of money, which either Huskisson or Hammond would easily settle with M. Fagel; and some assurance should be given of further aid, if necessary, to a limited amount."

Postscript. "If he succeeds in getting into the country he should be ordered to use his utmost efforts to open a communication either with England or with Mr. Grenville at Berlin." Copy.

"ALEXANDRE" to [H. FAGEL].

1799, April 23. Berlin.—"Je me souviens que vous m'avez demandé un jour de ne point mettre de cérémonie dans mes lettres, et je vous obéis.

"J'ai à la fin pris le parti de sortir de mon affreux exil de Lick, et de me rendre ici, où j'ai le plaisir de voir souvent Robert, qui jouit maintenant d'une très bonne santé. Au moment de mon départ le L[and] Gr[ave] de Hombourg me pria de passer à Francfort où il me remit les papiers que je vous envoie. Je m'acquittais ici de ce dont il m'avait chargé; le Pr[ince] Héréditaire d'Orange me conseilla d'en parler à Garlike, qui me transmit de Mr. Grenville la communication qu'il ne pouvait entrer dans aucune de ces idées. Garlike y ajouta comme de lui-même que rien n'empêcherait qu'on ne les communiquât directement au ministère Britannique. Le Landgrave me marqua son désir que cette démarche se fit: comme je ne sais comment y mieux parvenir que par vous, pardonnez-moi la peine que je vous donne de vous en incommoder, et quoique la chose paraisse ne présenter que des impossibilités, je voudrais, vu l'amitié et l'estime que j'ai pour celui qui en est l'auteur, qu'il ne s'imaginât pas qu'il ait des reproches à me faire sur le manque de réussite d'un projet auquel il tient extrêmement par zèle et dévouement pour la bonne cause et nullement par ambition: de quoi la moindre connaissance de son caractère doit persuader un chacun. Daignez donc me donner une réponse que je puisse lui communiquer, et si c'est par la voie de la poste, veuillez ne le point nommer : ayant des relations et de grands rapprochements de parenté ici, cela pourrait le compromettre désagréablement.

“Je saisis cette occasion avec empressement pour vous assurer que ni des lieux ni le temps n'apportent jamais d'altération à l'attachement inviolable que j'ai voué à tous les intéressants individus qui composent votre famille.”

Enclosure.

Mémoire [by the LANDGRAVE OF HESSE HOMBURG].

“Dans la position actuelle de l'Allemagne et de l'Europe, où les succès des Français menacent le système actuel d'une destruction totale, il paraît qu'il y a encore un moyen pour prévenir ce malheur.

1. “Il faudrait au nom de l'Empereur lever et mettre sur pied une armée de 50,000 hommes sur quelque point éloigné, la Bohème par exemple, de manière toute fois que cet enrôlement se fit sans éclat, et simplement sur le pied de mettre les régiments au complet.

2. “Cette armée qui devrait être formée des troupes des Princes ecclésiastiques, des contingents de celles de l'Empire, de recrues de la Suisse et de l'ancienne armée d'Hollande, qu'on pourrait avoir à foison, pourrait être sur pied dans 2 ou 3 mois.

3. “L'Angleterre devrait se charger du paiement. Il serait plus de l'intérêt de cet état, qui déjà a été tant trompé par tous les recrutements partiels qu'il a payé, d'en entreprendre un en grand qui peut-être mettrait fin à la guerre ; il faudrait 3 ou 4 millions de livres sterling.

4. “La destination de l'armée pourrait être à ——— ou comme reserve, de couvrir la grande armée, servir à ses communications, faire des sièges sur ses derrières, remplir les intervalles ; utilité déjà très grande.

6. “Mais elle pourrait en avoir infiniment davantage en étant employée de la manière suivante.

“D'abord on divulgueroit qu'elle est destinée pour l'Italie ; après quoi on la ferait passer pour être prise à la solde des états du nord de l'Empire pour renforcer la ligne de démarcation ; à la suite de quoi, par des marches forcées et sur des chariots autant qu'on le pourrait, elle s'avancerait vers le bas Rhin où elle se dirait payée par l'Angleterre, ferait prendre les armes aux habitantes de la rive gauche du Rhin, tomberait sur les Français qu'elle trouverait, passerait le Meuse, se réunirait aux insurgés des Pays-bas, chasserait tous les Français du Brabant, sur quoi

la révolution en Hollande éclaterait d'elle-même. Dans le même moment 30,000 Anglais débarqueraient en Flandres ; on assiégerait avec la plus grande énergie les places si rapprochées de Condé, Valenciennes, Quenoy, Landrecies et Maubeuge, occasion à laquelle le numéraire devrait ne point être épargné pour tirer parti de toutes les intelligences, complots, et espions ; au cas que cela prit trop de temps on ferait bloquer ces villes par des Anglais et des insurgés. Dans cette même époque Louis 18 devrait arriver à l'armée. On marcherait droit en avant, et entrerait en France par St. Quentin aussi vite que possible, accompagné d'un manifeste par lequel le roi promettrait une amnistie plénière (avec la seule clause que ceux qui ont voté la mort du dernier roi devraient quitter la France) et la promesse que les acquéreurs de biens d'émigrés resteroient en possession, avec la réserve que ceux-ci conserveraient le droit de les révéndiquer pour le prix de l'acquisition.

“Pendant ces opérations, les puissances continentales n'auraient autre chose à faire qu'à prendre une attitude menaçante pour tenir les armées ennemies éloignées de l'intérieur de la France.

“Comme il serait impossible de donner dans les détails des magasins, il serait indubitablement nécessaire qu'on ne manquât jamais d'argent pour pouvoir payer tout comptant, même en pays ennemi, et donner l'exemple d'une discipline parfaite.

“Il est de là plus grande probabilité que les peuples de France, voyant paraître leur roi sous de pareils auspices, accouriront en foule à lui, et sécoueront le joug de leurs tyrans ; après quoi il ne sera pas difficile de faire la paix générale avec le nouveau roi, s'entendant sur le pied du statu quo qui avait lieu en Europe avant la guerre, avec l'exception que la maison d'Autriche garde Vénise, et que celle d'Orange obtienne les Pays-bas.

“Il y a quelqu'un qui offre de se charger de cette entreprise, et de se sacrifier pour son exécution.”

“Il est à remarquer, qu'il s'agit de deux moyens d'employer l'armée, comme réserve, ou comme agissante. Je serai très fâché qu'on adopta le premier, parceque l'utilité en serait nulle ; je serais sans cesse tirailé de tout côté pour des secours, et les choses au fond resteraient au même point.

“L'essentiel est qu'on adopte l'autre projet. C'est l'unique moyen qui reste de sauver l'Europe, qui tôt ou tard sera engloutie si la République subsiste. Il faut méditer le projet plusieurs fois, avant de le rejeter. Tout risqué qu'il paraît d'abord (quoique personne n'y risque que ceux qui y vont) on trouvera que si tous les points demandés sont remplis dans le moment marqué ; si

l'argent ne manque jamais ; si l'armée marche sous les prétextes allégués ; si on pouvait, outre cela, faire quelque diversion en Hollande ; si les Autrichiens empêchent surtout la rentrée des armées Françaises ; si les Anglais débarquent à point nommé ; si Louis XVIII arrive à l'instant proposé ; s'il publie le manifeste dans les termes projetés ; la vraisemblance de la réussite approche de la certitude.

“Il faudra même dès le commencement que je sois fourni d'une bonne somme d'argent nécessaire, pour quantité de fraix de voyages, d'envoi de courrier ; j'offre de rendre mes comptes à la fin de l'expédition, ou même tous les mois, et j'espère être à l'abri de tout soupçon de motif d'intérêt dans cette affaire.

“Il faudra qu'on me laisse le choix des généraux et de l'état-major, qu'on ne me gêne en rien dans les opérations, qu'on garde le secret le plus impénétrable, et que pour cet effet le moins de personnes possibles soient informées.

“Je désire que le Prince Héréditaire d'Orange fut le premier qui sût la chose, qui donna ses conseils, et voulût bien diriger la négociation.

“Comme je ne voudrais pas que les Cabinets en fussent informés, mais qu'il est absolument nécessaire que ce soit l'Angleterre qui en fasse la proposition, il faut s'ouvrir au Mr. Grenville, ou après son départ à l'ambassadeur Anglais.

“Peut-être que l'envoyé Russe doit aussi le savoir ; ce sera selon que le Prince d'Orange et Lord Grenville décideront.

“Au cas que l'Angleterre ne voulut pas y entrer, peut-être faudrait-il se rabattre sur la Russie. Si, d'après la proposition de l'Angleterre, L'Empereur ne voulait pas qu'on enrôlat en Bohême, il faudrait voir si cela pourrait se faire en Bologne, ou autre part. S'il était possible que mon nom restât caché dans le public pendant quelque temps, cela serait fort à souhaiter pour mon pays et ma famille. Cependant je serais en désespoir si on voulait confier à un autre l'exécution de l'entreprise. Quoique rien ne serait plus aisé que de trouver quelqu'un qui s'en acquitterait mieux comme général, cependant comme le projet vient de moi, personne n'est plus attaché à sa réussite ; tout autre que moi aurait des vues politiques, des jalousies, qui seraient très nuisibles dans cette occasion ; personne n'y serait certainement plus désintéressé que moi, d'autant plus que je compte de périr ou de réussir dans cette entreprise.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 24. Harley Street.—“Ce seroit un grand plaisir pour moi que de pourvoir avoir la satisfaction de passer avec vous, avec my lady, et avec Monsieur Pitt, un jour ou deux à Dropmore, et d'y mener mon fils qui sent avec reconnaissance les bontés que vous avez pour lui et pour son père ; mais il y a un obstacle qui m'empêche de sortir de la ville avant lundi prochain. Vous savez que nous autres de la religion Grèque suivons un autre stil que le votre, et que, pour la célébration des Paques, nous suivons la décision du Concile de Nicée. Or les pères qui y étoient assemblés étoient plus remplis de sainteté que de la sience d'Hiparque, aussi ont-ils cru que l'équinoxe du printems devoit être éternellement le 10 de Mars; delà, ils ont tellement embrouillés leurs calculs que nos Paques se rencontrent rarement avec les vôtres. C'est dimanche prochain que sera notre Paque, et nous soûmes à présent dans notre semaine sainte, où il y a, matin et soir, des services à notre église, desquels, et par ma place, et come père de famille, il m'est impossible de m'absenter. Vous n'avez donc qu'à fixer tel autre jour qu'il vous plaira, pourvue que ce soit après dimanche prochain. Plus je vois la nécessité indispensable d'aller en Russie, plus je vois celle de causer à fond avec vous et avec Monsieur Pitt sur les affaires. Il y a huit ans que nous n'étions pas d'accord, Monsieur Pitt et moi, et cela a du metre du froid entre nous; mais depuis que nous travaillons dans le même sens, que nos principes en politique sont conformes, je suis un de ses plus zélé admirateurs; et je me flatte qu'il me rend aussi la justice d'être perssuadé que, n'ayant jamais changé d'opinion sur la nécessité d'une union intime entre nos deux pays, que j'ai mis à l'exécution de ce principe le zèle le plus ardent, et qu'aiment ce pays à l'égal de ma propre patrie, je me trouve bien heureux de voir mon désir acompli, grace aux soins que vous et lui vous vous êtes donnés pour l'accomplissement de cette union, qui sera la vraie cause du salut de l'Europe."

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, April 24. Berlin.—"It is not the value of the communication which induces me to reserve for my private letter the further discussion of the Paris romance, and the mutual confidences of Louis XVIII. and the Directeur Barras, but I send them to you in secret because I have even greater reluctance than you have to agitate these precious questions of French restoration, and to follow the many monks of the day who see in their daily dreams of the French monarchy the millions of livres they are to roll in at the end, and will not overlook the English guineas which I presume will be wanting to set them a rolling in the beginning. Stamford's good sense would go far, however, to assist in overcoming these prejudices, if they are such; and I do, as you see, condescend to read something of the discussions which he mixes in (however he dislikes them) because he dislikes the revolution still more, for, as he himself says, 'contre cette maudite révolution il faut pourtant malheureusement se servir de tout.' I have forgot to ask you what his own situation is, but sure I am that his merits and services are such as entitle him to a better situation than he seems to have to boast of; he is really an invaluable man, whom it is not easy to praise as much as he deserves, but who appears to me to be better esteemed than he is rewarded. The negotiators are already on their road to Petersburg, and before Fauche went, he communicated a short notice, which I likewise enclose to you, of French louis d'ors passing into Ireland in the shape of French claret, and a signalement of two suspicious men whose steps I fear are not enough traced, though their features and general description may be.

"You will see that I have latterly been chiefly employed about Holland and Hamburg, and you will perhaps have been more amused with my project of proving to the Emperor that his embargo is an act of kindness, than you will have been satisfied of my success in the suggestion which I have made to Sir Charles Whitworth about it, 'mais dans cette maudite révolution il faut pourtant malheureusement se servir de tout.' Am I not however fairly entitled, in the barrenness of all my present communications, to question without any super-abundant modesty whether His Majesty's expectation of my important services by a few weeks longer residence is really very likely to be effectually gratified, according to the present political appearance of things upon the Continent? Having offered this impartial question to your consideration, I shall like to hear what can be reasonably replied in answer, or how it can be urged that I can do any good by staying when, as you see, I have really nothing to write to you while I do stay. I believe however that I have got you two or three good maps, and I do assure you whenever I hear of one I do not omit to ask if there are two. I do not believe that I shall have anything to add to the two despatches which I have written to you, unless a conversation which I am endeavouring to have with Haugwiz should be managed before my messenger sets out to catch the packet of Sunday. With him and with the other Ministers I have had very little communication since I found him so entirely set upon the necessity of English subsidy that I could not bring him to discuss any of the great considerations of the establishment of Europe, or to look at any other motive for the possible activity of this great monarchy except the old hackneyed motive of putting 'five pounds into a certain place.'

"The littleness of such a disposition surprised me as much as it disturbed me, for surely, made up as they are here of fears and prejudices upon the north and upon the south of them, a guaranty against any such dangers, and an invitation to make in partnership that general arrangement which may otherwise turn out to be prejudicial to them, was an offer more tempting to the mind of a great statesman than could be found in the very limited measure of pecuniary subsidy; yet to that alone are all their ideas so inseparably attached, that I have not advanced with Haugwiz even in the smallest discussion of any of these great objects of negotiation. It is barely possible that the violent and ungovernable temper of the Emperor of Russia may enough increase their apprehensions here to produce some momentary advance on their part, and for that I am looking."

Postscript. 1799, April 25, Berlin, 12 at noon.

"I have delayed my messenger till the last moment in order to say a few words to you of my conference this morning with Count Haugwiz, which I had been prepared for with great appearance of mystery and importance. The news which they have received of the hostile intentions of Russia towards them has produced the greatest uneasiness here, and though I put the best face that I can upon it, it is impossible for me not to share very much in that uneasiness. No formal notification of the embargo has been as yet made here, but, whenever it is, Count Haugwiz means to apply to England and Denmark for their interference; and I made no scruple of telling him that I had already written to Petersbourg, in the persuasion that the embargo in question was meant only to prevent the return of those ships to Hamburgh till proper measures of defence for that city had been adopted; he fears however, and I wish it may not be with reason, that the French will make this hasty measure a pretence for seizing all the Hamburgh ships in their ports, which amount to a very considerable value. With regard to the orders for a Russian rendezvous at Dantzic, he observes that besides the expression of division which he thinks may mean rupture between the two Courts instead of dispersion of the squadron, he says they cannot receive the Russian fleet at Dantzic or in the rade without some previous amicable communication. The first of these doubts as to the word division I think I have satisfied him can have no real object; the second I try to make him think will be satisfied by the usual practise in all similar cases. He says that a very large force is assembled near Memel, and that all the Russian officers plainly declare that they are going to war with Prussia, and that Poland already begins to stir in this expectation; that therefore he has been obliged to give orders to resist the Russians if they offer to pass the Memel, and that they mean to remonstrate both about Hamburg and the rendezvous at Dantzick. He is persuaded that the French are at the bottom of this brouillerie, and he complains with reason that Chevalier, an actor and the intimate friend of Collot d'Herbois, is protected by the Emperor and received there in a Russian uniform, because his wife is the mistress of Kotizuff the Emperor's favourite; and he thinks he has good reason to believe from the language of Syéyès here, and of Madame de Stahl [Staël] at Geneva, that the French are both active and successful with the influence which they use at Petersburg. He made these communications to me, as he said, at the King's particular desire, who ordered him to speak in the most confidential manner to me upon it, and to express his reliance upon my agreeing with him in endeavouring to divert this great evil. I told him, with proper civilities, that it was scarcely necessary to observe to him how strongly it was the interest of Great Britain to prevent such an unfortunate breach as that which he feared, and I assured him that I should think myself bound to use every endeavour in my power to prevent it. I persuaded him to put their representation about Hamburgh into the hands of Panin rather than their own minister, and induced him as much as I could to regard this business as a French stratagem to defeat the confederacy which they fear. I again suggested to him that complete concert between the great Courts was the only solid security against these doubts and jealousies so artfully circulated by the enemy, and when I reproached him with not having pursued the last idea which I had suggested of concert for eventual offence, combined with previous arrangements between the great powers, he said he had only put it by in the hopes of still leading the King to immediate and decisive measures, but that he was ready to pursue that object with me whenever I pleased. They are upon the whole alarmed to a great degree, and Haugwiz fears that the rupture will not be prevented; but he puts his best hopes in us upon this subject, and properly enough, for I do think no such entire ruin could in any other way be produced as would result now from war between Prussia and Russia. The messenger will be too late if I proceed, and my remarks are scarce worth an extra packet."

Two enclosures.

Enclosure 1.

Rapport sur une négociation relative au rétablissement de la monarchie en France.

"Sa Majesté Louis XVIII. a nommé pour son agent auprès des personnes qui voudroient concourir au rétablissement de la monarchie, un homme qu'aucun obstacle n'a rebuté, et dont le zèle ardent mais circonspect s'est attiré les plus grands éloges. Une dernière lettre de la main de S[a] M[ajesté] ne laisse aucun doute sur l'étendu de la confiance que mérite cet agent.

"D'ailleurs il est de fait que c'est à lui qu'est due l'ouverture et la négociation du plus grand plan qui ait été conçu dans cet objet, celui dont l'effet fut interrompu au 18 fructidor par le Directoire.

"A cette époque même cet agent étoit à Paris. Les placards qui dénonçoient la confédération l'en désignèrent nomément comme premier instigateur.

"Cet agent actif, embarrassé d'abord de pourvoir à la sûreté de sa personne, ensuite réfugié, reçu avec amitié chez un franc et loyal monarchiste, s'occupe de préparer un nouveau mouvement.

"Il étoit porteur d'un billet du Roi conçu en ces termes, confiance au porteur du présent billet; suivent la date et la signature.

"Il s'autorisa de cette lettre de créance, dont il s'étoit autorisé vingt fois, et il parvint à déterminer celui auquel il devoit son azile et sa vie à tenter des ouvertures auprès de Joseph, l'un du Directoire.

"Alexandre, c'est le nom de celui qui a sauvé l'agent du Roi, Alexandre avoit des rapports avec le secrétaire intime du Directeur. C'est par ce secrétaire qu'il est parvenu à avoir des explications précises avec le Directeur lui-même.

“Ce dernier se chargera de faire un mouvement et de rétablir la monarchie à condition qu'on lui donnera sûreté et indemnité. 'Il n'impose aucune limitation à l'autorité monarchique.' ”

“Ces premières données ont été transmises par lettre à l'agent du Roi après sa sortie de France. Alexandre demanda en même tems qu'on lui fit passer un pouvoir, à l'aide duquel il peut justifier la mission qu'il avoit commencé de remplir. Il observa que la demande lui en étoit faite à lui-même, et qu'il ne pouvoit s'y refuser sans danger pour l'affaire.

“L'agent du Roi récrivit à Alexandre pour lui confirmer les intentions de S[a] M[ajesté] en l'invitant à faire un voyage à Hambourg où il combinerait et recevrait le pouvoir demandé.

“Le voyage entreprit et fait devint inutile, parceque l'agent du Roi avoit été appelé à Londres par une affaire pressante et majeure.

“Mais au lieu même du rendezvous se rencontra Dubois, l'ami, l'associé, le chargé des affaires de cet agent. Il avoit ordre d'accueillir tout étranger qui auroit quelque rapport au Roi. Au nom d'Alexandre il reconnoit celui qui est chargé au nom d'un Directeur de provoquer un mouvement monarchiste. Il se charge lui-même d'annoncer au Roi d'une part, et à son agent de l'autre, cette arrivée venue à contretems. Il est arrêté que le voyage se fera de nouveau, et qu'on préparera dans l'intervalle les pouvoirs demandés.

“Dubois n'obtint point de communication plus intime de l'affaire, parcequ'on la supposoit entendue par le Roi et par son agent. Il écrivit donc dans le sens qu'il pouvoit l'entendre.

“Le Roi, par une lettre écrite de sa main, témoigna la plus grande bienveillance à son agent et à Dubois, et leur annonça le pouvoir demandé.

“Alexandre avoit déjà fait présenter deux choses, la première que la communication du projet à quelques puissances devenoit indispensable ; la seconde que la nature et les termes des pouvoirs ne pouvoient guères se concerter que dans le Cabinet du Roi ; il avoit ajouté à cela une troisième observation, c'est que l'agent du Roi dont il avoit reçu les ordres, et l'ami de cet agent qui l'avoit un moment remplacé, l'accompagneroient auprès du Roi pour faciliter les ouvertures, et réciter eux-mêmes ce qui leur étoit personnel dans la négociation.

“L'agent de S[a] M[ajesté] et son ami Dubois, ayant participé ces dernières ouvertures par leurs correspondances à la Cour de Mittau, reçurent une lettre de M. de St. Priest qui les blamoit de toute communication faite avant que d'y être autorisés, rendoit leur voyage avec Alexandre incertain, déclaroit qu'une affaire de cette importance devoit sortir de leur main, et qu'on devoit à Mittau seulement juger de l'à propos et du moment.

“A l'arrivée d'Alexandre cette lettre lui fut prudemment cachée par Dubois et par l'agent de S[a] M[ajesté]. Elle eut entraîné des explications, et peut-être des ruptures.

“A cette arrivée Alexandre vit M. le Duc de Fleury, qu'on lui dit chargé des pouvoirs du Roi.

“ Il en a été empêché par M. de Fleury, qui a déclaré qu’il mettroit obstacle à toute délivrance de passeport.

“ On doit dire que M. de Fleury y a consenti cependant, mais qu’il y a mis une condition qui a détruit l’effet de son consentement.

“ La condition étoit qu’Alexandre déclareroit et donneroit parole qu’il emportoit avec lui un blanc seing du Directeur, qui lui tenoit lieu de pouvoir. Alexandre avoit fait insinuer qu’il seroit muni du blanc seing, mais qu’il avoit ordre de pourvoir à la sûreté de ce titre indéfini par tous les moyens possibles ; qu’on devoit lui laisser une grande latitude pour la disposition de ce titre en cas d’accidents ; que les conditions qu’on lui présentait étoient senties ; mais qu’on ne devoit point y insister, qu’il falloit laisser à son jugement la disposition libre de ce titre ; sauf à le réclamer lors de la conclusion à Mittau.

“ M. le Duc de Fleury n’ayant point voulu entendre à ces insinuations, Alexandre se disposa à faire son rapport, et déclara qu’il l’enverroit à Mittau par l’agent du Roi avec lequel il avoit traité.

“ M. de Fleury rompit les conférences avec une telle impétuosité, qu’il refusa de se charger du témoignage de respect et de dévouement d’Alexandre auprès de S[a] M[ajesté].

“ C’est après cette rupture qu’Alexandre a été informé de la lettre de M. de St. Priest, par laquelle il blâme toute déclaration à des Ministres de Cours étrangères, interdit le voyage à Mittau, et réserve au Roi seul de décider l’à propos des communications et des mouvemens.

“ Sans doute qu’Alexandre a rendu justice à M. de St. Priest en se persuadant qu’il y avoit dans sa lettre quelque erreur, quelque omission involontaire. Car il est sensible qu’on ne peut dans une affaire de ce genre, dont l’exécution n’a que six mois de délai ultérieur, attendre que l’à propos soit décidé à six cents lieues du théâtre où doit se passer l’action.

Il n'est pas possible non plus que celui qui est chargé du mouvement éprouve des entraves pour les voyages et les déclarations qu'il croira nécessaires.

“Pour abrégér toute explication, Alexandre a rédigé, d'après ses instructions, la formule des actes qui vont déterminer l'exécution du plan.

“Il demande à S[a] M[ajesté] Louis XVIII des lettres patentes, qui, en menageant la dignité du monarque, assure à Joseph sa sûreté, ses propriétés, et la bienveillance de S[a] M[ajesté].

“Sans doute que Louis XVIII ne peut sans secours de quelque puissance fournir aux fraix d'une telle opération.

“On ne peut aussi avoir le projet de ramener Louis XVIII vers son trône sans en faire la déclaration à l'Empereur des Russies, dont il a été accueilli avec magnanimité. C'est à ce généreux ami d'un roi dans l'infortune qu'Alexandre voudroit faire parvenir ses vœux, le tableau de ses efforts, et l'aperçu de ses moyens. On y verra peut-être la très grande possibilité du succès.

Quelques vues sur l'exécution.

“Je n'examinerai point quelles causes ont fait avorter les tentatives qu'on a fait jusqu'à ce jour pour le rétablissement de la monarchie en France, mais j'indiquerai les caractères indispensables que doivent avoir les projets de même genre, pour que l'on puisse s'en promettre quelques succès.

“L'espoir de rétablir la monarchie est fondée sur l'attachement général des François à leur ancienne constitution. Il trouve un puissant appui dans le mécontentement général qu'occasionne l'oppression du gouvernement actuel.

“On a pu croire d'abord que les vrais zélateurs de la monarchie, excités par tous les moyens possibles, et réunis à la foule des mécontents, détermineroient par la force de l'opinion un retour à l'ancien état. On s'est convaincu depuis que les zélateurs les plus ardents n'ont pas une action suffisante, qu'ils sont difficiles à diriger, et que le concours des mécontents ne coïncide pas au même but, ce qui forme une diversion aussi dangereuse dans le succès que dans les revers.

“Tout ce que l'expérience dans ces essais a produit d'avantageux pour la cause de la monarchie, c'est qu'on apprit que l'esprit général en France est porté vers l'état monarchique. Il est impuissant pour rétablir cet état, mais si l'on y parvient, il est prêt à éclater pour y donner son assentiment. On doit observer d'autre part que le développement de cet esprit, s'il précède l'état monarchique, ne peut qu'augmenter les difficultés de rétablir le trône ; puisque c'est un puissant avertissement aux usurpateurs de l'autorité. Je vois dans cette prématuration la cause qui a renversé jusqu'à ce jour tous les projets monarchistes.

“ La première condition pour le rétablissement du trône est dans le silence de l'opinion. Il suivra de ce principe que le peuple restera étranger au mouvement, et que le remplacement du trône sera fixe et d'un coup de main. Sans doute pour le succès d'un tel mouvement, il faut le concours de quelque chef puissant. Sans doute encore il faut des agens qui forment avec ce chef une confédération. A cette confédération enfin sont nécessaires tous les moyens possibles de sûreté et d'action.

“ Tout ce qu'on pourra dire sur un plan de cette espèce se réduit à ce mot. Il faut un chef qui puisse et qui sache former sa confédération ; carte blanche—voilà son pouvoir.

“ Quel obstacle peut éprouver le rétablissement du trône en France ?

“ L'opinion publique est prête en tous tems à le réclamer, encore mieux à le recevoir. Le Corps Législatif est d'une nullité absolu, reste le Directoire et les armées. Des cinq Directeurs, si l'un devient le chef du projet, il ne reste à écarter que ses quatre collègues. Paralyser l'action de quatre individus, les éloigner, les séparer, rendre physiquement impossible leurs délibérations, n'est pas une tentative hors de la portée de l'un des Directeurs. C'est la seule chose nécessaire pour proclamer sans contradiction le rétablissement de la Monarchie.

“ Pour déterminer l'attitude des armées on les désorganisera en destituant les chefs et officiers. On nommera soudain, mais par un autre acte, quelques chefs convenus desquels on sera sûr, avec pouvoir de replacer tous les autres dans leur grade, à la change du serment de fidélité.

“ L'administration de l'intérieur ne souffrira pas de suspension si l'on employe à changer ses rapports les moyens indiqués pour l'armée.

Lettres patentes du Roi, portant nomination de Commissaire pour le rétablissement de la monarchie, données à M. . . .

“ Louis par la Grace de Dieu Roi de France et de Navarre, à tous ceux qui ces présentes verront, salut.

“ Appelé par notre naissance et par l'ancienne constitution de l'état à nous imposer le fardeau du gouvernement François ; persuadé que le premier et le plus essentiel devoir qui nous est commandé à ce titre est celui de rétablir le bonheur de nos peuples en mettant un terme à la succession de calamités qui leurs est ouverte depuis les principes de la Révolution ; prévenus que nos bons et fidèles sujets, qui forment la presque totalité des habitans de notre royaume, n'attendent que la déclaration de notre ferme et stable volonté pour concourir avec nous à cet important objet ; Nous, de l'avis de notre conseil, et de notre certaine science, légitime puissance, et autorité royale, voulons, et nous plait, disons, déclarons, et ordonnons ce qui suit.

Art. 1°. “ Dans le délai de six mois à compter de ce jour, le rétablissement de la monarchie sera proclamée en notre nom dans toute l'étendue du territoire François compris entre ses limites reconnues avant l'ouverture de la guerre actuelle.

Art. 2°. “ La même proclamation sera étendue au territoire qui se trouvera lors occupé par les armées ou par les autorités Françaises, sans tenir à conséquence, et sans préjudicier aux anciens traités du royaume.

Art. 3°. “ Nommons pour notre commissaire spécial à l'effet de préparer, exécuter, et maintenir la susdite proclamation par tous moyens convenables, et qui seront à sa disposition, Notre très cher et féal

. auquel nous donnons par ces présentes tout pouvoir à l'effet ci-dessus, même de nommer et s'adjoindre tel nombre d'autres commissaires qu'il jugera convenable, et de ne suivre dans le mouvement ordonné que ce qu'il croira conforme à la raison de l'état. Les dits commissaires adjoints seront tenus de faire enregistrer leur brevet de nomination dans le délai de trois jours à peine de nullité.

Art. 4. “ Nous mettons à la disposition de notre commissaire spécial la somme de 1,500,000 livres, à prendre sur les caisses qui lui seront indiquées lors de la remise des présentes en ses mains ; et ce pour les frais du mouvement.

Art. 5. “ Après la proclamation faite de nostre autorité dans toute l'étendue de notre royaume ou dans partie d' défendons à tous juges, cours de justice, et autres autorités quelconques de prendre, sous aucun prétexte et dans aucun cas, connoissance des faits qui ont précédé depuis l'origine de la révolution, qui précéderont ou accompagneront le rétablissement ci-dessus ordonné de notre monarchie, en tant que les dits faits seroient directement ou indirectement relatifs à notre dit commissaire spécial, ou aux autres commissaires qu'il se sera adjoint ; déclarons celui ou ceux qui voudroient en prendre connoissance, ennemis de notre personne sacrée ; ordonnons, le cas y échéant, qu'ils soyent poursuivis comme coupables de haute trahison et de lèse-majesté.

Art. 6. “ Engageons notre autorité et parole royale à maintenir pour toujours et en tout lieu de notre obéissance la sûreté, la liberté, et la tranquillité de notre dit commissaire spécial et de ses commissaires adjoints ; même d'employer efficacement notre puissance et médiation s'il y a lieu pour leur sûreté et liberté en pays étranger.

Art. 7. “ De même manière garantissons à notre commissaire spécial et à ses commissaires adjoints l'entière liberté et immunité des droits et des biens par eux acquis ou possédés dans l'étendue de notre royaume et pais actuellement occupés par les Francois, encore qu'il en fut autrement ordonné par les loix anciennes, ou par les loix à venir auxquelles il est expressément dérogé par ces présentes, renonçant expressément à ceux des dits biens et droits qui serroient dépendans de nos domaines, et nous portant fort pour la cession de tous autres si le cas requiert.

Aug. 8. "Voulant donner en outre à notre dit commissaire spécial et à ses commissaires adjoints un témoignage particulier de notre satisfaction et bienveillance, ordonnons que dans un mois au plus tard du rétablissement de la monarchie proclamée dans notre ville de Paris par le sus-dit commissaire spécial, il lui sera payé à la présentation des présentes, sur sa simple quittance, et sans autre ordonnance, controle, ni visa, à titre d'indemnité personnelle la somme de - - - - 10,000,000 livres, et pour répartir à ses co-opérateurs, ce que nous confions entièrement à son jugement et honneur, une autre somme de - - - - 2,000,000 livres, ce qui fait en total la somme de - - - - 12,000,000 livres.

Art. 9. "La somme totale ci-dessus sera payée en espèces sonnantes et au titre actuel, par notre trésorier principal sur les fonds destinés à notre personnel; la perception ou le recouvrement en seront exercés concurremment sur toutes les caisses de l'ordinaire et de l'extraordinaire de nos finances, et par privilège à tout autre paiement.

Art. 10. "Les présentes ne seront sujettes à aucune sorte d'enrégistrement, et non obstant, vaudront comme déclaration et ordonnance relatifs aux besoins de notre personne."

"Le commissaire spéciale répondra qu'il reçoit les lettres patentes de S[a] M[ajesté] en date du . . ., qu'il accepte la commission spéciale qui lui est donnée. Il témoignera sa reconnaissance pour tous les autres de bienveillance dont il est l'objet."

Copie de la lettre de David, adressée le 7 Mars au Roi à Mittau, et remise à M. le Comte de Panin.

"Votre agent confidentiel Louis Fauche Borel, porteur d'un billet écrit et signé de la main de V[otre] M[ajesté], qui lui servoit de lettre de créance, m'a engagé à me charger d'ouverture pour le rétablissement de la monarchie en France; la négociation a été ardemment suivie, elle a développé un plan bien conçu, une exécution facile; elle étoit conduite par des agens de toute confiance, il ne restoit plus qu'à engager par écrit deux hommes dont la foi pouvoit être équivoque, lorsqu'un mal-entendu a changé la forme de vos ordres nécessaires à cet objet.

"J'avois demandé à V[otre] M[ajesté], Sire, la confirmation des pouvoirs qui m'avoient été transmis; au lieu de cela, ces mêmes pouvoirs demandés ont été accordés à M. le Duc de Fleury; alors mon rôle étoit interverti. Je devenois l'agent de l'homme auprès duquel je m'étois présenté au nom de V[otre]

M[ajesté.] M. le Duc et moi n'avons pu nous entendre. J'aurais eu l'honneur, Sire, de porter mes expressions devant V[otre] M[ajesté,] j'y aurois accompagné les deux amis qui m'ont engagé et secondé dans cette difficile entreprise, si l'on n'avoit arrêté tout passeport qui auroit pu nous être délivrés. Mais l'on s'est trompé, Sire, si l'on a cru que rien puisse me dispenser d'accellerer la négociation que j'ai commencée, ni détendre incessamment à son exécution.

“Le bonheur de votre empire, la tranquillité de l'Europe, le sort entier de l'humanité paroissent attachés, Sire, au rétablissement de votre trône. V[otre] M[ajesté] retrouvera, je retrouverai moi-même des co-opérateurs partout où il y a des hommes capables de penser. J'ai crû arriver à un terme prochain et heureux en donnant pleine connoissance de l'affaire au Général Pichégru, livrant ensuite d'après son avis la négociation à des hommes d'état, et à un Prince magnanime (l'Empereur de Russie) qui seuls dans ce moment peuvent vous transmettre nos vœux et nos pensées. Le tems presse, il m'est difficile de ménager de nouvelles temporisations, laissez approcher auprès de V[otre] M[ajesté] Sire, le sujet très fidèle (M. le Marquis de la Maisonforte) qui a obtenu une fois votre bienveillance et qui a partagé mes travaux. Il vous expliquera les détails que je ne puis expliquer moi-même. Il est autant que moi l'homme nécessaire à l'opération, sa discrétion extrême, sa modestie l'ont empêché de vous demander des pouvoirs, l'intérêt de V[otre] M[ajesté] m'oblige de vous supplier de la lui accorder. Non, Sire, ne chargez point auprès de moi de vos volontés des hommes qui ne m'entendent pas, si du moins V[otre] M[ajesté] consent que je tente à l'acheminer vers le trône. Consentez, Sire, que vos sages volontés me parviennent par cet ami, c'est mon co-opérateur. Cet ami n'a comme moi d'autre désir que de mériter sa place dans sa propre estime et de fuir le champ de l'intrigue.” Copy.

Enclosure 2.

NOTE BY GENERAL DE STAMFORD.

Quelques considérations relatives à un certain projet présenté à Louis XVIII.

1799, April 12. Berlin.—“On a raison, sans doute, d'être continuellement en garde contre les ruses et les artifices du Gouvernement François. Trop d'exemples nous fait voir combien il peut être dangereux de ne pas user d'une extrême circonspection à cet égard.

“Cependant, comme la proposition faite à Louis XVIII. par l'agent de Paris, ne renferme rien qui autorise à soupçonner la sincérité de son commettant, il semble que ce seroit pousser trop loin la défiance que d'imaginer que ce dernier, en feignant de vouloir rétablir le trône en France, voit dans cette ruse un nouveau moyen de consolider son usurpation.

“ Mais, en admettant même que telles puissent être ses vues, on ne voit pas qu'en donnant suite aux négociations entamées en son nom, il puisse en résulter quelque chose de fâcheux pour Louis XVIII. puisqu'elles ne sauroient compromettre ni son honneur, ni sa dignité. Sans doute que la rentrée de ce prince en France seroit accompagnée de plusieurs difficultés, et de très grands risques, mais on trouvera assez de moyens de les écarter et de pourvoir à la sûreté de sa personne, si jamais les choses peuvent être amenées jusqu'au point de rendre ces moyens nécessaires.

1°. “ On peut attendre de la justice et de l'âme généreuse de Louis XVIII. que ce prince ne quittera pas l'asile dont il jouit dans les états de l'Empereur des Russies, sans s'être engagé envers ce monarque magnanime, par un acte formel, de rendre à la France les limites qu'elle occupoit avant la Révolution, et de rétablir dans leurs propriétés, privilèges, et droits légitimes les princes qui, avant cette époque, avoient des possessions situées dans les états du royaume de France.

2°. “ Comme les Païs-Bas, depuis la démolition de leurs places frontières, sont de tous côtés ouverts et sans défense du côté de la France, on croit que l'on ne sauroit trouver injuste la demande qu'il soit stipulé dans l'acte ou traité susdit, que telles et telles places de la frontière Française, comme Condé, Valenciennes, Lille, Dunkerke, seront livrées au souverain des Païs-Bas, à condition qu'elles recevront des garnisons composées de troupes de celles des Puissances qui seront garantes du traité, bien entendu, qu'elles n'y resteront que le tems nécessaire au relèvement des fortifications des places qui autrefois formoient la frontière militaire des Païs-Bas, au nombre desquelles seront probablement Tournai, Courtrai, Menin, Ypres, Charleroi, Mons. On pourra fixer par le traité le tems qui sera jugé indispensable au rétablissement des dites forteresses, après l'échéance duquel les places appartenantes à la France, qui n'auront possédées que comme un gage de bonne foi et de sûreté, lui seront fidèlement restituées dans le même état où on les aura reçues ; à moins qu'à l'égard de Dunkerke on ne soit convenu d'avance de quelque autre arrangement que l'Angleterre, en vertu d'anciens traités avec la France, auroit été en droit d'exiger.

3°. “ Ce qu'on vient de proposer à l'égard de ces places dans l'article précédent semble être une précaution indispensable pour la sûreté même de Louis XVIII. puisqu'elle met les Puissances ses amies à portée de lui porter des secours, dans le cas où des troubles imprévus, qui compromettroient sa sûreté à l'époque de sa rentrée en France, lui feroient un besoin de leur assistance. Mais une autre précaution, non moins indispensable que la précédente, et qui devra nécessairement précéder le mouvement dans Paris, c'est que celui qui imprimera et dirigera ce mouvement, devra avoir trouvé moyen, sous quelque prétexte que les circonstances lui fourniront aisément, de faire passer dans le Brabant une armée composée de troupes et de chefs qu'il saura portés pour le rétablissement de la monarchie et de l'ordre en France.

" Cette armée confiée au commandement du Général Pichégu, dont les dispositions, le courage, et les talents militaires sont connus, conduira le roi à Paris, pendant qu'une autre armée, des Puissances amies de ce monarque, s'avancera pour prendre possession des places dont il a été parlé à l'article second.

4° " Tout cela se liant parfaitement aux idées que l'auteur de ces considérations a eu l'honneur de communiquer à M. de Grenville dans sa lettre du 9 de Mars, il est évident de quelle importance il seroit pour la réussite du projet dont il s'agit ici, qu'on effectuât une descente dans les provinces de Frise et de Groningue, qui s'opéreroit avec facilité à une époque convenue, qui seroit celle où les troupes Françaises auroient entièrement évacué la Hollande pour se joindre à l'armée royaliste dans la Belgique. Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 25. Harley Street.—" Par les lettres que j'ai reçu de Berlin, je vois que notre concert avec la Prusse recule au lieu d'avancer, et qu'à Petersbourg on prend trop d'humeur, et un ton qui ne servira qu'à resserrer les liens de la Prusse avec la France. Cette conduite de la Cour de Russie est très impolitique, et je crois que c'est encor les intrigues de Cobentzel qui nous poussent à ces imprudences. De Hambourg on me marque qu'on mit un embargo sur tous les vaisseaux Hambourgeois dans tous les ports de Russie. Que veut dire cette incartade? Je ne le comprend pas.

" Si vous avez quelque nouvelle de Vienne et de Petersbourg faite moi la grace de me les communiquer. Je désire sur tout de savoir l'état de la santé du Prince Bezborotko."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, April 26. Harley Street.—" Je viens de voir notre ami Starhemberg, qui m'a dit avoir aprit d'Almeida que le Comte de la Marque est entré au service du Portugal. Quoique beau-frère de Starhemberg, celui-ci avoue qu'il en est aussi étonné qu'affligé pour la bonne cause, car son beau-frere n'est qu'un intrigant, perdu de mœurs, et qui n'a ni foi ni loi. Je puis vous assurer aussi que le Comte de la Marque est un sujet exécrable, qui a été l'ami et le compagnon des débauchés du Duc d'Orléans le guillotiné, et l'ami intime de Mirabeau, et de l'évêque d'Autun. Comment peut-on confier quelque commandement à un tel homme? Il ne cessera d'intriguer dans tous les sens, et ce sera un homme très dangereux à Lisbonne. Après ce que je connois de cet homme, et ce que m'a confirmé Starhemberg, je crois devoir de vous en avertir."

Postscript. “Je vous envoie le brouillon de ma dépêche d'aujourd'hui. Si vous l'approuve, elle partira ce soir ; si non, elle ira avec les corrections que vous jugerai à propos de faire.”

PAUL I., EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, to M. MOURAVIEFF, Russian Minister at Hamburg.

1799, April 26. St. Petersburg.—“En conséquence de votre rapport que Nous venons de recevoir aujourd'hui sur l'effet qu'a produit sur le sénat et les habitants de la ville de Hambourg, la nouvelle du séquestre qui a été mis sur leurs batiments marchands qui se trouvent dans les ports de notre empire, Nous vous prescrivons de déclarer au Sénat de Hambourg, que les mesures prises par Nous contre la ville de Hambourg, résultaient de, et devaient mettre fin à celles qui ont été prises, et ont journellement eu lieu dans cette ville contre la tranquillité des autres états ; et que la ville de Hambourg, de ville commerçante, est devenue un nid des mal-intentionnés, et un refuge de toute espèce de vagabonds, qui veulent se soustraire à la justice, et qui, pour avoir seulement du pain, sont prêts de tout entreprendre. D'après ces raisons notre bienveillance et notre protection ne peuvent être restorées à la ville de Hambourg avant qu'elle ne détruise le club nommé la Société Philantropique, et qu'elle n'ait livré au Ministre Britannique, ou encore mieux à son gouvernement, les rebelles Irlandais qui y ont été arrêtés, et parmi lesquels se trouve aussi Napper Tandy. D'une autre part, Nous avons vu avec plaisir par votre rapport, que l'envoyé Français Marragon a quitté Hambourg.” Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to His Royal Highness the DUKE OF YORK.

1799, April 26. Cleveland Row.—“The King having been graciously pleased to approve of Lord William Bentinck, whom I had humbly recommended to His Majesty to proceed with a mission in His Majesty's name to the Austrian and Russian army in Italy, it has occurred to me that some advantage might possibly arise if your Royal Highness saw no impropriety in his having the local rank and letter of service of a Major-General on the Continent. This idea has not been suggested to me by Lord William Bentinck, but occurred to me in fixing the rate of his allowances. But as its decision must in the first instance rest entirely with your Royal Highness, with whom it would also lie to receive His Majesty's pleasure upon it, I have not thought myself at liberty to mention the subject to His Majesty till I knew whether the proposal met your Royal Highness's approbation.” Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, April 30. Berlin.—“The unremitted work of three days has so completely exhausted my mind and pen that I cannot add to my despatch as much as I should naturally wish to do upon so important a subject. What I have sent you is the result of the attack which I told you in my last private letter I should once again make upon the hopes and fears of Count Haugwiz; and though I cannot boast of sending you all that I wished, yet I confess I think that there is ground enough for very serious consideration of this project at London, unless it be that my constant desire of working out the salvation of Holland inclines me to look with too much partiality to every possible project which seems to offer any chance of success there. I do not however disguise to myself the difficulties that hang upon it. In the first place Haugwiz himself may have over-calculated his influence, and may not be able to obtain the king's consent to this project; he may seek only to divert the storm which he fears from Russia by engaging us in a negotiation which would ensure our efforts in mediation with Russia; he may feel the necessity of arming against the menaces of Russia, and wish to engage us in furnishing that first expense, leaving afterwards to events to determine what shall be the direction given to that force. He evidently thinks, however, that he can obtain a positive engagement on the part of the King to name by a secret article the day on which he will begin military operations; and, if this point be distinctly obtained, I own that I attach so much importance to it as to think that much should be sacrificed to obtain it; and if the King of Prussia is once engaged in hostilities with France for the recovery of Holland, I think one may trust that the most advantageous military steps will be taken by Prussia as far as is consistent with her own safety. The construction to which this is liable leaves certainly a door open to fraud, and they may refuse the enterprise of Holland under a description of difficulties the truth of which we may not admit; but, if on the 15th of July they bind themselves to begin military operations to rescue Holland, I do not think we run an unreasonable risk in not specifying beforehand the precise line of operations which is to be followed; but it certainly is of the highest importance that the engagement to begin military operations be clear beyond the possibility of doubt, dispute, or cavil, and so it is understood between Count Haugwiz and myself. I have however most earnestly to entreat you to send back such a secret article as would meet your ideas upon this subject, because I distrust my own pen on a point where the choice of diplomatic words may decide upon the advantage or disadvantage of the whole subject. In the case too of the idea being pursued, I must beg some assistance as to the military terms of the treaty of subsidy, of which I know nothing.

"You will see what my object was in shortening the term or extending the number of men, in as much as it gives us for our 1,200,000*l.* 60,000 men instead of 35,000; and I cannot teach myself to doubt that, before December, Holland may be itself again, and may be enabled to assist in the charge of such Prussian garrisons as may be wanted there during the winter. Haugwiz has suggested to me the idea of our employing also the Dutch money in our English funds, for raising Dutch troops, in like manner as he says we employ Swiss money for raising regiments in Switzerland; but, as I know nothing of that transaction, I could only say that I doubted whether any such existed. Upon the project of Holland, Haugwiz has likewise had a great deal of conversation with the P[rince] of Orange, who seems much inclined to believe them here in earnest upon the subject; and it is most certain that all accounts concur in proving beyond a doubt that even a demonstration from hence would be sufficient now to do the business in that country.

“With respect to the King of Prussia’s beginning by demanding the evacuation of Holland, instead of declaring war, so far from objecting to it, I think it in every respect the best and wisest course which could be followed, because it takes the strong ground of a pre-existing engagement to which this King of Prussia succeeded with his crown, and there can be but little doubt that such a summons to the Directory will be as effectual a declaration of war as any which could be adopted. I have sometimes been apprehensive, it is true, that the uncertainty which they are studious to build round their march to Holland might likewise be extended to the publication of this summons, and that if any military motives be alleged in July against marching to Amsterdam they may be alleged for delaying likewise the manifesto of summons; but, on the other hand, if they are engaged to military operations on that day, why should we fear that the Duke of Brunswick will see military difficulties with as feeble an eye as he has shewn in his political speculations; and what motive can induce him at that time to propose any other military operation than that which has always in these last months seemed to engross both his thoughts and his wishes. The better however to ensure this point I shall lose no time in employing General Stamford, who has latterly been occupied in establishing the correspondence which we want with Flanders through M. de la Palue, nephew to M. de la Rivière the minister from Saxony. I believe I have forgot to say that I have authorised General Stamford to offer to him as far as 200*l.* for six months’ correspondence, which you will then judge whether you ought to renew. I hope that, if you approve of our projected convention, you will follow it up by trying to unite the force of Denmark with us, and to combine the internal measures in Holland and Flanders which must be ready to co-operate for the July manifesto; and, above all, I trust that you will assist the wording of the convention if it takes place, as I do really distrust my pen both in the diplomatic and the military terms to be discussed.

“I have every reason to think that Haugwiz will pursue the last project of negotiation as proposed by you if this subsidy convention should fail. I have seen in him upon this a great desire to extend the mutual guaranty to the Elector of Hanover and of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse and other German princes. I presume this is meant to include the Elector Palatine for the sake of Bavaria, and I told him that I saw his object, but that I did not see any difficulty in our adopting that principle of the integrity of the German empire which Austria had itself adopted in disclaiming all indemnities on that side; and I reminded him that this principle must likewise put an end to all those projects of secularisation which Prussia had, as I thought, given too much countenance to at a time when establishments had great value as being such, without any other reference to the question; and I further said that, although it would be idle to ask a mutual guaranty from the lesser German princes, I did not know but that it might be worth considering whether the great Powers might not extend to these lesser princes the benefit of that guaranty, which might prove a useful security to the established governments of Europe. I have seen likewise in Count Haugwiz an inclination to doubt the advantage of Prussia (without navy) giving guaranty to our insular possessions; whether he is embarrassed in this view about the Cape and Ceylon I know not, but more than once he has said our navy is our best guaranty to our insular possessions, and he had questioned the propriety of Prussia proffering to defend what she could not reach. I have hitherto contented myself by treating that objection lightly, and I have asked whether he thought our guaranty to Poland would not be worth something in spite of the distance which separated us. I must not quit this subject without reminding you that if this proposal of guaranty, as stated in your despatch No. 15, is to be pursued, some communication should be made by you upon it to Petersburg, in order that Count Panin may be instructed to co-operate in it; they leave him at present entirely without any communication whatever, and he is so disgusted that he has written for leave to go to Carlsbadt for his health."

DUTCH AFFAIRS.

"Une personne distinguée arrivant de la Hollande, où elle a passé dix mois avec tous les gouvernans et généraux Français, dit que tous ces derniers n'avaient qu'une manière uniforme de penser, laquelle était qu'aucune coalition ne les effrayerait tant qu'ils conserveraient pour allié la Prusse, et que Siéyès leur répondait de ce Cabinet. Mais qu'armées et gouvernans se croiraient perdus, si elle se mettait contre'eux. Ces informations ajoutent que parmi tous les généraux qui agissent dans ce moment-ci, Joubert serait le plus redoutable par ses moyens, ses talens, et son caractère; mais qu'heureusement le Directoire en a eu peur, et l'a dégouté par des passe-droits.

"La même personne a vu l'état des revues des troupes qui se trouvait en Hollande au mois de février, lequel n'allait pas au delà de 12,166 hommes; et les Français en ont depuis retiré pour les envoyer sur le Rhin. Tous les habitans sans distinction rappellent et désirent aujourd'hui leurs anciens maîtres."

His Royal Highness the DUKE OF YORK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 1. Horse Guards.—“I have to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship’s letter of the 26th instant, proposing that Colonel Lord William Bentinck should, in consequence of his proceeding with a mission in His Majesty’s name to the Austrian and Russian armies in Italy, have the local rank and letter of service of a Major-General. I should have infinite pleasure in attending to your Lordship’s wishes upon this, as well as upon all other occasions, and I should not hesitate in taking his Majesty’s pleasure upon the subject in question, was I not decidedly of opinion that the advantages which would result to Lord William Bentinck from holding the local rank of Major-General during the continuance of His Majesty’s mission are not such as would counterbalance the inconvenience which the service might eventually suffer from the establishment of a similar precedent.”

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, May 1. London.—“Une lettre de Whitworth m’annonce l’embargo sur les navires Hambourgeoises, sans que l’on connut à Petersbourg les motifs de cette résolution subite et violente. De Vienne j’ai la douleur d’apprendre la maladie de l’Archiduc Charles, que l’on cachoit au public. Un de nos courriers l’a vu à Stockach, où l’on disoit qu’il se portoit mieux. La première colonne Russe est arrivée à Padoue le 10. Le parti de Schimmelman, Connich, triomphe à un tel point que si l’on ne parvient pas à y porter remède, bientôt nous en serons à des extrémités. La flotte de Breste est sortie forte de 18 à 19 vaisseaux. Lord Bridport est à leur poursuite. Apparemment qu’ils sont destinés ou pour l’Irlande, ou pour le Portugal. Ce n’est que cet alternatif qui nous est embarrassant.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 1. Harley Street.—“Je vous envoie la lettre de Krudener de Copenhague qu’on vient de déchiffrer dans ce moment.

“Le Vice-Amiral Macaroff, qui est venu ici hier et repart demain pour Sherness, a reçu aujourd’hui un ordre de l’Empereur dont il m’a donné la copie. Je l’ai fait traduire pour vous en Français. Cet ordre, qui est assez curieux, vous fait voir au moins le motif de ce qu’on fait chez nous contre la ville de Hambourg. J’ai besoin de vous voir pour ce sujet, et je vous prie de me fixer un quart d’heure dans la matinée de demain, avant ou après le cercle de la Reine.”

Enclosure.

PAUL, EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, to VICE-ADMIRAL MAKAROFF.

1799, Mars 21. St. Petersburg.—“Ayant depuis quelque tems remarqué le penchant de Hambourg vers les principes d'anarchie et le gouvernement des usurpateurs Français, Nous vous ordonnons de saisir comme bonne prise tous les vaisseaux marchands et autres qui leur appartiennent, et de les envoyer sous convoi dans nos ports." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, May 3. Cleveland Row.—“My faith in Fauche and his negotiations is not, nor ever will be, great. I have seen and known them too long to trust for one moment to their visions. My despatch of to-night will show you that I am not insensible of Stamford's merits, though in truth I know not how to set about rewarding them. The suggestion of his going to Petersburg is, however, Woronzow's, and I think it is a very good one; for Whitworth would be staggered by the first of the many solid objections which may be urged against this plan. But were there no objections to be made when Cæsar marched into Italy, or the Duke of Marlborough into Bavaria? The first great point must be to persuade Stamford himself that the scheme is practicable, and then I doubt not that he will easily succeed in persuading a set of people who will probably not know much of the matter.

“Of all the difficulties, that of transports is the greatest; but we have as you see undertaken to surmount it, and I am confident we shall do so, and that in the course of a fortnight or three weeks, we shall have enough, in readiness to sail, to carry a first division of 15,000 men, and in my conscience I believe that these 15,000 men would do the business.

“There is little probability that the sailing of the Brest fleet will disturb these plans. If they have common sense they are gone to Ireland, and if they are gone there they are, I trust, inevitably destroyed. Lord Bridport is gone off Cape Clear, and no body of troops that they can land will do lasting mischief in Ireland, though it may lead Lord C[ornwallis] as long a march as the last. If accounts received today are to be believed, they have but 3,000 troops on board. This is utterly inconsistent with the idea either of Ireland or Portugal, and can mean nothing but a project to unblock Cadiz, or to relieve Bonaparte. Both of them pretty hazardous undertakings!

“They are said to be eighteen of the line. Lord Bridport had sixteen and five more have sailed successively to join him. Lord Keith is supposed to have seventeen off Cadiz, and Lord St. Vincent has in the whole under his command thirty (including Lord Keith's) besides Turks and Russians, who, though I suppose not worth much, are probably as good as many of the French ships.

“It has occurred to me that Prussia, if she wants an excuse to change her mind (not otherwise) might be tempted to increase her forces, according to her own proposal, on receiving not money but a mortgage on Holland; that is a promise that in the event of Prussia's acting, and of Holland being restored, the expenses of the previous preparation should be defrayed by the United Provinces. Would it not be worth while for you to try whether anything can be made of this idea?

"With respect to your Hamburg project I do not know whether you ever adverted to the circumstance that Holstein is not within the line of the Prussian neutrality, as marked on Chanchard's map by themselves, and transmitted here by Lord Elgin.

"As to the question you ask about yourself, my despatch of to-night is the answer to it. I am confident you will not feel a wish to come away from the place where you are, little agreeable as it is, while you can contribute (as you can in this instance most essentially) to the execution of a plan which promises so much in its results. The effect of your residence at Berlin really is to bring England just ten days nearer both to Petersburg and Vienna.

"With respect to the latter place I am turning in my mind a plan for a change there, and I am confident it can hardly be for the worse, so much has Eden put himself into the hands of Thugut, and thereby rendered himself worse than useless." Copy.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 5. [Stowe.]—"I am indeed most anxious to see you, but I cannot yet prevail upon myself to break in upon that relaxation from constant anxiety that has pressed so much upon me, and that endears my own fireside so dearly to me; but I fear that, in the course of fourteen days, I must set my face towards London. Your account of the Arch-Duke Charles has damped my hopes of seeing the blow followed up most vigorously in Switzerland; conceiving as I do that it is more than possible that, in the course of this summer, not one Frenchman will be left in lower Italy, supposing always that the Swiss game is fortunately and warmly pushed; but I am equally pleased and surprised with your hopes that Alexandria is or will be in our hands, as I will acknowledge that I had formed no such hope, and feared very much that the Brest fleet would—at least in part—have found its way into the Mediterranean, where it would certainly break in upon many of your plans. But it is a very sincere gratification to know that such is the state of our internal defence that we can spare our Channel fleet to follow them wherever they go; and that a competent number of vessels of all sorts will still remain for any unexpected attempt. I cannot persuade myself that they are meant for Ireland, and yet the number (3,000) of troops appear unequal to any serious attempt in the Mediterranean, and unfit for any object of unblocking Cadiz. As to Ireland, you know as well as I do that the appearance of such a fleet would be enough, even without troops, to bring on a serious explosion in the south; but I cannot think that the French will venture it. I will beg you to send me your report from your Secret Committee as soon as you can, as I am very anxious to see it; but as I know that these people just seized in Dublin had great correspondences in England, I wish you to keep it open, till you know from Cooke whether any discoveries have been made that are worth your insertion. Wright the surgeon was the real efficient Director in Dublin; and O'Hanlon, who had been in the Spanish service, is a very intelligent and dangerous man.

"I am delighted with the statute of Henry VIII., and I trust that you will keep Lord Thanet's right hand and that of his friend Ferguson in hot water for some time, before the King in his mercy remits that part of his sentence. I have prepared for Sir William Young, who goes to town on Tuesday, an amendment which I think material to Mr. Pitt's Bill; namely a power to the Attorney-General to file an information out of term before any one Justice of the King's Bench, as of the first day of the ensuing term, against any printer or publisher; and that upon such procedure, of which proper notice shall be given, an injunction shall issue of course to stop all sale of the work till the information shall have been tried. This appears necessary from the constant sale, pendente lite, of prosecuted libels; and the principle is recognised in private prosecutions for pirated books or counterfeit editions, where the injunction issues from Chancery of course."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 6. Harley Street.--"Je vous soumet, d'après votre volonté, ma faible opinion sur la proposition de Thugut. 'Si elle est conforme à la votre, je suis persuadé que vous ne vous contenterez pas d'envoyer vos ordres à ce pauvre Eden, mais que vous dépêcherez, tout de suite, un courrier à Petersbourg pour que le Chevalier Whiteworth explique vos raisons pour le maintien de votre premier plan, et qu'il insiste sur son exécution; car je suis sûr qu'avant de parler à Eden, Thugut en a déjà parlé à Razoumowskoi, et en a écrit à Cobentzel; et je ne puis vous cacher qu'on n'est pas chez nous dans l'habitude de réfléchir sur les affaires, et que tout va avec chaleur, précipitation, et enthousiasme.

"Il est très important pour vous que ce soit les Russes qui soient en Suisse, parcequ'étant joint par vingt milles Suisses que vous voulez lever dans ce pays, vous aurez soixante-cinq milles tout-à-fait dépendants de vous; ce qui ne serat pas si ces vingt milles Suisse se joignent aux Autrichiens, et mes pauvres compatriotes seront inutilement sacrifiés sans pouvoir rien faire sur la rive gauche du Rhin.

"J'ai reçu hier-au-soir trois demandes, coup sur coup, avec un empressement étonant, pour donner un passeport au capitaine Popham pour Revel. Je l'ai envoyé, mais je vous conjure de faire retenir ce capitaine jusqu'à ce que je vous voye, ce qui sera aujourd'hui à deux heures après midi."

MILITARY OPERATIONS AGAINST FRANCE.

“La proposition du Baron de Thugut est très singulière ; ce qu’il propose n’est pas exécutable, même pour les Autrichiens, encore moins pour les Russes, et le motif principal est tellement faux, que lui-même croyant l’appuyer, le renverse par des contradictions manifestes.

“Il veut que les Russes passent le Rhin à Philipsbourg, et se promènent sur la gauche de ce fleuve, ayant de tous cotés des forteresses Françaises que l’Autriche elle-même a livrées au Directoire : il prétend que de là ils pourront faire diversion, et appuyer les Belges bien-intentionnés, oubliant qu’il y a, entre le Bas-Rhin et la Flandre, les places que la France possède sur la Moselle et la Meuse. Comment notre corps de troupes pourra-t-il subsister ? qu’est ce qu’il pourra faire ? il est étranger et aux Allemands de la rive gauche du Rhin, et aux Flammands, anciens sujets de l’Autriche ; au lieu qu’une armée Autrichienne parlera aux Allemands au nom du chef de l’empire, et aux Belges au nom de leur ancien souverain, promettant aux uns et aux autres de les délivrer de leur joug, et le promettant au nom de celui qui est le plus intéressé à leur délivrance.

“Après l’incohérence de la proposition, venons aux contradictions manifestes qu’elle contient en elle-même. Le Baron Thugut dit : ‘que depuis la première fois qu’il exprima son désir que ces troupes fussent employées en Suisse, les circonstances de la guerre étoient considérablement changées ; le gros de l’armée étoit maintenant sur la frontière de ce pays ; les magasins de toute sorte y sont conséquemment transportés : si les Russes y marchent il y aura plus de troupes qu’on ne pourroit y employer dans ce quartier ; on seroit obligé de déplacer l’armée Autrichienne et ses magasins.’ Après avoir établi ces raisons comme victorieuses, il nous jette sur le Bas-Rhin parceque nous arriverons là, je ne sçais d’après quel calcul, trois semaines plus tôt que les Autrichiens ; il oublie, tout d’un coup, que les Russes entrant en Suisse, composeroient un corps de troupes plus qu’il n’en faut, et feroient déplacer les Autrichiens et leurs magasins, et il dit qu’au lieu de ces 45 milles Russes, l’Empereur d’Allemagne s’engageroit d’envoyer une force égale, ou plus s’il étoit nécessaire, pour agir effectivement et de concert avec le Général Hotz pour la délivrance de la Suisse.

“Votre cher Chevalier Eden n’a pas compris ces contradictions palpables ; il n’a objecté que la difficulté de changer une destination déjà fixée ; sur quoi le fin Thugut lui repliqua que c’est pour la convenance mutuelle et pour l'utilité commune qu'il le proposoit ; qu'il croyoit que l'Empereur d'Allemagne, en envoyant un nombre égal de ses troupes pour agir dans la Suisse, étoit [otait] l'objection principale.

“Vous voyez l'incohérence du plan et ses contradictions absurdes, qui n'ont pû échapper au Chevalier Eden que par quelque malheureuse distraction qu'il a eue quand Thugut lui parlait, et quand après il vous rapportoit dans sa dépêche.”

EARL SPENCER TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, May 7. Bath.—“I send you copies of some letters which I have had from Sir Sidney Smith, lest your dispatches from his brother should not contain all the information they convey. I confess I do not much like the accounts of the French penetrating into Syria, and of the disposition of the inhabitants in that country to receive, and of the armies to run away from them.

“I have never seen a copy of the treaty which has actually been signed by the Smiths with the Porte, but I do not know what to make of what appears about it in these, and some former letters. They seem to have entered into stipulations that were not in my contemplation, both with respect to the British force to be employed on the coast of Egypt, and to inviting the French to leave Egypt and return to Europe. Sir Sidney appears to be of opinion that the disadvantages of this latter measure will be done away by their being considered as prisoners of war, but I cannot see it in that light, because the instant they set their foot either in France or Italy, they will make very little scruple of serving either against us or some of our allies ; and, if it was only for the sake of example, I should be extremely sorry that any considerable proportion of that army were ever to return on any conditions.”

Enclosure 1.

COMMODORE SIR W. SIDNEY SMITH TO EARL SPENCER.

1799, March 6. Tigre, off Alexandria.—“I profit of the departure of the Culloden to acquaint your Lordship of my having relieved Captain Troubridge upon this station in pursuance of Lord Nelson's orders. I shall pursue the plan of operations his experience points out to me with this difference, that, according to the measures adopted as the result of the conferences at the Porte, we shall no longer keep the enemy damned up in Egypt, but allow him to evacuate the territory by all means except that of permission to retire with arms in their hands, at liberty to use them elsewhere.

à quitter l'Egypte ? pourquoi pas ? pourvu que les deux empereurs fussent finir la revolte de Passivan Oglou et abandonnent leur projet de se partager la Turquie Européenne ; que, quant à nous, nous ferons tout ce qui pourroit être favorable à l'empire Ottoman, et le mettre à l'abri de ses ennemis. Mais que le préliminaire de toute négociation, comme à tout accomodement, c'est un firman qui fasse relâcher les Français partout où on les a arrêtés, surtout en Syrie.' To this I mean to answer him by his courier now on board (not Beauchamp) that the sense of this article of his instructions being clear, I have only to assure him of my readiness to listen to any reasonable proposition ; at the same time reminding him that his passage back to France depends entirely on the British squadron cruising off Alexandria, and that, according to agreement with the Porte, my passports alone are valables with them, and the Barbary powers, for British prisoners of war. I mention this, thus early, to enable your Lordship to judge of probabilities in this quarter where everything is as yet in embryo, dependent on Turkish armies which may never be what they are promised to be. On n'attrape pas des mouches avec du vinaigre—ainsi je leur offre du miel ; and it is not to Buonaparte alone that I offer this pont d'or, but by other channels indirectly to all individuals of his army. I hope to come at those, by this means, that are out of the reach of our shells ; as for the latter I consider them a surer prey from what I hear." Copy.

Enclosure 2.

COMMODORE SIR W. SIDNEY SMITH to EARL SPENCER.

Private.

1799, March 7. Tigre, off Alexandria.—“ Having received an offer from an Albanian chief to furnish me as many men as I chose on the footing of our marines, I have found myself very fortunate in such a resource at a time when I feel the want of men to land and secure the ports that the enemy would surrender to us, though they would defend them to the last extremity against the Turks for fear of the ill usage their prisoners meet with. I have thus found myself under the necessity of accepting this offer, and have accordingly sent a transport down to bring up some. I shall write officially about this when I have seen the thing realised sufficiently to enable me to speak more positively as to the efficiency of these men, who, it is understood, can row as well as use fire-arms. I shall put them on the Tigre's supernumerary list, rated according to their qualifications. I see no other way of satisfying their officers by a proportionate addition of pay than by bearing as many numbers, after the manner of widow's men, as will make up the proportion ; but for this deviation from the established rule on a supernumerary list, I must have an order from the Admiralty ; further these people require to be paid monthly on the spot, which is a sine qua non it seems. The French troops write on their quarters point d'argent point de soldats, and complain much of being seven months in arrear; thus they will not be able to recruit their army in this way by the Albanians, who, like the Swiss, quit their mountains and the coast of the Morea to serve the neighbouring Pashas for present pay. They are the only people for this sort of service, and if we had a few of them just now, I could profit by the weakness of Aboukir Castle, as announced in Du Muy's letter to Beauchamp, a copy of which is enclosed, and cut off the only channel by which Alexandria receives supplies at present. I have my doubts of the Turkish troops promised arriving in time, or being efficient and active when they do; besides I can only expect to influence them by example, and our own marines are too essential to a cruising ship to be detached for anything but a coup de main; we cannot retain posts with them without having a port to secure the ships in the interim, and there is none on this coast. What we do we must do before the May and June breezes set in, and be already in a fair way to profit by the rise of the Nile to send the flotilla up it. Without that we may correspond, to the right and left, with Gezzar Pasha, Murad Bey, Ibrahim Bey, but we shall never come to blows with enemy I see."

Midnight, secret. "As I am writing to Mr. Forgli, a Turkish ship is come down from the eastward with the letter, of which a copy is enclosed, from our factotum at Acre, which I am enabled to send through Mr. Forgli to your Lordship by the vessel which I am about to dispatch to Zante to bring up some Albanian recruits, now, as your Lordship sees, become more necessary than ever. I have already answered my Acre correspondent, and written again to Gezzar Pacha pointing out what he can yet do to save his capital by constantly harrassing the French rather than risking a pitched battle, and also what I can do on the coast to support him. I have detached the Theseus to the eastward as desired. Captain Troubridge not having any frigates to give me in compliance with my official request to him, has left me the Lion, which I leave off the Western port of Alexandria while I look out on the eastern one, and Rosetta, from whence recent movements indicate an intention in the enemy to send something eastward. You see how insufficient the force at present under my orders, without numbers of small vessels, is for the work in hand. The appearance of our two decks keeps the eight frigates they have in the old port in check; the three French built ones and two Venetians lately coppered there are evidently ready for a start, which corroborates recent intelligence; they would rather go home than go on." Copy.

Enclosure 3.

COMMODORE SIR W. SIDNEY SMITH to EARL SPENCER.

1799, March 8. Tigre, off Alexandria.—"On second thoughts I have, to save time, made my official proposition to the Admiralty to extend the number of Albanians already engaged to three thousand. If they do not like to take our two last as marines, will you get Mr. Windham to state to me the terms which he can allow me to offer these chiefs who offer their services. The Albanians are the Swiss of this part of Europe, and he may have two regiments of a thousand men each to serve in this country if he likes it, on writing me a single line." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, May 8.—“It is now one o'clock in the morning, and I have been the whole day unremittingly employed in enabling myself to forward these despatches to you to-night. You will not therefore expect much of private letter with them, and my great anxiety not to lose another day must explain any inaccuracy or indistinctness that there may be in them. It was a happy day when you first consented to undertake this troublesome and unpromising task, and you will be the happier for it all the days of your life.

“French papers talk of 25 sail of the line and 14,000 troops—sed ego non credulus illis. Every day makes it more and more probable that their destination is to relieve Buonaparte. The curious papers you sent seem to confirm this; we have heard no more of our fleet.” Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, May 9. Berlin.—“Loose and incorrect as the French memorandum was which I enclosed to you in my last despatch, I preferred the sending it in its original terms as written by Haugwiz, because the embarrassment of his views and conduct is better described in the bad French and confused language in which it is written, than by any detailed description of mine. I believe the truth to be that he personally wishes this measure to succeed, and that he has good hopes of accomplishing it, but his natural timidity and anxiety makes him afraid to support by open and unqualified language the opinions which he entertains and the system which he recommends, until he shall have persuaded himself that the small confidential circle of aid-de-camps and secretaries at Potsdam shall be in unison with him. He is therefore eternally struggling through his speculations about his own situation and influence, and as you will have observed, has seldom or ever the courage to pursue a plain and direct line, but seeks to express himself in involved and ambiguous terms in order to avoid being positively pledged and committed upon any precise and determinate object. This disposition is certainly unfavourable to the success of our measure of convention, and increases extremely the difficulties in treating of it, and the doubts which will attach upon the execution of it in case it should be completed; yet, with a very full sense of all these discouragements, and a very sincere wish that it had not fallen to my share to discuss them, I am still so much impressed with the incalculable importance of pursuing through Prussia the successes of this one campaign which may decide the fate of Europe, that I acknowledge I am more ready than in prudence perhaps I ought to be to risk greatly for this great object; and I should not deal fairly with you, if I did not so far put you upon your guard in all that you hear from me upon this subject. Our separate article, such as I have enclosed it in the despatch, was drawn up by Count Panin and myself for Count Haugwiz to carry to the King in order to describe the proposition in question in the manner the most likely to engage the inclination of the King's mind; if it be adopted our course would naturally be to make the whole convention secret in order not prematurely to announce the attack upon Holland, and some immediate guaranty of present possessions and of future security to the United Provinces would naturally make a part of such a convention. I took Count Haugwiz's account of the sum proposed as applying to 60,000 men for six months, but I see upon a closer examination, that at the rate of 80,000*l.* per month for 35,000 men, one million will pay the 60,000 men for six months and will also very nearly defray the fraix de mobilité. The question is whether you will trust the Duke of Brunswick and them with the discretionary power they ask for, of making their march into Holland depend upon their view of the then existing circumstances of the campaign, and whether any Russian force can supply that protection on their left without which they will think 60,000 men too small a force to challenge the hostility of France. You will see that they have sent me a very coarse and stupid note which has given me the trouble of writing them an answer, which you may perhaps think too captious, but which, I think, is scarcely enough so. Their note was written by Struensee and Alvenslaben who are completely adverse to English connection, and Haugwiz, in this as in many other instances, has not courage enough to resist what he has sense enough to disapprove.

"The French faction triumph in the murder of Roberjest and Bonnier by the Austrians; I enclose to you the account as sent here by the Prussian legation, but I would not do the French deputies the honour of naming them in my public despatch. It is undoubtedly a dirty piece of business, and I therefore indulge myself in talking of it as being probably the act of the Directory to get rid of two men who have both been named to succeed in the ensuing vacancy; there is very little truth in this suggestion, but it is better than abusing the Austrians, and the Directory are very little entitled to the benefits of truth and candour."

1799, Avril 27. Rastadt.—"Les Ministres F[rançois] ont donné avant-hièr une protestation contre les démarches des A[utrichiens] concernant la sûreté du congrès, en déclarant qu'ils ne pouvoient plus continuer de traiter à R[astadt,] qu'ils recevroient les propositions de ceux qui voudroient traiter. Un nouvel incident vint les embarrasser. Le courrier ordinaire F[rançois] fut arrêté hiér par une patrouille sur la route de Seltz. On le conduit à Gernsbach, après lui avoir enlevé les dépêches. Les François l'adresserent à la mission Prussienne pour intervenir à obtenir son élargissement, la restitution des dépêches, et la sûreté du passage de la mission sur l'autre rive du Rhin.

R[astadt] le 29 Avril. “ Nous venons de passer une nuit terrible. Le Colonel B[arbaczay] ayant fait sommer hiér les ministres F[rançois] par un officier suivi de Hussards, de quitter R[astadt] dans les vingt-quatre heures, ils résolurent de partir incessamment. C'était à huit heures du soir. Arrêtés pendant une heure à la porte, on leur permit enfin de sortir, mais sans leur accorder l'escorte qu'ils demandoient. A peine parvenus à 500 pas de la ville, une troupe de cavaliers arrête les voitures. On arrache les trois ministres l'un après l'autre, et les massacre à coups de sabre. Bonnier et Roberjeot restent sur la place hachés en pieces. J[ean] de Bry, assailli le premier, quoique criblé de coups, n'ayant pas reçu de blessures mortelles, eut le bonheur d'échapper à la faveur de l'obscurité des mains des meurtriers. Rosenstiehl doit sa vie à son domestique qui eut la présence d'esprit de le jeter malgré lui hors de sa voiture, et le força à prendre la fuite à travers un marais aboutissant au jardin du chateau, où les Hussards ne pouvoient le suivre. Après s'être rendus maitres de tout ce qui se trouvoit d'argent et de précieux dans les voitures, ils les forcerent à retourner en ville.

protégés par une escorte qu'enfin l'on avoit obtenu du Colonel B[arbaczay] lequel, désavouant le fait, témoigna ses regrets dans une lettre.

“On prétend avoir des données non équivoques pour croire que cet attentat n'a pu se commettre sans une autorité supérieure quelconque. On va jusqu'à assurer que le butin fait dans cette occasion, évalué à 60 mille florins, a été partagé parmi les soldats et officiers à la lanterne auberge, située hors de la ville sur la route de Carlsruhe. La majeure partie du Congrès n'eut rien de plus pressé que de partir ensemble, formant un cortège de trente voitures escortés par des Hussards de Bade et de Darmstadt. Nous apprenons que les dépouilles de Roberjeot et Bonnier ont été enterrés hier avec cérémonie à R[astadt].

(2.) Carlsruhe le 2 de Mai.

“M. de Dohm a rédigé un exposé historique des événements qui ont précédé notre départ de Rastadt. On en a fait part, au nom des divers députés assemblés ici, au Margrave de Bade et à l'archiduc Charles. L'étendue de cette piece, aussi détaillée qu'intéressante, et mes occupations m'empêchent d'envoyer la copie à V[otre] E[xcellence]. Les A[utrichiens] se sont saisis de tous les papiers de la mission Française, et l'officier commandant à R[astadt] s'est obstinément refusé à les restituer.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 10. Harley Street.—“Vous verez par ma lettre officielle, et par l'anexe qui y est jointe, qu'il y a quelque mésentendu chez nous par rapport à Kuxhaven, qu'on suppose que vous voulez occuper ; et comme cet endroit appartient à Hambourg, je crois en vérité que nos démarches hostiles contre cette ville ne proviennent du refus que les Hambourgeois ont fait de vous rendre les conjurés Irlandois, et que, soit par les lettres de votre ministre à Hambourg au Chevalier Whiteworth, soit les rapports de celui que nous y avons, on s'est imaginé chez nous que les Hambourgeois étoient des Jacobins fières qu'il falloit punire.

The EARL OF MORNINGTON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 12. Fort St. George.—“ Concluding that you know the whole history of the war in which I have been compelled to engage with Tippoo Sultan, I say nothing of the causes, or first operations of it, but I lose not a moment in transmitting to you the inclosed Gazette, which I know you will read with pride and satisfaction equal to any which I can feel. The event is indeed brilliant, glorious, and substantially advantageous beyond my most sanguine expectation. Dundas or Cabell will furnish you with all such details as I yet have obtained ; they all tend to throw additional lustre on this (in India) unequalled event ; and with all your Duncan's and Nelson's thunder sounding about you, may I not venture to say to you,

“ To you I shall use no disguise, but inform you plainly that the manner in which I have conducted this war has been received with exultation, and even the most unqualified admiration in India ; and (to talk like Lord Abercorn) you will gain much credit by conferring some high and brilliant honour upon me immediately. The Garter would be much more acceptable to me than any additional title, nor would any title be an object which should not raise me to the same rank which was given to Lord Cornwallis. Tippoo Sultan fought better and had a much more efficient army than in the last war ; yet the British army entered Mysore on the 5th of March, and took Seringapatam on the 4th May. In my conscience I believe the army fitted out under my eye, and commanded by General Harris, to be as fine as any in the world. I trust to you not to suffer me to be neglected. If my success at Hyderabad and at Seringapatam, accomplished within less than twelve months, be not merit, I know not what the public service is, and I cannot return to my happy indolence at home too soon.

"I am on the point of departure for Kykottah, and probably from thence I shall proceed to Seringapatam to settle the affairs of Mysore; a task in which I expect more unpleasant pangs from the view of fallen dignity, than real difficulties in practice."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, May 13. Berlin.—"In reading my former despatches you will have seen that I had succeeded in convincing the Minister, but in reading this despatch you will see how little I am for that advanced in the more arduous task of convincing H[is] P[russian] M[ajesty]. While I have worked myself to a lath in working upon the foreign secretary, a round and stupid aid-de-camp who scarcely knows one step beyond the daily parade of the King's guards at Potsdam, works daily upon the easy and undistinguishing ear of the King, and in the voice of this mentor is lost all the hope of the uncommon exertions which were sincerely made by Haugwitz. It is difficult to describe the degree of mortification which Haugwitz seems to have felt in this disappointment, and although he endeavours to conceal it in conversation with me, I see that he is sorely hurt at his being checked and counter-acted upon so important a matter. At other times we have been inclined to think that as much was to be apprehended from Zastrow's influence as from that of Koekeritz, but upon this occasion the opinion of the former is considered as being rather favourable than otherwise to the measure of hostility; and in truth it is not easy to conceive upon what reasoning or with what speculation any reasonable man in Prussia could refuse himself to the conviction of the advantages which belong to the present moment for hostility to France; in the King there is naturally a great indolence, and it is partly by working upon that indolence, and partly by an appeal to the King's conscience as to exposing Prussia to the expense and calamity of war, partly too by profiting of his suspicions towards Austria, and out of that making the new terror of Prussia being alone engaged in war with France, these are said to be the motives which Koekeritz employs; whether on his own part weakly, or corruptly, or both, is a matter much disputed, but successfully as you see by what has so recently passed. With respect to the disappointment of the project, I rest less upon that; because, in truth, there were so many difficulties attending both the drawing up of the treaty and the execution of it, so much opposition to be feared from the Duke of Brunswick having so small a force, so much doubt about succeeding in the obtaining the Russian force, and so much embarrassment in specifying all these conditions of an indistinct and complicated contract, that I have never been enough in love with it to suffer in the loss of it. My thoughts now all centre in the immediate march of [the] Russian force towards the Lower Rhine, and as I am persuaded that they would thus succeed in arriving at Dusseldorf, I cannot but believe their appearance there would tell with sufficient effect in Holland to give complete success to the rising in that country, even if any French troops should remain in it, which is I think by no means certain. I make to myself some scruple of always recurring in my despatches to this project, the repetition of which may be embarrassing to you; but I hear so much of the means which prevail there, I feel so much the importance of the object and the facility of obtaining it, and I dread so much the letting go by a moment so made for acting upon the confidence of our friends and the fears of our enemies, that I cannot in conscience as an honest man restrain my pen from tracing my eager and sanguine hopes on this inviting prospect of success. I do not now see what I can do that is likely to be useful at Berlin, and I am tempted to think that I might do more good by coming and tormenting you all daily with the daily visitations of my fancy upon this subject. Meantime I have concluded a bargain with La Palue through General Stamford; he is a good officer, a very intelligent man, has about 700*l.* per annum of his own, and takes 200*l.* for six months to pay his spies and his communications; he will live at Emerick and Wesel, and if you find he does not answer you may get rid of him. I have drawn upon you for one hundred pounds for him, for which I will send you receipt when I have more time."

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

Secret.

1799, May 13. Dropmore.—"I have examined very attentively the different papers which you have sent, and which I now return, respecting Batavia. They contain two perfectly distinct and even opposite proposals. The one, for a conquest of Java conducted on the same wise and liberal principles on which we have acted at Ceylon and elsewhere, securing to the public the real advantages of the conquest, and protecting (but under British laws and sovereignty) the inhabitants of Batavia (as we protect those of the Cape) in the enjoyment of their property; effectually restraining them at the same time from remitting that property to Holland where it would be at the mercy of our enemies, and would infallibly be put in requisition to be employed against us. The other is, as I conceive, nothing but a proposal from some of the parties concerned in the most scandalous system of fraud and perjury that was ever exposed, that we should by a solemn engagement, and even by an Act of Parliament, cover their transactions in future; and renouncing all advantage from the possession of Java, allowing all its produce to be remitted either in kind, or at least in value, to Holland, undertake the whole expense and loss of its defence.

"Seeing them in this light, I need hardly tell you to which of them my opinion inclines. I have always thought the conquest of Java an object of great importance, and much regretted that the state of our affairs in India did not seem to allow us the means of collecting a force there for that purpose. Captain Popham's papers certainly suggest more reasons in favour of this project than I was before acquainted with, and I by no means think that our views of continental operations for the delivery of Holland ought to prevent or delay the adoption of his plan. If the Stadtholder is restored, one of the greatest difficulties we should have to encounter will be the demand for the restoration of Ceylon and the Cape, which, from what I have already seen, will, I am certain, be pressed upon us by Prussia as well as by the Dutch. It would be a great means of putting this by if we had Batavia and Surinam to restore to them. There is also another consideration that will deserve attention. It is this, that if a counter-revolution takes place in Holland without our having taken steps to secure these points, there is danger of the French or Spaniards being before hand with us there.

Postscript. "You know best what could be done with sepoys, but I have always understood that for the conquest of Java we might procure Malays, and other troops of that description, from Ceylon and the Eastern Islands, which would not feel the same objection as sepoys to naval expeditions, and distant service."

1799, May 16. Berlin.—"Wagstaff's despatches of yesterday from you have so completely occupied me in writing to Whitworth and to the Office, and in arranging all that in conversation could be arranged with Stamford, that I shall with difficulty be able to save the packet if I delay Dietry in writing a long private letter. Stamford is fully impressed with the grandeur of your Russian naval project, and goes with good heart and zeal to Petersburg on Saturday the 18th, where I really think he will do invaluable service in the assistance which his talents and energy will give to support Whitworth in his negotiation. For myself I walk in air, and can hardly reduce my imagination to wait for the progress of the great events which I am confident will arise out of this spirited enterprise. In the midst of this burning fever arrives your second despatch to Whitworth, your laborious and prompt assistance to my convention, and your praise of my successful exertions at Berlin. Your letter to Whitworth I desire him not to regard, but to get by heart the despatch which preceded it. Your projet d'articles and your ready assistance I know not how enough to thank you for; but your praises and congratulations you will already have seen that I have in no degree the smallest pretensions to, and that all I can boast of is that I have managed so as not to make the expectation of my Berlin project retard the better energy of Paul and Petersburg.

"Meantime I must take notice that you have sent me no directions how to forward your last despatch to Sir M. Eden, but as it is important, and moreover not in cipher, I shall send it on this evening by messenger.

"I enclose to you a communication made by Mr. Diemar respecting the person who has the contract at Cuxhaven for victualling our ships. I know nothing of the facts, if they are true he ought to be removed. I send you likewise the last news which I have received from the Prince of Orange, which continues to be very promising. I cannot send you the receipt for La Palue's 108*l.* till the next messenger. Be so good as not to forget the letter from the Stadtholder, to regret his son, and to recommend his interests to the Emperor. Stamford would not take any money here, but wishes to be enabled to draw upon Whitworth for what he may want for his expenses there, and I told him I would desire you to write accordingly.

"I fear there has been strange intriguing against the Archduke, but while he retains the command I still think all will go on well ; and as for the disposition of your 45,000 Russians, I have no doubt but that the Germans may be brought at Vienna to take that position which they wish to be taken on the Rhine, and leave the Russians to advance towards France.

"I am interrupted by receiving a message confidentially from Haugwitz to tell me that he has got Count Finckenstein to unite with him in making a declaration to the King that they will resign if their opinion is not followed in favour of the convention, and he desires to see me on this to-morrow, and to repeat to me the good hopes which he has that he shall succeed. I have sent him word that I will come, but my determination is to tell him that we can no longer suspend for a single day the measures of the campaign in waiting the reluctant and tardy decisions of Berlin, and therefore that nothing short of the immediate acceptance of the proposition can now make it practicable. My messenger shall go to Petersburg to-day ; if they are in earnest here that will be a spur to them, but I cannot and will not recommend to you one moment's delay. The spirit and activity of your last project delights me, and I will not let the cold air of Berlin blow upon it ; if they accept the proposition, I will then act on your last despatch, provided they accept it immediately."

Enclosure.

AFFAIRS OF THE NETHERLANDS.

Extraits de différentes lettres du 7 et 8 Mai.

"Les lettres de la Hollande deviennent tous les jours plus pressantes, et il est sérieusement à craindre de deux choses l'une, qu'il y aura du désordre partiel, mal-dirigé, et sans succès ; ou que les Directeurs actuels, voyant qu'ils ne peuvent plus mener la barque, tenteront une coalition avec le bon parti, parmi lequel il y en aura qui s'y prêteront, voyant qu'il n'y a plus d'autres ressources. Surtout à Amsterdam on paroît assez disposé à cela, et c'est aussi par là que la bombe éclatera s'il y a du désordre sérieux, car depuis que les Anglois bloquent sérieusement les ports et n'y font plus rien entrer, il y a beaucoup d'effervescence.

"Le retard des postes Angloises donne matière à plusieurs conjectures, car malgré que le vent a été favorable, il nous manque dans ce moment trois malles, d'où l'on conclût qu'il doit y en avoir de pris, ou bien que le gouvernement, projetant une expédition, a contremandé toute communication, comme lors de l'entreprise sur les écluses du canal. On prétend qu'ils se sont déjà montrés en force sur les côtes de la Zélande avec beaucoup de vaisseaux de transports.

“ Dans ce moment les Bataves n'ont plus d'autres ressources que de faire venir tout de Bremen par les Wadden ; si les Anglois empêchent cette communication, il pourroit y avoir une famine.

“ Brune, à ce qu'on assure, a déclaré que si le république Batave fut attaquée dans les circonstances présentes, il n'y auroit pas moyen de l'aider, et que par conséquent, on devoit penser à sa propre défense. Ceci doit avoir occasionné le message du Directoire concernant l'augmentation de l'armée. On doute toujours que la réquisition passera, et on la dit même déjà rejetée par la seconde chambre.

“ Pendant mon séjour à la Haye, et en général en Hollande, d'où je suis ressorti il y a quelques jours, j'ai fureté partout, consulté grands et petits, et même un des cinq Directeurs que je puis vous assurer avoir trouvé bien disposé, ainsi que le sont ses confrères. Ils seroient dans leur joie s'ils pouvoient contribuer à nous faire avoir l'orangerie de retour. Je ne crois pas que dans ce moment il y ait un être dans toute la République qui en doute, et sûrement l'unanimité désire un changement ; il n'y a guères de François, et le militaire y est bien disposé ; ce seroit le vrai moment d'entreprendre quelque chose, et, en outre, les villes fortes étant dégarnies de canons et de soldats. Je serois très tenté de croire que, si cela traîne encore, on s'entendra en Hollande pour y prendre des arrangemens entre soi, ainsi gare la maison d'Orange ! C'est à elle d'y penser bien murement ; il n'y aura pas de notre faute, car nous l'avons assez avertie ; si l'heure du berger est passé, il est difficile de la rattrapper ; alors c'est sauvé qui peut.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 17. Harley Street.—“ Voilà deux poste arrivée depuis quatre jours et je n'ai pas de lettre de mon pays. Je crois qu'on s'est imaginé là, qu'aussitôt que j'ai reçu l'ordre de venire à Petersbourg, j'ai pris d'abord la poste, que je suis déjà en route courent com̄e un enragé pour saisir une place dans le ministère. Le Prince Bezborotko est mort le $\frac{6}{17}$ d'Avril, à ce que marquent des lettres particulières reçu dans la cité. Je perds un ami de 31 ans, et ma patrie perd le plus habil ministre qu'elle a jamais eu. C'est une perte irréparable.

“ Si vous avez quelque nouvelle de Petersbourg, faites moi l'amitié de me le communiquer.

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, May 17. Cleveland Row.—“ Many thanks for your trouble about the maps. I will immediately replace the money to your account at Coutts's, and I should be obliged to you to send the maps by degrees as messengers come. I indulge the hope that their arrival will be frequent. I do not at all grudge the expense of the two other maps you have ordered.

“ I have to reproach myself with having omitted to write to you about your own concerns. There cannot be the least difficulty about replacing to you the full amount of your loss, and the only point is to ascertain it. For this the Office must of course refer itself to you, and the mode I meant to follow was to write to you an official letter saying that H[is] M[ajesty] having been pleased to express his disposition to replace to you the amount of your loss sustained, I am to desire that you will transmit to me a statement of the amount thereof as nearly as you can ascertain it. This statement, of course, need only be of a general sum, without the necessity of your specifying so much for the blue and silver and so much for the green and gold. Before I take this step I will wait for your answer to this.

“ These Austrians are really going on at a great rate in Italy, but as much as their armies delight me, so much am I disgusted with their cursed politics. I sometimes start when I think what great generals we are grown with our 40,000 Russians, which Austria wants at Philipsburgh, and Prussia wants at Dusseldorff, and which we are obstinately bent on sending to Basle. But after all one cannot surrender one's common sense to fifty Duke's of Brunswic, or five hundred Thuguts. I think one may venture to pronounce on past experience that if 60,000 Prussians, aided by the debarkation of 20,000 Russians, are insufficient to conquer

Holland, 230,000 are infinitely more so. The former may succeed, but I would forfeit my head if the latter do, for the first operation would stand some chance of being conducted on military principles; the latter would inevitably be nothing more than a political demonstration.

"You will have seen that your Secret Article is in some respects stronger and more explicit than what we had made up our minds to be satisfied with, but I hope you will be able to save us the frais de mobilité. I do not know whether I made myself intelligible in the parallel between the two Subsidy Treaties, but if you will yourself go through the process of the comparison, you will see that nothing is clearer than that [this] is a worse bargain, even so, than the other.

"As for Russian force to cover their left, and the D[uke] of B[runswick]'s fears lest France should do in 1799 what she did not do in 1787, it is all fudge, and deserves no more courtly phrase.

"I am delighted with your note in answer to my old friend Alvensleben, whose style I easily recognise. In truth you must not think it flattering when I assure you soberly and sincerely that I have never received one despatch from Berlin since you got there without seeing fresh cause to admire your judgment and talents, and to lament that you have not given them more frequent occasion to show themselves as they have now done.

"You see, of course, that your coming away while this convention is in question (may I not say while its execution is so?) is not to be thought of. Nor do I think you wish to leave such a work imperfect. The occupation is not always amusing, but the success must, I am sure, already amply repay you.

"God bless you, my dearest brother; you will easily judge the interest that I must feel in continuing to receive such assistance, especially when I am every hour hearing (from everybody who has success (? access) to know anything about it) the strongest expressions of its ability and advantage to the public service."

THE EARL OF MORNINGTON TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 18. Fort St. George.—"I refer you to the packet of Gazettes for the fate of Tippoo Sultan, and I rely on your friendship to see that justice is done to the author of that important event. I am very well; whether you praise or blame, me me adsum qui feci! We have found Tippoo's correspondence with the French in his palace. I am now proceeding to Seringapatam, where I have little doubt that I shall soon be able to settle a good arrangement. The kingdom of Mysore is absolutely at our disposal. I wish you to read my dispatches to the Court of Directors and to Dundas.

"You shall hear from me again soon, if the hot weather does not kill me. We have every reason to believe that the French are established in Egypt."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 19. Berlin.—“As neither of my messengers are returned from Cuxhaven I shall not be able to write to-morrow for Thursday’s packet; in truth, however, as Mr. Cockburn’s immediate departure gives me an opportunity of telling you that nothing new has arisen since my despatch of the 16th, I do not regret the want of a more regular communication. The interview which I expected took place on the 17th; it announced to me some better hopes, but of too uncertain a description to offer any ground of conduct, and I remained after the conversation perfectly satisfied with myself that I had not suffered the expectation of it to delay either of the messengers for one moment. I heard the new hopes with more patience than confidence, and I professed that I now thought no decision here could overtake the arrangements made, or bring back the same shape of things of which there had been question; but that there doubtless would be found in the great objects which still remained for discussion sufficient inducements of another description to enable us to act together as soon as a ready disposition to it should be manifested here. In this shape it now rests. My fellow labourer begins his pilgrimage in a few hours; when I write my next despatch, I will say more to you of his general ideas than I care to do at present, more especially as I can say nothing which is to affect anything you can do in the business before we hear of him; he is more moderate in his view of numbers necessary than you seem to have been in England, but he thinks the short line of communication beyond all measure preferable to the other, and I do most heartily hope that it will, upon examination, be found practicable in every sense of the word. We have no fresh military news; we hear that Rewbell is out of the Direction, but we know not who has succeeded to him in it.”

Enclosure 1.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

1799, May 19. Berlin.—“Although my letter of the 16th instant will, I am sure, have sufficiently interested you in the arrival of General Stamford at Petersburg to ensure to him all the assistance which you are so well enabled to give to him, I cannot nevertheless allow him to begin this journey without taking the liberty of adding to the claim of his eminent talents, whatever you will be so good as to allow to the testimony which I can so well bear to his good qualities and his very amiable manners.

“Attached by opinion only to the cause in which he is engaged, he gives to his exertions in it, at the expense of a feeble state of health, all the powerful faculties of a mind uncommonly ardent and vigorous. It is impossible to know him two days without feeling his value, and though my praise cannot add to it, it will not lessen, I am sure, your good offices and good inclinations towards him.

"It will not be difficult for him through your assistance to have an audience of the Emperor on account of the verbal compliment which he will deliver from the Stadtholder, previous to the letter in question, and it is possible that his audience of the Emperor may have its advantage.

"I would likewise take the liberty of requesting you to introduce him to Captain Popham, if he shall be arrived, or to any other officer with whom it may be useful to him to have communication. And you will likewise forgive me for suggesting that upon a business so pressing both in time and in importance it may be useful to have more frequent recourse to messengers than is done in the ordinary habits of official correspondence.

"The course of the military operations being once concluded upon, General Stamford will be impatient to return to a post where his local information will be peculiarly valuable to the further success of the enterprise for the deliverance of Holland." Copy.

Enclosure 2.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to CAPTAIN POPHAM.

1799, May 19. Berlin.—"It is with very great pleasure that I have heard of the share which you are likely to have in the important business which is in negotiation at Petersburg, being well persuaded that the issue of this great enterprise depends altogether upon the zeal, the resources, and the activity which will be necessary to superintend it.

"To assist in relieving those difficulties which the novelty of the proposition may produce at Petersburg, General Stamford has undertaken to go thither to discuss the military objections which will, perhaps, be put forward by the Russian officers, and may require some knowledge and some address to surmount.

"It is to request from you your assistance to him, and your co-operation with him that I have taken the liberty of addressing this letter to you. You will find in him, in addition to his acknowledged military talents and experience, a mind ardent, intelligent, and fertile of resources. I know how much these qualities will be congenial to you, and I have therefore the most extreme satisfaction in reflecting upon the assistance which this great object will derive from your mutual discussions and communications." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, May 20. London.—"We have an account to-day that the French fleet has been seen on the 2nd and 3rd of May off the Portuguese coast, steering S.W., evidently for Cadiz. If no accident happens to Lord St. Vincent by the junction of the two fleets, which naval men do not seem much to apprehend, all will be well, and we can easily reinforce him time enough to prevent the combined fleet from doing us any serious mischief in the Mediterranean. The Cadiz accounts do not speak of more than sixteen ships fit for sea; the Ferrol squadron has, as you will have seen, missed them in the Bay, and is got into Aix. The being relieved from all watch of Brest will wonderfully ease our operations here, both naval and military. I thought of sending you a despatch to-day about general concert, but on the whole I have judged best to delay it till I hear from you again, and by the paper you enclosed in your last letter it does not appear that Haugwitz's ideas on that subject are as yet very far advanced.

"It requires more philosophy than I possess to see with any degree of patience these two German Courts struggling so hard against being saved. Still I trust the current will drive them to shore in spite of themselves. All this violence about the three most worthy representatives of the French Government at Rastadt is very fortunate for us, because it puts at a greater distance the possibility of Thugut's sacrificing, by some deep stroke of policy, all the present advantages of the situation in which Austria stands, in order to obtain a French guaranty of some square miles more or less in Germany and Italy. God bless you.

"It is true that we want the Elbe ships elsewhere, and do not withdraw them in order to save the question. It may be necessary that you should make this felt at Berlin, in order to keep them in order. If Denmark does not mend its manners we shall very shortly have a fresh naval war. Provided we dispose well of this combined fleet we need not much fear the hostility of Denmark.

"I send you the enclosed for criticism. It has been much approved here. It is the joint production of Pitt and your humble servant. You will perhaps say that we might both find better employment for our time than in writing Latin inscriptions." Copy.

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 20. Duke Street, Westminster.—"I send you the two papers which I mentioned yesterday, and which you told me you had not yet received from Mr. Grenville, to whom they have been communicated by the Hereditary Prince of Orange. The one is a note which was conceived between the Hereditary Prince and Count Haugwitz, and which the latter, if I recollect well, took with him to Minden, and promised to lay before the King of Prussia. It contains a request that those inhabitants of the United Provinces, who may be obliged to leave that country in consequence of the newly decreed requisition, may find an asylum in the neighbouring Prussian provinces. The other is a sketch of some of the most material improvements which the ancient constitution of the Republic seems to stand in need of, and of some preliminary measures which might be taken in the event of a happy change of circumstances. I doubt not but your Lordship will find that the paper contains some useful hints, tho' not very accurately expressed. It is to this latter circumstance that I chiefly attribute the Prince of Orange's remark, which you will find in the enclosed letter. I thought it right, however, to send this letter to you, together with the paper to which it alludes. I hope to have the pleasure of seeing you soon."

Enclosure.

PRINCE OF ORANGE to H. FAGEL.

1799, May 19.—"Je vous envoie le projet de constitution, et la copie de l'adresse de mon fils au Roi de Prusse, avec prière de communiquer ces pièces à Mylord Grenville; mais, en meme temps, il est nécessaire d'observer que je n'ai pas eu le loisir d'examiner à tête reposée ce projet de constitution, et que je n'ai pas pu y faire les remarques et peut-être les corrections nécessaires; en gros je me conforme avec les idées contenues dans ce projet, mais je crois qu'il y a quelques points qui devraient être retouchés et élucidés, tels que l'article de la Présidence tant dans les-états-généraux que dans les différents collèges que l'on voudroit y donner au Stadhouder, et que je doute qu'il puisse prendre sur lui; les occupations attachées aux devoirs de son poste ne lui laissant pas de loisir d'assister journellement à les différentes assemblées; et peut-être y a t'il encore d'autres points qui demanderoient des changements."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 21. Berlin.—"General Stamford began his journey yesterday to Petersburg; taking with him Colonel Dumas, who is an old friend of his, and who accompanies him, though without being informed of the particular business which is in question. General Stamford's intention was to endeavour to direct the course of the proposed expedition from Revel to the neighbourhood of Delftzyll, and to land there 15,000 men, having previously established a corps de reserve of 5,000 men in the Russian principality of Yevern. He prefers this line of attack to any other for many important reasons; in the first place in pursuing Captain Popham's idea of passing along the Eyder, the Russian troops may go from the mouth of the Eyder to the coast of Delftzyll in so short a time as to keep the troops fresh for service, to require no intermediate place of rendezvous, and create none of those apprehensions which might be entertained about them in a longer passage. In the next place, the troops being so landed, will be easily masters of Schantz Buyrtang and Coverden, and thus have complete possession of the provinces of Groningen and Friesland, where they could long maintain themselves against any force which a change of circumstances in the campaign could enable the French to send there; a consideration which may become very important if at Petersburg they are inclined to represent this enterprise as being unreasonably hazardous, in case of unexpected reverses on the Rhine. The landing in North Holland he describes as being much more precarious in practice, and much more doubtful in success from the means of attack which the enemy might find in the ships of Amsterdam and the fleet of the Texel. He considers, however, an attack to be made at the same time upon Zealand as an essential part of this plan, and regards that expedition as naturally taking place from the British Coast, in co-operation with the landing in Friesland; and he is persuaded that by means of these two attacks in Zealand and Friesland, with the circumstance of the English fleet to check the enemy at the Texel, and the favourable disposition of the people of the country, the command and possession of the United Provinces would immediately fall into our hands. He regards the principality of Yevern as a very great object in affording an useful point for the collecting of magazines and for the establishing a corps de reserve; and he considers 20,000 men as being a force so amply sufficient to the whole object that, in his last conversation with me, he frankly declared that he thought a larger number would be more embarrassing to the country than useful to the expedition, and repeated that he desired not a man more than 15,000 to land in Friesland, and 5,000 to remain as a corps de reserve in Yevern.

“If his military experience seems to authorise this more limited number, many considerations appear to me to concur forcibly in recommending it. Although there may be no actual ground of jealousy for us in seeing a large Russian army in Holland, yet common prudence would seem to suggest many motives for not putting that country more than is necessary into the hands of any foreign power; and if this consideration applies in some degree to English views, the prejudices of the Dutch too upon this subject should perhaps not be neglected; and I have frequently observed among some of our friends of that country considerable traces of uneasiness at the idea of a large Russian army taking possession of Holland.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, May 21. Berlin.—“You will have seen that Sir Charles Whitworth’s last letters from Petersburg are not very flattering to our hopes of General Stamford’s success, but I do not nevertheless abandon the enterprise, and I have persuaded myself, though probably I may not have persuaded you, that either by part of the old subsidiary army, or by a new subsidiary army, we must and will make good your project of 20,000 Russians assuring the deliverance of Holland by disembarking from the Baltick on the coast of Friseland. I have so long and so often tormented you by recurring to your 45,000 men for the means of attacking Holland, that I expect you all to be a good deal out of humour with me for venturing to suggest the employing one third of this force, in case no other troops should be supplied by Russia; and yet in honour and conscience I cannot avoid making this suggestion to you, and earnestly requesting you to consider whether you should not send, without a moment’s delay, to direct Sir Charles Whitworth to take this course, if they should adhere to their last answer at Petersburg, and refuse to furnish to England any new subsidiary corps; nor can I help entreating you to remark how infinitely pre-eminent in importance it is that, at all hazards and in all events, this one blow of Holland should be struck now, when it is utterly impossible that any resistance can be offered on the part of the French. Upon this point, however, it is to you only that I can write, and I feel that I must not venture to say anything more to Whitworth which can affect the actual march of your subsidiary army after the formal decision which you have taken upon it, and the measures which you may perhaps have taken in consequence of it. If the knowledge of your deliberate determination had not precluded me, I would, on my own responsibility, have written instantly to Whitworth to entreat him to delay the march of the last 15,000 of the 45; but it would be unjustifiable in me to do so, and therefore I can only again conjure you not to let this disposition of force towards Switzerland lose to you the invaluable and perhaps irretrievable opportunity of the recovery of Holland. If both objects can go on together, there can be no doubt of that being the preferable course, but if an option is to be made and a sacrifice is requisite, surely there can be no hesitation in deciding between the possession of Holland and the increased effort of the combined army in Switzerland.

"You will observe that I have not noticed your despatch about the proposed convention, except to thank you for it, and I suppose you will understand my silence upon it to arise only from its not appearing now necessary to discuss it; I will only remark that their treaty of demarcation includes all the countries behind the line of it and therefore includes Holstein; the absurdity of their treaty is that by its literal interpretation Russia likewise would, as you see, be included; I trust, however, that you will respect no such neutrality, but that you will persuade Paul to insist upon his troops passing along the Eyder, and that you will likewise make of his principality of Yevern the commodious magazine and point of reserve which Stamford wants to make of it. I am impatient for news of the fleet. God bless you, dearest brother.

"You will easily comprehend that in the obscurity in which Schwerin has passed the last three years it is not easy for Stamford to hunt him out, now that he is on the high road to Petersburg. Mahony, who was proposed as second in command, is by this time in London, and as second is highly recommended by Stamford.

"You write to Garlike to complain of the Prussian posts retarding your messengers; I believe your messengers should be complained of for retarding the post. I never knew how bad they were till it was so much my business to observe them; it is shameful to see how negligent they are. Panin's couriers arrive at Berlin usually in nine, sometimes in ten days, ours are upon the average from twelve to thirteen days from Petersburg; from Cuxhaven your messengers are usually three days to Berlin. Dietry, who goes from here, almost always arrives at Cuxhaven in between fifty and sixty hours; in short, depend upon it, you will have no good messengers till some account is regularly taken of the dates of their arrivals in their land journeys; the sea passage will always leave some room for abuse, but by land you may correct it. Panin is going to Carlsbadt for his wife's health ; he will be a great loss."

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 21. Admiralty.—“Should you see any objection to our ordering away from the Elbe the frigates which were stationed there some time ago under the apprehension of an attack on Hamburg? That attack seems at present not to be very probable, and we are in very great want of our small squadron to scour the North Sea, which swarms with privateers, who run in and out on the Norway coast in a very intolerable manner, and will, I fear, do much mischief to our trade.

“I wish much to speak to you on one or two other points, and should be extremely obliged to you to let me know whether I could see you to-day between two o'clock and four, or at any other time after two, being engaged till then.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 22. Harley Street.—“Votre courier m'a apporté des dépêches qui étent en Russe ne pourront être traduite que demain au soir. Pourriez-vous me donner, dans la soirée de demain entre les 8 et les 10 heures, une demi-heure d'entrevue, car vendredi, il y a un courier Portugais qui vat à Petersbourg, et par lequel j'ai beaucoup à écrire, et mille lettres particulières au quelles je dois répondre. Votre courier m'a rendu le plus heureux des hommes. J'ai la certitude de recevoir par un autre de vos couriers, qui doit incessamment partire de Petersbourg, la détermination de l'Empereur qui me permet de rester ici. Soyez persuadé que je serai plus util pour le bien des affaires de loin que de près, où un tal[taille] d'enemis s'élaxeroient contre moi pour me traversser, et me donner tous les dégouts possible, ce qui m'auroit obligé de quitter tout-à-fait le service.

“Ainssi, et en ami et en politique, rejouissez-vous avec moi, et pardonez moi la joie inexprimable que j'ai de rester dans ce pays que j'aime, où j'ai des amis parmi lesquels vous êtes le premier.”

The HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, May 24. Berlin.—“Le départ du général de Stamford pour Petersbourg a fait grande sensation ici ; comme de raison. Je tiens à cet égard le langage dont je suis convenu avec lui, et en ai même parlé de cette manière à Haugwitz, qui m'a dit trouver tres-naturel que mon père envoie quelqu'un en Russie pour y veiller à ses intérêts dans des momens comme les présens, et où l'Empereur de Russie employe des moyens et avance des intentions pour le succès de la bonne cause. Du reste je suppose que Stamford vous aura fait savoir lui-même les véritables motifs de ce voyage, et dans le public ici personne ne semble douter que le but ne soit d'employer les 45,000 Russes qui doivent passer en Allemagne pour la délivrance de la République. Je lui ai fourni des cartes marines du Zuider Zee et des Waddens qu'il a prises avec lui pour pouvoir consulter sur cette matière vaillant, et concerter les moyens d'une descente dans les provinces de Groningue et de Frise, si la chose entroit dans les plans des cours respectives. Je ne puis que me louer, par continuation, de la conduite de Mr. Grenville à mon égard, et je lui communique tous les renseignemens et informations que je recois, tant par rapport à la Belgique qu'aux Provinces-Unies. La confiance que Lord Grenville veut bien mettre en moi, d'après ce que vous me marquez, ainsi que l'assentiment qu'il donne aux mesures prises et proposées me flatte beaucoup, et puisque mon père y donne également son approbation, je continuerai à agir dans les mêmes vues et les mêmes principes. Je dois remarquer que si on travaille à établir la communication avec l'Angleterre depuis la Belgique, il seroit intéressant de savoir 1^o, de quelle manière les Anglois pourroient favoriser semblable entreprise ; 2^o de combien de forces disponibles pourroit ensuite être fait usage pour se maintenir, et aider à faire prendre de la consistance au soulèvement général." Extract.

INTELLIGENCE RESPECTING HOLLAND—from M. d'Yroy.

1799, May 25. Emmerick.—“ En Hollande l'armement de l'escadre de chaloupes canonnières Russes y cause les plus vives allarmes. La crainte qu'il est destiné pour les côtes du paÿs de Yevern, et la possibilité que la Russie y a envoyé des troupes, a porté le Directoire à en envoyer beaucoup dans les provinces de Frise et de Groningue : plusieurs régimens, avec presque toute l'artillerie à cheval, sont partis pour la dernière ; quelques autres, avec ce qu'ils ont de hussards, occupent les frontières de la Frise. La réquisition décrétée n'étoit point encore publiée hiér. On l'attribue principalement à ce que le plan d'organisation souffre beaucoup de contradictions. On presume qu'on mitigera la première idée en commençant par former un corps de volontaires, qui sera payé sur le pied des troupes de ligne, et devra être toujours en activité et servir avec l'armée : que du reste, on formera des corps de bourgeoisie armée seulement pour servir dans les districts, et qui ne seront payés que quand des troubles intérieurs exigeroient leur service. Tous seront obligés de faire la promesse de fidélité à la constitution et de la reconnoître ; ceux qui s'y refuseront, ne seront point armés, mais payeront le triple de la contribution de ceux qui l'age exclut de la conscription. On me mande que M. de Leeuw remplacera Van Hooff comme Directeur, et que le premier sera remplacé dans la seconde chambre par un nommé Jonckheer, fameux Jacobin.

“ Ce qui suit est en chiffre :—

“ D'abord à la reception de la lettre de Votre Altesse, je me suis rendu à Munster pour m'aboucher avec M. de Tuyll, que je trouvai prévenu par la lettre de M. F[agel]. Il sentoît parfaitement la nécessité de ne rien faire sans l'aveu et la connoissance du Prince Héritaire, et je suis assuré qu'il ne fera rien de son chef, et qu'il n'agira que conformément aux intentions du Prince. Comme il n'avoit pas encore reçu la lettre de Monseigneur le Prince, et qu'on a des notions très-imparfaites sur la situation en Flandre, il partira incessamment pour là, afin de s'assurer par lui-même de tout ce qui concerne la position militaire, l'esprit public, et d'établir une voye sûre de correspondance, ce qui prendra tout au plus deux à trois semaines, et ne dérangera en rien le plan qu'on pourroit trouver bon de suivre. J'attendrai ici le résultat des arrangemens pris, afin de pouvoir, en conséquence, me concerter sur l'endroit le plus propre à favoriser et faciliter la correspondance, me trouvant ici dans un vrai foyer de tripotage, et d'un espionnage puéril qui ne finit pas. Je m'occupe, en attendant, à préparer les voyes pour être bien informé, et ne négligerai surtout point l'article d'une communication directe." Extract.

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, May 25. Cleveland Row.—“You will easily suppose by the feelings of your own mind those with which I received your letters to-day. My despatch will remove all difficulty which had been created by the variations of our wishes in the different prospects of Prussian politics. I trust very much to the Austrian successes for renewing the energy of this sleeping Cabinet (or interior Cabinet) at Berlin, and I feel a happiness that I cannot express to you, in being myself, as I am now, here in London to plan, and there at Berlin to execute.

“It seemed very important to procure Woronzow's support of our plan, and I therefore urged him to write by this messenger to that effect. He begged me to put in writing what it was that we particularly urged in this moment, and I sent him the enclosed minute, which I will beg you (in order to save me the trouble of another letter to-night) to forward in a private letter to Whitworth, that he may know what it is that Woronzow writes, for I am confident his despatch will be conformable to my suggestion. I will not forget the letter from the P[rince] of Orange, but I could not have got it to-day, and I was not willing to delay this messenger. A Portuguese messenger goes on Tuesday, and I will send it by him.

“Naval news we have as yet none of any importance. Captain Peard of the Success was chased by the French off Oporto on the 1st. They were then, as he counted them, no more than nineteen sail of the line, and their list of twenty-five is said to be certainly false. Peard bore away immediately for Cadiz. Lord Keith was returned to his station, but we do not accurately know his numbers. If Lord St. V[incent] is apprised in time he may have seventeen or eighteen, much more than enough to give an account of nineteen French.

"Then there is a story that the French were seen again from Lisbon on the 9th, but I think that is entitled to little credit. If it were true, Whitshed with five s[ail] of [the] l[ine] might join Lord St. V[incent] before the French got there. He might very well be at Cadiz the 12th.

"Lord Bridport has, we fear, been kept by the south-west winds on the west coast of Ireland, and consequently will not have been able to detach. But I see little or no room for uneasiness on this subject, and all the rest seems to go from good to better.

"I have received a project which is said to have been shewn you, from the L[andgra]ve of Hesse Homberg. I think nothing can be made of it. Pray tell me what hope you think there is of Saxons, and what course one could in your opinion best pursue on that subject." Copy.

Enclosure.

NOTE DELIVERED BY LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT WORONZOW.

"L'objet de l'expédition du courier de ce soir porte sur la proposition que l'on avoit déjà chargé le Ch[evalier] Whitworth de faire, d'un corps de troupes Russes pour être employé à une descente sur les côtes maritimes des Provinces-Unies, et pour y rétablir l'ancien gouvernement.

"Quand on l'a cru impossible d'obtenir la coopération de la Prusse, on a chargé le Ch[evalier] Whitworth de porter sa demande au nombre de 40 ou 45,000 hommes.

"Depuis est venue la proposition de Haugwitz pour fournir un corps de 60,000 Prussiens pour le même objet.

"J'ai alors écrit à Whitworth de se borner à demander 20,000 hommes pour l'opération maritime, ce nombre étant évidemment suffisant pour, avec coopération Prussienne aidée aussi par celle que nous pourrions fournir, chasser les François entièrement des Provinces-Unies, et des Païs-Bas.

"Aujourd'hui nous avons encore quelques espérances vagues d'obtenir cette coopération, mais, comme toutes ces décisions Prussiennes sont si incertaines, j'écris à mon frère et à Whitworth; au premier, de poursuivre toujours sa négociation, s'il y a lieu de le faire, mais à Whitworth de traiter à Petersburg pour le même nombre de 40 à 45 mille troupes, dont nous nous chargerons de tous les frais de transport, et qui nous donneront la certitude de délivrer la Hollande sans que cela dépende d'une politique aussi vacillante qu'est celle de Berlin.

"En tout cas il vaut mieux avoir trop que trop peu de forces.

"Je vous prierai donc d'appuyer auprès de l'Empereur cette demande, à laquelle nous mettons tout l'intérêt que nous inspire naturellement la délivrance de la Hollande.

"Vous excuserez la peu de précision de cette note, faite à la hâte comme vous l'avez demandé." Copy.

EARL TEMPLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 26. Wotton.—“With respect to your question as to the importance of the Lieutenancy to me in my future prospects, I need not say that certainly my ultimate object must be Buckinghamshire; but as, thank God, that object is not only I hope and trust, but is in point of fact in all human probability, very very distant (and it cannot be more than I pray it may) it ceases being the objection to my holding the Hampshire Lieutenancy which it otherwise would. With respect to my residence, I have not the least difficulty in saying that my residence will be fully sufficient to enable me to fulfil the duties of the office, should his Majesty confer it on me. I am fully aware of the trouble and the importance which attend it, but if it is given me I shall take it with my eyes open, and with a full determination to resign it the moment I should find my situation such as, from non-residence or any other cause, might make a proper attention to the duties of it difficult. Under these circumstances I trust I shall not be thought too pressing in urging the accomplishment of an object which a great many circumstances, private feelings, and (entre nous) a little family pride make important to me.

“When I see you I shall wish to talk with you respecting the possibility (supposing the Lieutenancy given me) and the propriety of my retaining my Buckinghamshire commission. For every possible reason I should feel the greatest and most insurmountable objections to the idea of leaving the regiment in which I now am; and as both the Hampshire regiments are full, I should suppose there would be no difficulty on that point.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, May 27. Berlin.—“My opinion still is that we shall at last succeed in bringing the King to a declaration against France by a manifesto of summons to evacuate Holland; and Haugwitz is grown so sanguine about his journey that he takes with him all that shall be necessary for this measure, in hopes of firing his manifesto from Wesel on the day of the King's arrival there; you may easily imagine with how much impatience Count Panin and I shall be looking out of our windows on the Brunswick road towards the 4th of June, about the time that you will be dancing the first country dances at the ball of St. James's; my imagination does not carry me beyond the expectation of seeing Haugwitz return on that day to conclude the convention with us, to accept the offer from Russia, and to take immediate measures for collecting the army which is to act for the deliverance of Holland. I questioned our Prussian Minister very closely about his information respecting the French troops opposed to the present army of observation, and he assures me that there are not above 4,500 men in Holland, about the same number in Mayence, and not more than 5,000 scattered about in bodies of 600 at Coblenz,

Ehrenbreitstein, Dusseldorf, Maestricht; so that in truth the Duke of Brunswick's army is unquestionably strong enough to march forward in the present moment, if the Landgrave of Hesse will only undertake, with the 18,000 now under arms at Cassel, to watch Mayence while the Prussian troops are collecting. The only check which I now fear is from the deplorable weakness or indecision of the Duke of Brunswick's character; if he has the energy of a mouse in the present moment the thing is done, and I have not failed to put in his way the remark that if he does not now take his part and do the business, we shall do it by a Russian General, and leave him with his doubts and his difficulties and his army of observation, to observe how easily eight or ten Russian battalions will take possession of Holland while he is looking at it, and menace the Flemish frontier of France while he is trembling at the feeble garrison of Mayence. Yet the last letter which I saw of his writing described with satisfaction the new eagerness which he found in his army, and which he justly attributed to the spirit of emulation which the Austrian successes have inspired. I have sometimes been apprehensive that he would be reluctant to commit his military reputation to an army of numbers comparatively small; but on the other hand it must be remembered that he will have the sole command of that small army, whereas upon the large scale which had been proposed the King would have commanded, and would have brought with him the influence of General Reukel, Köcheritz, Zastrow, who would hold the Duke of Brunswick, and govern him through the authority of the King. I had once the idea of suggesting to Haugwiz the additional advantage of our immediately co-operating by a descent in Zeeland; but as he has never required it, as the immediate difficulty might be increased by the uncertainty respecting the Brest fleet, and as I was sure that he would generally be prompt enough in asking this, and all of you enough prepared to furnish it, I would not add to the details of the first discussion, and have left it without any new remark. In truth I still retain too much doubt of our success with the King to build with any certain and secure hope on the journey in question, and you will have observed that I cannot bring myself to recommend the slackening of any of our new efforts, on account of the better appearance of the state of things here. Let us pursue our hopes here with all possible activity and energy, but let us not put confidence enough in them to sacrifice to our speculations here a single man whom we can employ with the certainty of success upon so important an object. Meantime it would almost amuse you to see how much Haugwiz and I have changed places in our conversations, how he triumphs over those doubts and hesitations with which he has inoculated me, and belabours me with all the zeal, ardour, and confidence which my friend Panin and I have hitherto unprofitably wasted upon him. I cannot better describe this to you than by repeating that he yesterday assured me that if the King would publish his manifesto next week at Wesel he, Haugwiz, would undertake to settle the arrangement of Holland by going with 500 Hussars to the Hague, and peaceably making the new settlement of the country. Let us dream of this while we may, but let us nevertheless get our 20,000 Russians to march with while we can.

"I presume that you will already have taken notice that it is in consequence of a direct order to Panin that he has offered to the King of Prussia the army which has of late appeared to menace the Prussian frontiers; according to the terms of this offer the army in question would therefore be a voluntary addition of means furnished by the magnanimity of the Emperor, and so I have considered it, and so I have always spoken of it to Haugwitz and to Panin; but when I recollect that the Emperor made a similar offer to Prussia six months ago, and yet that the corps thus offered was really the subsidiary corps paid by England, I am sometimes afraid that they will endeavour to recur to the same course in this instance at Petersburg, and that after the orders given to Whitworth from England to propose another engagement for 45,000 men, the Russian Cabinet may mean to conclude with Whitworth for them in case the King of Prussia should accept this offer, and then two great inconveniences would happen; in the first place the Emperor would have the grace of an offer which we should have the pleasure of paying for; in the next place we should be engaged in our convention here for 60,000 men, and at the same time at Petersburg for 45,000 men more, which would unreasonably extend our expenses and engagements. Perhaps you will think that I am over-cautious and suspicious as to our friends and allies, but I confess I think any misunderstanding at Petersburg so great an evil that I cannot help recommending you to direct Whitworth at all events to conclude only for the 20,000 men which Stamford is gone to negotiate for; in that case, supposing our convention here to fail, you will have a surplus of your original sum, which will be applicable to the unavoidable expenses of Holland and of Flanders with which the Russian expedition there must be supported; but if no previous explanation be had upon this matter, it may happen either that you may be loaded with a very heavy expense, or engaged in a misunderstanding by refusing yourself to it after that they shall have reckoned upon it.

"We have lost our French Minister, and I very much regret his departure, for both in conduct and in character here he was all that we could desire the Minister of the great nation to be; another ground for regretting his loss is one of which you are likely to feel the inconvenience; he is considered as entertaining the opinion that France should stand upon the defence of its limits and offer peace to Europe, and his desire at all times for peace is said to be built upon the persuasion that peace would consolidate the power of the French Republic, an opinion on which he has so fundamentally differed with the ex-Director Rewbell; it seems, however, doubtful whether he will prevail in recommending this conduct, and if he does I still conceive that his description of limits would still point to the Rhine, and I cannot but hope that before any such negotiation can arise, the Rhine may again have found some of its old acquaintances upon its banks.

"We have to-day uncertain rumours of movement in the Austrian army of the Archduke, and our politicians speculate upon the probable evacuation of Swisserland by the French troops now that Luciensteig is taken and General Raim is in the Valois; the last news from Vienna of the 18th instant describes Moreau to be encamped near Alexandria with 17,000 men; of the Neapolitan army I know nothing, but presume that the King is returned to his capital."

LORD GRENVILLE TO THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, May 27. Cleveland Row.—"There is I believe no messenger's place now vacant, or if it is, my turn is not come round. Dietry has I fear no chance, there being hardly an acquaintance I have in the world, or a peer who votes with Government in the House of Lords, that has not a valet de chambre who 'has travelled and would make the best possible messenger.'

"Either Pelham or Lord Minto will go to Vienna; you know them both so much better than I do that I regret never having asked your opinion as between them. But I had another project which has failed.

"Who is Mr. Diemar? His information seems worth attending to.

"I received a few days ago a letter from you through Craufurd and respecting Craufurd's nephew. I had immediately on your going answered the father (I believe) of the young man (Craufurd of the Pay Office) by stating, what is the real truth, that my engagements leave me very little prospect of being able to bring him into the Office in any reasonable time, and that I would by no means advise him to sacrifice other prospects or views of any kind for one so remote and uncertain; almost all the clerks in the Office now being quite young men, and I myself being already under some engagements for vacancies.

"We shall be, as always happens, later with our transports than we had talked of; the plan of gallies would certainly be much the best, if no fresh difficulties are found in it.

"Did you mention to Stamford before he went what I said to you in my despatch about cavalry? I see it was omitted to be mentioned by me to Whitworth, but I hope you supplied the deficiency; if not, Stamford probably will, and, at all events, this despatch may be in time to do it.

"No news of the fleets.

"I believe I have not mentioned to you that Woronzow stays, and that Kotschouby is to direct the whole machine at present.

I fear he has not weight enough with the Emperor to prevent many extravagancies from being committed which will, in the course of time, much embarrass us." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

1799, May 28. Downing Street.—“In answer to your private letter of the 30th April, I can at present only say that I should hope his Majesty would not be disinclined graciously to comply with your request in appointing you one of his Privy Council; but that appointment is no otherwise made than by calling the person appointed into the council, and there administering to him the usual oaths. This mark of his Majesty’s favour towards you must, inevitably, be deferred until your return to England.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, May 28. Berlin.—“As it is doubtful whether I shall have any communication this day or two which is worth the journey of a messenger, I write a few lines by this night’s post to acknowledge the receipt this morning of your despatches 22 and 23, with your private letter, as also your private letter by Mr. Casamajor of the 10th instant. By intelligence from Paris of the best source I am told that the object of the French fleet is to unite with that of Cadiz, to proceed to Toulon in order to embark troops there, and then to act successively upon Minorca, Naples and Sicily. My letter from Sir M. Eden of the 22nd instant encloses official accounts which I transmit to you of the success of the Austrians at Luciensteig, Coire, Sargans, ; he also mentions a messenger having passed through Vienna with despatches to Lord Nelson acquainting him with the sailing of the Brest fleet; he further informs me that Ruff the messenger had arrived with the despatches of which he was the bearer, and that the Austrian Minister had very cheerfully acquiesced in that employment of the troops which was proposed in these despatches from you.

“I presume that you will have had official despatches with these accounts more detailed, and it is only ex abundanti that I indulge my cautious temper in sending them likewise by Berlin post.

“I shall write by Mr. Casamajor to Petersburg in the same sense with that of my last despatch to you, Number 32. The numbers which I mention in that despatch become the more necessary to be repeated in consequence of the letter from Sir Charles Whitworth of [the] 14th instant under flying seal, which is forwarded by this post.”

Postscript. “We have accounts arrived here of the occupation of Genoa by the Russian and Austrian troops, and of a defeat of the advanced guard of Macdonald's army; these accounts come from Nuremberg and appear probable, though they are hitherto imperfectly related. I doubt a little of the good policy of the measure which you announce in your No. 22, though I suppose that you may have reasons for it which I do not understand. I will write about it by my next messenger."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 30. Harley Street.—"Circello vient de me montrer un billet qu'il a reçu de mylord Spencer, qui lui annonce que les Français ont évacué Naples. Il ne se possède pas de joie et je partage celle qu'il rescut. Voilà donc un souverain légitime que vous avez eu la gloire de réintégrer dans ses états. Il faut espérer que nous aurons ensemble la satisfaction d'apprendre que la même chose arivera au Roi de Sardaigne, et que l'États de l'Eglise, quoique sans Pape, retournera sous la domination du Sacré colége, et qu'aucune parcelle de ces états, ainssi que du Piémont, ne seroit pas démembrés pour satisfaire l'appétit dévorent et insatiable de l'Autriche."

The EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 30. Ipswich.—"I left London on Friday on a visit to some of Lady Elgin's family, and intended returning early this week, but she has, most unfortunately, been seized with a violent indisposition which, though somewhat abated, is not yet sufficiently so for me to think of leaving her without an absolute necessity. This delay induces me to use the present mode of requesting your Lordship to be so obliging as to determine and notify the allowances attached to my mission, and the date at which they commence. The arrangement rests entirely with you; I never did propose, nor do I wish to propose, anything on the subject. But I hope that the nature of my embassy; the assistance it is to hold out at my expense for researches of various kinds; the number of English officers, naval as well as military, who will naturally make my house their home; and the aid and support (always leading to much expense) which some Foreign Ministers in London assure me their Governments expect from the English mission at Constantinople; these considerations, while they have guided me in the extent of my preparations, induce me to hope your Lordship will put the embassy in point of appointments, as well as in dignity, on the footing of an extraordinary one. I know that the appointments are in a regular course of payment from which there is no deviation. But you may probably be able to direct the allowances made on fitting out to be paid immediately; and it really is a matter of very great consequence to me, since my outlay on objects quite indispensable for me has been enormous, and ought to be paid before I sail. Some steps having been announced to me as being taken at the Chamberlain's office for my plate, I applied while in London for the allowance in money, as I was obliged to collect the quantity required on such an occasion from different quarters, there not being time for my having a full set made at present. But it seems I cannot have this allowance for a twelvemonth, and having positively purchased the plate, this delay would be a material inconvenience.

"I am extremely sorry to have to trouble your Lordship so very much, but in fact I am anxious to be ready to sail as soon as the navigation is secure; and I foresee no delay whatever on my part but from these arrangements, on which I consequently feel very desirous of knowing your decision and having your assistance."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, May 31. Duke Street.—"The enclosed paper seems to me to contain all the material points upon which it is necessary that I should be instructed.

"I do not think that there can be any objection to preparing the King's letter even in the present state of Switzerland, the Government of which may fairly be considered by his Majesty as suspended only; particularly if the letters were to begin in this manner, 'Not doubting but that it shall have pleased God to have restored you to the full exercise of your sovereignty and the enjoyment of your liberties before our Minister shall reach you.'

"If your Lordship approves of this idea, I will procure a copy of the usual letter and submit it to you with such alterations as the occasion may seem to require. At all events the letter to the Grisons may now be prepared immediately; and, supposing I should find Switzerland still occupied by the enemy, I should strongly recommend, myself, an immediate assembly of the magistrates either in the Grisons, or, what would be still better, on the territory of Schaffhausen, the whole of which canton, about five square miles excepted, is occupied by the Austrians; and surely the Austrian bayonet is as capable of rendering an Assembly legal at Schaffhausen as the French cannon at Lucerne.

"At all events I feel it most important that I should set out as soon as possible, and I know of nothing that can detain me beyond the Birthday. I presume that it will not be necessary or even advisable for me to kiss hands, even though it is your Lordship's opinion and intention that I should have a regular commission.

"Your Lordship will, I trust, direct a letter to be written to the Admiralty to desire that I may be taken over in a ship of war.

"I have a private letter this morning from Lord Castlereagh, who tells me that the country has more the appearance of being settled now than it has had for these last two years.

"I will call in the course of the morning to receive your Lordship's command. The Irish Debentures are at 81, an increase in the revenue in the year ending 25th March of 500,000*l.*, a full fourth of the entire amount; and this notwithstanding the rebellion."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, May 31. Berlin.—"You will see that I have sent you the scold which I menaced you with for moving your gun-boats to the coast of Norway instead of leaving them to control the many supplies which had been used to pass both to the French-Dutch through the Waddens and to the French-Irish by the activity of Napper Tandy's Privy Council at Hamburgh; the trading from that place to Holland has been so extensive and so undisguised that I do assure you Haugwiz had been entirely persuaded that we were all parties to it in England, and when our little flotilla arrived and gave some check to it, he desired me to explain to him why we had altered our system in disturbing an intercourse which he presumed we had thought profitable to ourselves, from our having so long tolerated it without interruption; if Lord Hawkesbury and you are really such determined traders as Haugwiz appears to think you, my remonstrances will not be well received by you and him; but as I feel pretty confident that this cannot be the case, I have thought no time should be lost in writing to you formally upon it, and I have said something to Lord Spencer upon the same subject. When I sent you an account of the Emperor of Russia's gracious and conditional forgiveness of the city of Hamburgh, I felt a little too English to be perfectly satisfied with the prospect of our owing Napper Tandy and the satisfaction which we required about him to the interference of our friends at Petersburg; and, with every acknowledgment to the kindness of their motives, it appears to me that this point is one peculiarly of national dignity, and therefore one which should not invite on our side any, even friendly powers, as parties to it; I am making this observation only as a ground on which to express my hope that you will not direct Crawford or Whitworth to pursue this object in Russian partnership. I do not apprehend that it will soon come to issue, as it has been referred to H[is] P[russian] M[ajesty] and to the Duke of Brunswick as co-directors; and besides the usual laudable delays of such discussions, I flatter myself that on this day those great personages are employed in discussions of a more important and interesting nature. Yet as long as Cuxhaven continues to be our only point of contact with the Continent, it is in all its relations both of commerce and of ordinary communication a subject that requires very close attention from us; I wish I was satisfied with the attention and intelligence of all that you employ in that quarter, or that I could put you into a better course than that which exists ; you will have seen, by the different detached observations which in many letters I have made to you on these subjects, that I have a restless desire to see all the business of our port of Cuxhaven pursued with activity and intelligence ; I do not by this mean any particular reproach to Mr. Harward, of whom I know nothing, but I cannot help expressing some desire that our general superintendence of this great English bridge was watched from home with all the attention which it deserves, and was not so much abandoned to the ordinary course of common packet-boat agency. If all goes well I trust we may soon expect a better road through Flushing, Helvoet, and Amsterdam ; but while Cuxhaven is our only stepping-stone, it is in importance worthy of very active and efficient control, and you would find the advantage of making Harward, or somebody at least, supply that to you.

“I delight in your confederate inscription, which I think, without flattery to either of you, is uncommonly good ; my only criticism upon it is that it is a little too much prolonged, and therefore, in defiance of your parental feelings, I send you back your child with some of his fingers and toes cut off, and I own ‘I like him the better therefore.’ Voluntarii milites with ultra offerentes is a pleonasm. The Laus and Fama is, I think, of too ordinary a style for so distinguished a composition, and obmutescat is not to my fancy. I cannot help thinking that after telling the story of the Dead the comment of praise should be made by the reader. I suppose you will both of you think my erasures very impertinent, and that you will probably add a line or two to the original in order to convince me how mistaken I was in thinking that there was a word too much ; yet you will observe that I have the modesty to add nothing but one little word, which I do not entirely protect, though I think the sense of it is wanted, for without it nobody knows where they died ; ibi should therefore be somehow found, though close to idem there is what Johnson would have called a cacophony of iii. I think I should upon the whole prefer ibi etiam excepturi. Ipsa in morte invicti seems to stand better after occubuerunt. I should not criticise much if I did not greatly admire. I thought I had concluded, but I must come back from Latin to English.

“I have heard here at various times, since your intention has been known concerning Mr. Paget, objections and difficulties stated which, though coming from leading persons here, I did not think it necessary to trouble you about, more especially as I have not the smallest personal knowledge of him ; but I have grown more uneasy about this subject since I have seen the strong impression which Panin has received upon it, and the serious anxiety which he expresses to me about it. I do not know how far this impression is in fact justified, but it is a matter of serious consideration that at so important a time any man should be sent here as English Minister against whom there is an unfavourable prepossession, which will stand very much both in his way and in the way of his Court. I have therefore, though with reluctance, determined to mention the matter privately to you in order that you may give to it such consideration as you think fit. The objections which are made to him are stated to be a supposed want of knowledge of business and a want of attention to it, together with a violent and headstrong temper, and an affectation of brusquerie in his manners and conduct. The persons who are quoted to me for dwelling much upon these objections are Haugwiz and Gotz and Panin; to me Haugwiz has said nothing except now and then a remark upon Paget's youth and indiscretion; but Gotz, who is well considered here and was Minister at Petersburg, has strongly urged Panin for his own sake to endeavour, if possible, to procure any other appointment here; and I cannot fairly conceal from you that Panin's prepossessions are so strong upon this matter as to leave me very little hope that it will be possible for them to have that communication and friendly intercourse which, in these times, appears to be so desirable between the Russian and English Minister at Berlin. I do assure you that I have long hesitated to say anything to you which might step across the fortunes of a young man who is entirely unknown to me; but with all that I hear and fear upon it, I should not treat you with proper confidence if I did not advise you to pause upon it, and if [I] did not acquaint you with what I have heard of the impression made by his supposed appointment here. Would it not be worth while to consider whether you might not take this opportunity of endeavouring to bring into the line of foreign mission some higher rank both of talents and of general situation than the present course of succession in the line will afford to you; and would it not be a very considerable advantage to the whole of your foreign establishment if, by mixing in it a few persons of rather higher calibre, you could add both to the general estimation of the foreign line, and by increasing the desire to belong to it, you could add to the number of candidates from amongst whom you would have to choose. I cannot help thinking that, if you read the Peers and Commoners in the Red Book, you will easily find some of those names which we have more than once talked over; and the natural vacancy which I am now daily expecting to make for you at Berlin, in the conclusion of my business here, will give a fair opportunity for your introducing at once here some new man of talents, character, and rank enough to help you in his mission, instead of being helped by his promotion here at some cost both of anxiety to you and of insufficiency for the public business.—Diri.—You will not be sorry that I have arrived at the last period of my diplomatic sermon."

Private.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 3. Berlin.—"You will see by my public letter that, in the uncertainty whether the Emperor will not still delay your new engagement till he hears from Berlin, and doubting whether his new offer to Berlin will admit of such extensive supply to you likewise, I have done what I could to lead them at Petersburg to adopt at least the measure of the 20,000 troops for Friesland and Groningen. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than I shall feel in the knowledge of this embarkation having entered the Eyder, though you do not tell me what hopes you have of that important passage being secured for us. Stamford's journey, and the obvious speculations arising besides from the general state of things, have created a good deal of discourse in the public upon measures of this description, and you will see by the Dutch correspondence that the enemy begins to move a little in that quarter. I have not, however, any apprehensions on that account, though certainly it furnishes a new reason for the greatest diligence and activity on our part. There is still a little confusion in the correspondence from Petersburg, though none that I think very essential; the force which Panin was directed to offer was no specified number, but was described to be the army on the confines of Prussia; yet Whitworth's letters speak of the same offer as being a specific offer of 45,000 men. Whitworth's letter expressly renounces on the part of the Emperor all further English subsidy while there is any hope of Prussia receiving it, and therefore I think myself justified in presuming that the Russian offer to Berlin is at the Emperor's cost, and has no reference to future English subsidy. Panin has no distinct orders upon this, and was at first inclined to think that the new offer from Russia to Berlin was grounded upon hopes of English subsidy and would depend upon it; but I think I have quite converted him by Whitworth's last letter, as I shewed to him that the Emperor expressly took credit for the generosity of his declining English subsidy in the moment when he was offering his new proposal of military aid to Prussia. I do not fear the result of any embarrassment on these questions, because I see that you are prepared in England to subsidise, if necessary, both the 60,000 Prussians and the second corps of 45,000 Russians; but I have not told Panin of this determination, because it would be desirable, if possible, to save you that expense. My speculation therefore is as follows. I think it not improbable that Haugwitz will return in a day or two, and offer to conclude for Prussian hostility as soon as the troops can be collected, provided we sign our convention for 60,000 men, and that Russia makes good the Emperor's last offer of 45,000 men to act upon the left of the Prussian army. Upon these terms, if the King consents, we shall be probably able to conclude; if we do, the 20,000 Russian troops will, I hope, still pursue the same plan of expedition, because by doing so they will both enable the Prussians to act more vigorously towards Flanders, and besides that, there will, I think, be an advantage in our having in the United Provinces Russian force enough to make us independent of Prussian co-operation, although I would not have that Russian force large enough there to put any bad thoughts into the head of Paul. Supposing, however, our treaty with Haugwitz to take this turn, Panin is inclined to propose his concluding a separate treaty with Prussia for the 45,000 men, and my concluding separately with Prussia for the 60,000 men, and then an act of mutual accession to these treaties; perhaps this would be the clearest course to pursue, but I am not quite sure that the same impression of general concert would be produced in this shape, and I shall expect that Haugwiz will not be inclined to part with the security of Great Britain being connected immediately in the Prussian treaty with Russia, but for this we must be governed by what shall appear to be the most quickly practicable; the fault of the times is that every where but in England the whole world is fast asleep. Perhaps we shall fail at last in rousing the Prussian eagle at Minden, but even then we shall still be marching with our 20,000 Russians; and I delight in my spirited old general's insisting that more than 20,000 would embarrass the cause and the country more than they would assist it.

“With respect to Saxony I do not see what can be done there until this Prussian question is determined; if it ends favourably, Saxony will naturally drop into that system; if we continue to slumber here, that cannot be longer than until our Russians are in Holland, for if that event does not wake them their sleep is eternal. I know no separate way of influencing Saxony but by the old project which I used to plague you with of Russian march. What are you doing with Fagel and your old Stadtholder? my young one seems to do well.”

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 3. [Holwood.]—“I hope you will persist in the idea of discouraging absolutely all detachment from the 45,000 Russians destined to Switzerland; and of concluding a treaty for 20,000 to be employed on the side of Holland. If more can be had, and General Stamford is right in supposing more not wanted in that quarter, we can find other purposes to apply them to, and I am most inclined to think Prussia will have adopted very soon such a line, as will leave no objection at Petersburg to parting with a larger part of their force. The great points certainly are, to keep unimpaired the force for Switzerland, and to ensure what is necessary for Holland; but it seems very desirable to keep up the idea of our subsidising as many more as Russia can spare, to be employed wherever it can be done to most advantage.”

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, June 3. Cleveland Row.—“If we cannot have forty, and if Stamford undertakes that twenty shall do, to be sure we must take them if we can get them. But I cannot think we should do well to retard the march of any part of the first forty-five, with a view to this object. If I have learnt anything by the disagreeable lessons of this war it is that success in military operations wholly depends on acting en masse on one or two chosen points, and in avoiding to distract your force by multiplying your objects of attack.

"If my whole forty-five were at this hour in Switzerland I am confident there would not be a man too many there; and if either by any waverings in our decision, or by any effect of the cursed crooked policy of my friends at Vienna, the force in that quarter is diminished before the object is completely obtained, the whole game will be thrown back again, and then our twenty in Holland will only be food for frogs. I never felt so confident in my life on any one point as I do that the success of the whole and every part of this war depends on pushing the campaign with vigour in Switzerland, and this can only be done by the arrival of a new army there, for you see how a first army wastes itself away even by its own successes.

"Another and no inconsiderable advantage is that these Russians will now, by the course which events have taken, be more or less under Suwarow's orders, which they could not be if any other destination was assigned to them.

"Let Stamford therefore limit the new force to twenty thousand men if he will, but I cannot spare him a man of the others, and had rather undertake the reconquest of Holland from hence, with militia regiments, unpromising and difficult as that project would be.

"I have taken your hint about the messengers, and you will receive an official despatch on the subject.

"You will think we have on the whole no reason to be dissatisfied with the naval news, though, to be sure, one had rather have beat them. I suppose you will hear the details from Lord Spencer, but as I know it is not very kind to one's friends at a distance to act on that sort of supposition, I will just mention that Lord Keith with fourteen or fifteen was a day and a half between the two fleets; the French fleet had the wind of him though they have published that they were manœuvring to get it. The Spaniards (nineteen sail of line) were in movement in their port, but did not come out of it. The junction was evidently the object the French had in view. The storm or gale of wind dispersed them, and probably drove them into the Mediterranean. They passed the Straights the 4th or 5th and Lord Keith four or five days after them. Lord St. Vincent's intention was to collect the whole at Minorca. He would have there nineteen or twenty sail, and Whitshed with five more was off Lisbon the 16th, and would therefore join him a few days after. This is much more than enough to block Toulon, and I hope therefore he will not have interrupted the services of Sicily, Malta, and Alexandria. But he did not know at first of Whitshed being sent, and it is therefore to be feared that he may in his first anxiety have despatched orders to collect his whole force.

“ Lord Bridport has received, and probably has by this time executed orders to detach Gardner with seventeen sail of line to reinforce Lord St. Vincent]. These I presume will continue the blockade of Cadiz. In the meantime it is reported that the Spaniards have sent out seven sail of line from Cadiz, probably to the Havanna. If so they have gained some, though a very inconsiderable advantage from this move, by which France has, at a great expense of men and money, contrived to place us in a much better and more secure position than we were before, both with respect to the facility of naval operations, and also with a view to the most important point of all to us, which of course is that of Ireland.

“ There is not the least ground to fear that any mischief can arise from their being five days before us in the Mediterranean. They had got into Toulon and were repairing and refitting there—operations which in any state of that port, but much more now, would take them some time.

“ Smith writes me word not to believe the Constantinople news of success against Bonaparte. If Hamilton and Lord Nelson’s opinions are to be relied on, the King of Naples must long before this be returned there ; but they are both sanguine, or rather the latter is so, and the other takes any impression that is given him.

“ Pelham has refused Vienna, and Lord Minto will be sent, but I have not yet spoken to him. Wickham returns for a few months to Switzerland, where his assistance will indeed be invaluable to me. He can ill be spared here, but our Jacobins are brought so low that we can leave them for a few months with less attentive watching.

“ The Emperor of Russia will oblige us to have our Irishmen, whom I could have been content to leave in prison where they are. If they are sent to us they must be hanged, and God knows they will deserve it.

“ I leave this open till to-morrow, though I suppose the pleasures of Court dinner and ball will leave me little time to add to it. I have seen Mahony and have recommended him to Almeida. You forgot to recommend him to me, or I have forgot that you did so ; but Lord Spencer did, and that answered the same purpose.” Copy.

COMMODORE SIR W. SIDNEY SMITH to BRIGADIER-GENERAL KOEHLER.

1799, June 4. Acre.—“ I have to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters of the 3rd, 9th, 12th, 23rd, 24th and 26th April, which I find accumulated here on my return from a successful cruise between Jaffa and Damietta to pick up the wreck of Bonaparte’s retreating army, and cut off his supplies meeting him.

"It is needless to say I entirely approve of your obvious plan of campaign, as you see I have successfully executed a principal part of it, and the execution of the rest is easy, as I have successfully sown discontent and insubordination in the French army by the distribution of the proclamation of the Porte among them from high to low, so that a more disorderly army never was seen under arms. Our success will now depend entirely on the early assembly of the forces destined to act against them in Egypt. I have sent positive orders to those committed to my direction to come forward without waiting for each other, that we may profit by the distress of the enemy before they recover after the passage of the desert. I have sent a copy of these orders to my brother, who will no doubt communicate them to you; and shall transmit this letter by another conveyance, in order to multiply the chance of your being early informed of my present movements. I need not tell you how much I long for your presence on the scene of action, where your peculiar talent would much shorten the business. I have hitherto endeavoured to profit by the lessons in the art of land operations which your instructive conversation has frequently given me, and with such success as to make me thankful to you. The Nile will be of course the high road by which the army must be supplied as it advances in Egypt, and from which it never can separate far. I am taking measures to have a respectable flotilla on the coast ready to enter the river when its banks are sufficiently protected by the advancing army; thus each will mutually support each other as at Acre, and Bonaparte has seen that such a combination is an over match for him.

"Major Faed's arrival enables us to begin putting Acre in such a state of defence as will allow of its garrison moving on. The Pasha is too overjoyed at the arrival of an additional Englishman for it to be possible for me to announce, in the same breath when I present him, that you require his immediate return.

"As to the Charon, I can only say that I have been most anxiously waiting for the supplies of ammunition she contains, which, I need not say, were much more wanted in the presence of the enemy than anywhere else. I considered myself as authorised to order her to join me, not knowing she contained anything besides what I had pointed out at Woolwich for the equipment of the flotilla; in which idea I was confirmed by General Rosse's letter of the 17th November, of which I enclose you a copy, to prove to you that I did not act unadvisedly in the business. I have now only to tell you that I am obliged to beg and borrow powder of the Turks, after having spared them mine in action, to ensure your not detaining the Charon from joining me at Aboukir." Copy.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 5. Stowe.—"The newspaper of Tuesday, which I received this morning, explains to me what I had not understood before, namely, your expectation of seeing me in town on Monday, of which I never had the smallest idea ; but having seen the account of what passed in the House of Lords with respect to Lord Berkeley's marriage, it was natural for you to expect to see me there. Perhaps you will be surprised when I tell you that I never had heard of his intention to bring that matter forward ; and that the information which I got this morning at ten o'clock was the first I received that it either had, or was to be discussed ; and I have been very seriously distressed as to my line of conduct. A very confidential communication respecting his connexion with Miss Tudor, or rather with respect to her children then born, had been made by Lord Berkeley to me some years since ; and that communication was, at his desire, made by me to his brother and Mrs. Berkeley. His brother considers that communication as very material on the question ; for, the last time I saw him, namely in May, 1798, he recalled it to my recollection and discussed it with me, repeating the inference which we both drew from it at the time. I can, between the two brothers, have no choice or object but that of justice. I do not even guess whether George Berkeley means to take any part, either now or hereafter, upon this question ; but I should rather imagine that he does. I cannot write to Lord Berkeley upon this subject without committing his brother's name, which I have no authority to do, and which perhaps might make ill blood between them ; and I am very doubtful how far I ought to volunteer on this occasion the disclosure of communications which were strictly confidential, and which I have never mentioned save to his sister Lady Berkeley, with whom Lord Berkeley has, at very many times, conversed very confidentially upon this matter. At the same time I feel that George Berkeley has a right to my evidence, and to that of my wife ; and so has Lord Berkeley. The latter has not called for it, but I should think it highly probable that his brother would. Under these circumstances I should myself move in the House of Lords to postpone any resolution till after the return of Admiral Berkeley, if (as I said before) such a step did not seem likely to give his brother umbrage as with respect to him, from a jealousy that it was done in concert with him ; and for the same reasons I do not choose to write to Lord Bathurst or the Duke of Richmond. But, having the highest confidence in Lord Loughborough's private honour, as well as his great discretion upon these most unpleasant family discussions, I wish you to communicate this letter to him in strict confidence, for no one save Lady Buckingham will know that I have written it, with my earnest request that he would find means of putting off (upon points of order) any final or conclusive resolution till George Berkeley has the means of personally judging for himself what it befits him to do, as with respect to the question itself, or with respect to my evidence and that of Lady Buckingham upon it. And I will beg you very particularly to keep this letter entirely private from everyone save Lord Chancellor. I have long seen this very unpleasant storm gathering, and am very very sorry for it."

The HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1779, June 7. Berlin.—“Au lieu de revenir ici avant-hièr, comme Haugwitz l'avoit annoncé, il accompagna le Roi à Cassel et ne sera que le 14 de retour à Berlin. D'après ce qu'il a dit à son départ, on devoit juger que c'est un bon signe ; du moins étoit-il d'avis qu'on devoit le regarder comme tel. Il n'a pas écrit ni à Mr. Grenville ni au Comte Panin, mais il a donné de ses nouvelles au Comte de Ginck, et celui-ci a dit hièr au Panin, avec sa circonspection ordinaire, que Haugwitz paroissoit content de son voyage et du Duc de Brunswic ; ainsi c'est un motif de plus d'espérer. On peut d'ailleurs compter que si le Landgravé de Hesse est consulté, ce qui semble être l'intention, il travaillera et conseillera tout à fait dans le bon sens ; et pour lors les lettres de l'Empereur de Russie, qui en a écrit à ces deux Princes, comme j'en rendis compte dernièrement par rapport au dernier, pourront faire encore leur effet. Il n'y a, en attendant, rien à faire de notre côté que d'avoir patience encore une dizaine de jours, et même, d'après l'avis de Mr. Grenville, je fais rester Tuyll ici, qui est venu prendre des instructions avant de partir pour la Flandre, et qui étoit porteur de très-longues lettres d'Ivoy, qui a établi une communication avec Ruys et Michiels, et par lequel canal nous avons appris que le Duc de Brunswic cherche à avoir des renseignemens sur les Paÿs-bas.” Extract.

INTELLIGENCE RESPECTING HOLLAND, from M. d'Yroy.

1799, June 8. Emerick.—“En Hollande les défaites des Français influent sur les meneurs : tout annonce confusion, et abattement. On travaille sans plan à remettre l'Yssel en état de défense, tandis que d'autres ouvrages annoncent l'incertitude contre qui ils devront servir. On s'attend à voir arriver le 21 du courant la colonne Russe destinée pour la Bavière. Un corps nombreux des mêmes troupes se trouve rassemblé sur les frontières du côté de la Prusse-méridionale, et le bruit se soutient toujours que quelques milliers d'hommes de la même nation seront sous peu débarqués dans le Holstein. On voit clairement que les meneurs en Hollande prévoient le terme de leur domination s'avancer à grands pas, qu'ils se doutent de quelque dessein des puissances, mais ne savent de quel côté cela viendra. Delà la confusion de tous leurs plans et la nullité de tous leurs travaux. La réquisition, loin d'être poussé avec vigueur, trouve les plus grandes entraves, suggérées par les Directeurs même. Le nombre de François, diminué à vue d'œil, et l'exportation libre de tous effets mobiliers, défendue depuis 9 ans, décrétée aujourd'hui, n'est que pour faciliter la retraite de ceux qui sentent ne pouvoir attendre le dénouement.”

Ce qui suit étoit en chiffre.

m'entretenir avec plusieurs Belges émigrés, qui ci-devant étoient membres du Gouvernement : chez la majeure partie j'ai trouvé l'inclination marquée de voir s'effectuer une réunion de leur pays avec les Provinces-Unies sous un même chef, et c'est avec le plus grand plaisir que j'ai vu qu'il n'existoit aucune dissension sur le choix de ce chef, au cas que les Puissances, dont dépendra le sort de ces deux pays, n'aient point de raisons de s'y opposer. J'ai toujours craint que la différence de religion feroit du côté des Belges une difficulté insurmontable; ou bien que lors même qu'ils glisseroient sur ce point dans le premier moment, cette différence pourroit dans la suite amener des troubles nuisibles pour l'autorité souveraine dans des momens de mécontentement. Mais j'ai été tranquilisé sur ce point, et j'ai trouvé à cet égard un esprit de tolérance et de modération chez ceux même qui par état sont le plus attachés à la religion Catholique Romaine, et que toute difficulté de ce côté-là est levée. Les Belges, et surtout ceux du Brabant, ne désirent aucun changement dans leur constitution, et toute autre forme de gouvernement qu'on voudrait leur donner que celle d'un souverain sur le pied de la joyeuse entrée, ne les contenteroit pas. Il y en a même qui m'ont demandé pourquoi si les Provinces-Unies faisoient des difficultés, et qu'on ne jugeât point prudent de faire adopter à ces Provinces la même forme, on ne pourroit pas être à la fois Stadhouder des 7 et souverain des 10; que, quant à eux, ils envisageoient la réunion, non des 17 provinces entre elles, mais sous un même chef, comme le plus grand bonheur pour les deux pays; que le souverain, prenant l'engagement de ne point aliéner ni séparer les dites provinces, devoit être le seul lien qui les associât; qu'on devrait bien se garder d'établir entre elles un pacte d'union, ou d'en former un seul corps, représenté par une assemblée d'Etats-Généraux : qu'en prenant pour base du gouvernement dans chaque province en particulier la joyeuse entrée du Brabant, le souverain obtiendrait toute l'autorité nécessaire pour gouverner cet ensemble, et que chaque province conservant sa constitution primitive, aucune d'elles n'auroit à se plaindre, puisqu'un chacun conserveroit ses loix et ses privilèges, sa religion, et sa liberté. Les obligations du souverain consistent (1) à ne point lever de taxes que du consentement des états; (2) à faire rendre justice à chacun par son juge compétent, et d'après les lois établies; (3) à n'introduire aucun étranger dans les charges de l'état. Pour le reste l'autorité souveraine réside dans le chef. C'est sur ce pied que je m'assure que les Belges verroient avec plaisir, désirent même, que cette union se fasse; mais on n'en est encore qu'au sentiment particulier de quelques individus, qui, une fois assurés et instruits des intentions des Puissances à cet égard, n'adopteront pas seulement pour eux-mêmes cette forme, mais contribueront par leur influence à la faire confirmer par le voeu unanime du peuple. Ceci n'est point une nouveauté pour les Belges. En 1715 le même plan a existé; en 1791 ils l'auroient exécuté avec plaisir; mais à ces deux époques ils furent rendus à la maison d'Autriche, ce que les rend scrupuleux aujourd'hui à faire plus que d'exprimer leur désir, et s'expliquer par manière de conversation particulière sur la forme à adopter, et les moyens d'y parvenir. Si les Puissances, dont le sort de la Belgique dépendra, pouvoient dans ce moment s'expliquer sur leurs intentions à cet égard, si elles pouvoient donner aux Belges ne fut ce que l'assurance de leur disposition à établir cette réunion, et à y consentir pour le bonheur des deux pays, au cas que les circonstances rendent la dite réunion possible, on verroit les Belges marcher avec confiance vers ce but, et ne rien négliger pour en assurer le succès; mais tant qu'on ne peut s'expliquer à ce sujet, la possibilité de se voir ramener sous la domination Autrichienne, et l'incertitude des vues que les Puissances ont sur eux, les rend circonspects et sur leurs gardes afin de ne pas se compromettre. Il y a quelques semaines que j'en ai écrit à Berlin, mais j'ai eu pour réponse qu'on croyait trop prématuré encore que l'Angleterre put s'expliquer sur un point de cette importance." Extract.

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MINTO.

1799, June 8. Dropmore.—“In consequence of what passed in conversation between us a short time since, I lose no time in mentioning to you that Sir M. Eden's quitting his present situation being now finally determined on, I should have the greatest pleasure in being permitted by your Lordship to submit your name to the King for the important duties of that situation, on the active and able discharge of which the interests of this country so much depend in the present moment.

“As it is wished that the termination of Sir M. Eden's mission should be arranged in the manner the most satisfactory to his feelings, it will be desirable that the circumstance of your being destined to it should not be publicly declared till the return of the messenger now sent to Vienna; but I am very anxious that you should, in the meantime, make such preparations as may enable you to set out with the least possible delay after Sir M. Eden's resignation is received.” Copy.

LORD MINTO to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 9. Roehampton.—“I am this moment honoured by your Lordship's letter of yesterday, and am much flattered by your opinion that the important affairs of the mission to Vienna may be confided to me, and I beg you to accept my best thanks for this mark of your Lordship's confidence. The strong sense I entertain of the importance attached to the affairs of that quarter in the present moment would make me more diffident of myself, if I were not encouraged by reflecting that I shall act only under your direction; and I need only add that I shall hold myself ready to obey your commands whenever you are pleased to call upon me.

"It will be matter of real satisfaction, and indeed relief to my mind, that my appointment should stand clear of everything uncomfortable respecting Sir M. E[den], and I shall be careful to observe the caution you prescribe on that subject.

"One of the preparations I should be most anxious to make for my departure would be to peruse the correspondence from Vienna, and I shall take the liberty of applying to your Office for leave to do so, if your Lordship does not disapprove of it."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 9. Stowe.—"Your resolution to suppress my letter in consequence of the determination to keep the question upon Lord Berkeley's marriage open till George Berkeley returns, is exactly what I could wish. Nothing can pain me more than to be obliged to appear as an evidence on such a subject, and I should not have written even to you upon it if I had not feared that the chapter might have been closed without an opportunity having been given to the brother to act and speak for himself. It is impossible that Lord B[erkeley] in his character of husband, father, and brother, can come out of this fiery trial to advantage. His line of conduct, upon his own statement, is most incorrect, as well as most silly; but those who do not believe the statement he makes of his first marriage will, of course, think that no conduct can be more dishonest. I was aware of all the circumstances you have stated, except the averment that the first marriage was by banns; and I perfectly agree with you that no parson could have publicly proclaimed those banns in Berkeley church, or registered the marriage afterwards in the public register, without an immediate discovery of both those steps. The character of Hipsman (son to an old governess of Lord Berkeley's sister) always was most villainous, and his share in this transaction adds to the doubts upon it. I am most happy that I was not in London when Lord Berkeley called upon you to make his communications, which you cannot have been more anxious to avoid than I should.

"I am now to request from you two favours, neither of them, as I hope, very troublesome; the one a common letter to Sir M. Eden recommending in the usual manner to his protection Mr. Blaquiere, who is arrived at Vienna from Munich on his travels, and whom my particular friend Sir J. Blaquiere, his father, requested through John Beresford, that I would recommend to you for a letter of this description.

"My second favour is that you would recommend for the honour of knighthood my friend Dr. Pegge, who wants to be Sir Christopher Pegge, who is to be presented to the King as major of the Oxford volunteers on Wednesday the 18th. He is an Oxford Professor of Anatomy; his brother Professor at Cambridge has been knighted. Hinc lacrymæ! till you wipe them from his cheek, by notifying to him the King's consent through me to this high honour. Setting aside this folly, in which I suspect his wife has the greatest share, he is a most excellent good man, and very high in his profession, and the real father of all the Oxford armed associations."

LORD GRENVILLE to the LORD CHANCELLOR [LOUGHBOROUGH].

1799, June 10. Dropmore.—"I send you a letter which appears to me to be well deserving of attention.

"There could, I think, be no objection to, 1. Expunging the present power of licence or approbation given to the Grand Master, a person totally unknown to the law or to Parliament.

"2. Requiring all Lodges now existing to register themselves and the names of their members with the Clerk of the Peace for the place where they meet.

"3. Prohibiting any new Lodge from being formed; and

"4. Empowering the Quarter Sessions, at their discretion, to dissolve any existing Lodge.

"5. Obliging all new members of any old Lodge to register themselves within six months after their admission. And in case these conditions are not complied with, subjecting the meetings to the general provisions of the Act.

Postscript. "I am sorry to trouble you again about Lord Dunstanville, but, you will see by the inclosed, I cannot avoid it." Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 10. Wimbledon.—"I received your letter last night. If the possession of the island you mention would have the effect of enabling Lord St. Vincent more effectually to blockade Toulon, it is certainly most desirable, and is an additional ground of regret in the deficiency of our offensive force. By the despatches which went some time ago, Lord St. Vincent, for the safety of Minorca, is entitled to make a call upon the Portugal force, and likewise to call for one regiment from Gibraltar. I can extend that liberty to the other object by tomorrow's despatches, but I do not perceive that I have the means to do more at the present moment without disturbing the arrangement I have made to be ready to execute our engagements at the isle of Walcheren, if called upon for that purpose. The enclosed paper will show you the arrangement I have made. They are a body of excellent troops, and I trust adequate to the purpose, but it would not be wise to take anything from it; and I am only enabled to do it by borrowing from Ireland and Jersey and Guernsey, having in view to replace the force so borrowed by the fencible regiments now raising for European service."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, June 10. Berlin.—“I take advantage of the suspension of business produced by Haugwiz’s journey, and sit down to answer a few detached questions in your last letters which I have not yet had occasion to notice. When you ask me my opinion of the comparative merits of Lord Minto and of Pelham, I think I cannot answer you according to my own ideas more satisfactorily, than by referring you to what you yourself officially know of them, and by reminding you how much more secure from humour, irritation, and eccentricity you would find your correspondence with Pelham than you can hope to find it with Lord Minto. I know Pelham well enough to feel confident in his good sense and good judgment, in his close observation of the tempers of other men, and in the perfect command which he has of his own; added to which he has a natural cheerfulness and gentleness of disposition which very much assists him in communications of business, and makes all transactions with him more easy as well as more agreeable. Lord Minto’s talents are superior to Pelham’s as applied to any single object of composition, and I have no doubt that he would write a better argument and make a better speech than Pelham could do; but for the average of business, including conduct, discretion, and temper, I should have no doubt in preferring infinitely the commoner to the peer, and I believe you will trace this opinion very strongly if you converse with the Duke of Portland, who has corresponded so much both privately and officially with both of them. They are however both of them in the class which I adverted to in my last letter, and you will already have seen in that letter how important it appeared to me to be that you should give yourself the best materials which can be found, in order to give to the business of your department all the advantages to which it is so well entitled in your hands. Did I ever name to you upon these subjects the name of Lord Amherst? He is a young man with whom I am personally not much acquainted, but the little that I have seen of him has given me a very good opinion of him; and I have heard from many who know him well so high a character of him, that I cannot help thinking that he would be an acquisition to you in the foreign line; his rank in life would make his appointment creditable, his talents would, I believe, make it useful to you, and his very limited income would probably make it convenient to himself, and enable you from his youth to place him at some of the second courts, the missions to which would be infinitely more sought after if two or three such appointments could take place. In the same view, among the peers, Lord Boringdon might perhaps also occupy the subordinate situation of a second or third rate court, till occasions of promotion should occur; the names of Lord Hobart and Lord Bathurst I do not mention, both because they are obvious enough, and because they apply only to the highest class of business; whereas, in my view, I want to see your succession-house well stored, besides all that is wanted of the best for immediate use and consumption. You once thought of proposing some such matter to Lord Carysfort ; I do not know whether he would be inclined to it, but I should think that he might like it for a year or two, and that it might not be disagreeable to him ; if so, and if Elisabeth could take to it, I believe they would both like it and be amused with it, and I am persuaded that he would do well in it ; but perhaps these are all dreams and visions.

“ You ask me concerning Diemar ; he is, I believe, a Swiss, has been in our service in some of the foreign levies of this war, and was, I believe, in the commissariat in Flanders ; he has long been well known to general Stamford, and it is upon Stamford’s authority that I stated Diemar’s Cuxhaven intelligence as being to be depended upon ; our general thinks he will be likely to be of use in the necessary arrangements in the principality of Yevern, as he perfectly knows every inch of that country, and is well versed in the knowledge of the commissariat part of his profession ; meantime he is at present only in quality of post-chaise friend and companion to Petersburg. The mention of these last names reminds me of the business upon which they are employed, and of the desire which you shew in your last letter to keep clear of any large embarkation of cavalry ; I believe I have neglected to tell you that I had already spoken in the same sense to Stamford, and that I found his opinions entirely agreed with those which I see you entertain ; the idea therefore upon which we had agreed was to embark at Revel only a small body of dismounted cavalry with all the necessary accoutrements, and trust to Frieseland and Groningen for mounting them when they arrive. If the French should be able to collect any considerable force in Flanders, it will then be necessary to have the assistance of English cavalry in a country where they can act with so much advantage ; but for the first landing in the neighbourhood of Delfzyll, the dismounted Russian cavalry would easily find a sufficient number of horses ; or if it be thought more advisable, those horses might be provided in Yevern which is accessible, as I am told, by a tolerably good seaport, and which is always considered in our military conversations here as the most advantageous spot for a depot of every description. The more I consider this project of attack the more partial do I grow to it, nor can I figure to myself any formidable difficulty to encounter in the execution of it, if either by fair means or by foul you can pass them along the Eyder ; for the difference between this course and that of the Northern Ocean may decide upon the success of the enterprise, and perhaps may decide the Court of Petersburg as to the engaging in it. The feverish state of English politics at Copenhagen seems to offer very little resource upon this point, but I endeavour to persuade myself that if the Emperor’s vanity be well engaged in the prospect of recovering Holland by Russian regiments, he will not be pushed out of his project by the Danish punt-poles in the river Eyder.

“ If I had a mind to hunt after new sources of uneasiness I should dwell more than I do upon Panin’s last letters from Petersburg, which hint at some uneasiness arising there with respect to Stockholm about their Finland frontier; it had gone far enough for Paul to recall from his German corps one or two of his officers who have served in Sweden, and to begin to make some military arrangements for the possibility of Swedish war; but I trust that this irritation will have subsided in the last anti-Gallican declaration of the King of Sweden, and that they will shake hands, and threaten the French Directory at Paris instead of blustering at one another upon the banks of the Kiemen. In truth, however, one cannot but be uneasy in observing all the dangerous violence, precipitation, and change which mark the character of the Emperor, and the total want of ability and influence to keep it within any degree of bounds or discretion; if, however, these evils weaken the solid grounds of our alliance there, they ought to be a spur to us to make the best advantage of the moment there, and to employ every possible effort in this instant, for fear the next should breed some new caprice and inconsistency as little to be accounted for as those which we have seen. It is not unimportant in the present moment to keep up at Petersburg the dislike and distrust which the Emperor has shewn of the continuance or extension of the Prussian system of neutrality; and you will see in my despatch 36 that I cannot help expressing some suspicion that the princely conferences which belong to the Royal Prussian progress may look much more towards a continuance of this same blessed system, than to any prudent or manly change of it.

“Whitworth’s despatch to you under flying seal is just arrived; I do not much relish the languid and diffident tone in which he chants forth the difficulties of the measure, instead of looking them manfully in the face, and hurrying the troops on board as he ought to do, and as I trust Stamford will make him do when he arrives there. I am likewise a little disturbed at the indiscretion of writing en clair, for the benefit of the Prussian government, of the jealousy prevailing at Vienna against Suwaroff, and of the Wirtemberg application for English money supported by the interference of the Russian minister; surely if there is any Court in Europe in which it would have been wise to have kept these points of discussion secret, Berlin is par préférence the very Court which one should have most wished to have kept in ignorance; but these are subordinate considerations when compared to the object of the grand expedition; do try and make Whitworth put his shoulders to it with good heart. Panin begins to be afraid of its failing at Petersburg, and I see that he is driving at me to go there and help it, but there are many reasons against this, three of which are I think sufficient to mention: in the first place what can be done in that way will be done by Stamford; in the next place there is not time for new hands in that business; in the third place, faint as our hopes are here, it is not fit to abandon them till the answer is given, though I hope little from it.”

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, June 11. London.—“I received this morning your despatches Nos. 33 and 34, and very much concur in your reasoning respecting the subjects of both; but as one day more would probably enable you to throw new light on both, I have determined not to write any answer by to-night’s post, especially as the wind is still East.

“The subject of your private letter gives me much uneasiness, but the thing is done and unremediable. It is only a new reason for things as they are.” Copy.

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 11. Northampton.—“I am much obliged to you for a sight of the enclosed, which I return herewith. The reason for recalling the squadron from the Elbe was rather (as you may recollect) for the purpose of facilitating some naval arrangement we wanted to make with the ships that composed it, than on any political ground. If your brother should state any apprehension of the necessity of a defence for that river, we can easily resume the station when it is wanted, and we shall, of course, send some more small vessels to that coast, when our operations now preparing in Russia come into execution.

“I am here in the midst of yeomanry and dust, and cannot help mentioning on the occasion the extremely good spirit which appears to pervade every part of this country; the improvement which has taken place in it within these last two or three years is as surprising as it is comfortable.

“I am afraid your brother’s news about Genoa is not founded; it would be a most material point to have possession of. I had already that of the isles of Hières, and I am persuaded from what Lord St. Vincent once said to me on that subject that it will not be absent from his mind; but some officers to whom I mentioned it some time since in conversation seemed to think that they were very strongly fortified.”

Postscript. “I shall be in town on Thursday; I could not avoid attending my corps here, and I hope I shall not miss any vote on the Slave Trade question.”

1799, June 13. Cleveland Row.—“With respect to architectural pursuits, I really believe all has been done by travellers, and by the magnificent publications of their discoveries, that could reasonably be expected now; and I do not think that we could (at least certainly not from any funds at the disposal of the Foreign Department) defray, with any propriety, the expense of that encouragement which a person qualified, as you mention, would be entitled to expect for such an undertaking. It is very difficult for me to form any accurate calculation of the expenses of the embassy, but the line I adopted was not fixed without a good deal of consideration. I really am inclined to think you will not find it below the mark. You must consider that, although in some respects the representation may equal (or even in a few points exceed) that of a mission to a Christian Court, there are other points in which, the society being so much more limited, your expense must be much less. And you are, no doubt, aware how much this allowance exceeds that of any former case.

"I perfectly know that you have no wish upon the subject but that of discharging the duties of the embassy in a manner creditable to yourself and to your country, and I cannot help hoping that this may be done on the footing proposed." Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, June 14. Berlin.—"You will easily see that the chief object of my sending to-day to Cuxhaven is to give you immediate information of the ready disposition which Van Braam has shewn to manage the junction of the Dutch fleet of the Texel with that of Lord Duncan, whenever he shall be assured of foreign troops being ready to assist the restoration of the Stadtholder. I flatter myself that moment is now so near that instant measures ought to be taken for assuring the means of this co-operation; the only conditions which I understand him to insist upon are that he shall receive an order from the Stadtholder to take this step, and that he shall be fully satisfied upon the point of the Dutch ships being treated by us as allies, and being not required to strike their flag or do any act of submission; he undertakes to control Storey, he assures the consent of the generality of the fleet, and he answers for every officer on board of his own ship except one; he further requires that some officers of the old establishment shall be ready to join the ships under his command, which do not at present exceed the number of five of the line and eight or ten frigates, the others not being yet manned. The reason of his waiting for some order or opportunity to go out is that some new batteries have been erected upon the Texel and the Helder, and he believes those batteries, which have been erected to control the fleet, would completely destroy it if it declared itself in port.

"I have thought the secrecy of this communication so necessary to its success, that I have abstained from mentioning the particulars in my despatch, but have thought it best to refer you entirely to the letter written upon this subject by Robert Fagel to his brother, because that enclosure will give you all the information which I have, and it may be as little communicated as you please. I learn besides from Fagel that General Daendels is now very actively employing himself in fortifying the line of the Greb, upon which five or six hundred men are incessantly employed; but by his account the French force in the country appears to be still less than our other informations have described, and he is persuaded that all the new levies which they are endeavouring to make there, will join the Stadtholder's army whenever it shall appear. Fagel however does not believe in Daendels being accessible to any offers from the Orange party, but he considers him as a most determined and active enemy, and one who is much esteemed by the common soldiers in Holland; what strikes me most in his report upon the general state of things is the reluctance and terror which he finds still to prevail so as to make every man, however anxious for a change, tremble at the idea of committing himself by any decided act; and it is evidently his opinion that some leading men must be immediately sought and found to give the proper tone in this business. I have done what I can to occupy the Prince here with these details, and he very readily engages in them, but nevertheless I trust that the Greffier and you are likewise working and making the Princess work upon this very interesting scene. I do not find any other person to be very much consulted or very confidentially employed by the Prince except M. d'Yvoy and M. de Thuil, but I presume that it is known to the Greffier and to the Stadtholder who are the persons to be brought forward in the different parts of the United Provinces; as however I never think anything is clearly understood till it can be clearly stated, I have recommended to the Prince to endeavour to state upon paper the exact position and duty of some leading individuals in every part of the United Provinces, and perhaps you will agree in thinking that the Greffier would very usefully assist such a general plan of arrangements. There certainly appears to be a want of a few men with talents leading enough in the country to become the points round which the loose and unsettled disposition of the people may collect and form itself; I have no doubt that this is to be found, and hitherto my fear has been that it would shew itself too soon; but approaching as near as we now do, I cannot help thinking that every possible arrangement should now become complete, in order that, in the moment of action, there may be nothing left to do but to execute what had been preconceived. My wish therefore certainly would be to have drawn out upon paper such a plan of arrangements throughout the whole country as might immediately be executed whenever the military measures can begin; and as I do not see sufficient means for that arrangement in any body here, I cannot help earnestly recommending the consideration of it to those who have a competent knowledge both of the country and of the influencing persons in it.

"I begin to be surprised that I hear nothing of general Stamford, and shall be very anxious for the arrival of the messenger whom Whitworth talks, in his last despatch, of sending speedily; we have not heard of our general since his leaving Dantzick, yet if he was ill, he would surely have made colonel Diemar write to us; I trust therefore that all is going on as it ought, and I do not, for my part, see how it is possible that our enterprise should fail. It is not as easy to engage my friend Panin in naval as in military arrangements, but I have at last completely succeeded with him, and he has written to his Court a long and pressing letter earnestly recommending the immediate adoption of your plan.

"I know not what to think of the result of the Cassell conferences, not having heard one word of Haugwiz. Fagel met general Pichégru two days ago on his road to Münster, where he was going to meet two or three officers of the Dusseldorff army; Pichégru said that the Duke of Brunswick had told him he believed that Prussia would act, but Pichégru added that everybody else told him they would not, and that he rather himself believed in this latter opinion. For my own part, I still suspect that some half-measure is in agitation. You will see that I cannot refrain from putting Whitworth upon his guard against the Emperor's suffering his new protégés of Bavaria and Wirtemberg to be put within the possible scope of Prussian neutrality. It is not that I have any information upon this head, but I cannot get rid of an indistinct suspicion that our friends here will perhaps endeavour to find some mode of ostensibly preparing a confederacy against France, but that their measures, both in their shape and their real object, will be directed to an extension of their neutral system in Germany, by which at Berlin they will fancy that they provide a security against France and against Austria, without committing themselves to the danger and expense of actual hostility; some such proposition therefore I expect as may belong to such motives, and am guarding against it as well as I can by telling their secret before they have ripened it into a regular project. The idea of summoning France to respect Prussian territory, and to restore the United Provinces, all seems to me to belong to some such notion as I have described; and you will observe that, whenever there has latterly been question of Prussia declaring itself, they have always been seeking for the means of reconciling their declaration of war with a continuance of their system of neutrality; and if they did this two months ago, they will surely be not less disposed to do so now that, by their jealousy of Austria, their German interests are so much more awakened. But why should I weary you with speculations, when a few days will enable me to give you the better grounds of facts?

"I send you a statement of losses by wreck which is considerably within the mark, but if you think either the sum or any of the articles improperly stated, pray do not scruple to draw your pen across them. Mr. Coutts's book offering a perfect blank, it is an object that what is to be paid, should, if possible, be paid immediately."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 15. Berlin.—"I do not wonder that in the multiplicity of all that you have to remember, the name of Count O'Mahony and the recommendation which I gave you of him by General Stamford's desire, should have escaped your recollection; yet you will find that in two letters, one public and the other private, I have mentioned him as an officer highly recommended by General Stamford as a fit person to be second in the command of which there was question. The other officer whom I named has not yet been found by such enquiries as could be made, and therefore it is that I have not repeated the discussion of that subject.

"We had yesterday the satisfaction of hearing from General Stamford; he had been delayed by a fever upon the road, but he was entirely recovered, and thought himself sure of arriving at Petersburg on the 11th or 12th inst. The Vienna post is come in this morning, but it brings no news of the armies, though it contains an invitation from the Emperor to the Diet of Ratisbon to send deputies to Villingen to assist at the examination of all that relates to the death of the French Ministers at Radstadt.

"I find that letters are just arrived to Count Panin from Marshal Suwarow at Turin dated 29th ultimo. They contain an account of the taking of Turin and of the beginning of the siege of the citadel; they also mention the occupation of the city of Alexandria and the blockade of that citadel, where there is a garrison of 1,500 men; they further state the retreat of Moreau to Coni with the remainder of his army, consisting of 10,000 men only, though he is said to have received reinforcements from France since his arrival at Coni. A copy of Suwaroff's letter is sent to Count Woronzow.

"M. de Haugwiz is expected to arrive this evening, though I do not find that he has written to say so; it seems that the King of Prussia prolonged his stay at Cassel, and that circumstance is said to have delayed the return of M. de Haugwiz to Berlin."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, June 16. Berlin.—"You will easily see how infinite is the satisfaction which I feel in forwarding to you the despatches from Petersburg which announce the formal acceptance of the project for the deliverance of Holland. I ought not however to conceal from you that M. de Kotchoubey has written to Count Panin to say that all the Russian troops being now upon the frontiers of Prussia, he believes it will be difficult to furnish the necessary body of men ready for embarkation before the month of August; I hope however that our coadjutors at Petersburg will not give way to this difficulty of time, and I am at a loss to conceive how it is possible that the distance from the Prussian frontier to Revel should require anything like the interval of time which is mentioned by the Russian Minister. The Emperor appears to be so dissatisfied with the account which he had received from Count Panin of the fate of our projet d'article secret at Berlin, that he has directed Count Panin to avail himself of this opportunity to go to Carlsbadt, and he accordingly proposes to set out on the 20th instant for the baths of that place and take leave of the King, leaving M. de Sievers here as chargé d'affaires; he has availed himself of this new order by making Count Finckenstein sensible how much danger there is of exasperating the Emperor by these repeated delays, and as the Emperor's order contains in it an expression that orders will be sent to Count Panin at Carlsbadt relative to his future destination, Count Panin has given it to be understood that it is very doubtful whether he shall ever return to Berlin; he has moreover proposed to Count Finckenstein to send a courier to Count Haugwiz to apprise him of these circumstances, and he has offered to meet Count Haugwiz upon the road, in case there should be really anything substantial to do. All this is likely to be useful in urging them here. Count Panin thinks that there is some danger at Petersburg of the Emperor being diverted from the immediate Baltic project by the expectations which he will have of the Minden and Cassel conferences, which had not been announced to him at the time of Fabiani's departure. I trust however to Stamford for goading them well at Petersburg, and hope you will help as much as possible the same spirit from Whitworth. I will not detain the tardy Fabiani. Adieu. The enclosed notice comes through Schulembourg, who is Ministre de Police."

Enclosure.

"Otto, chargé d'affaires du gouvernement François à la cour de Berlin, vient de recevoir une lettre d'un émigré François résidant à Londres par laquelle il lui donne avis que plusieurs agents de l'Angleterre sont chargés d'enrôler les émigrés Hollandoises et les militaires au service de l'ancienne république des Provinces—Unies, pour en former un corps de troupes régulières pour le service du Stadhouder. On désigne le duché d'Oldenbourg et les environs de Brême comme les points de rassemblement, et on indique avec beaucoup de détail les personnes chargées de l'opération.

"Cet avis a été envoyé au Directoire par Otto, et sa lettre aiant été ouverte à la poste, M. le Comte de S[chulembourg] a découvert la trahison, dont il a donné connoissance au Comte de Panin pour en prévenir [le Cabinet] de Londres. On ne sait pas le nom de l'émigré François."

GENERAL DE STAMFORD to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, June 18. St. Petersburg.—"Sans m'arrêter à vous faire le récit de tous les accidens qui ont retardé mon arrivée en cette ville, pour le moins de 5 à 6 jours, je vais aborder tout de suite la question principale, celle qui concerne l'objet de ma mission.

"M. le Chevalier Whitworth vous apprendra que tout est en règle pour ce qui régarde le nombre de troupes que sa Majesté l'Empereur des Russies croit pouvoir fournir pour l'expédition sur la Hollande. Elle a fixé ce nombre à 18 milles hommes, ce qui me paroît suffisant, vu les 8 milles hommes qu'on espère que fournira la Suède. Quant à cet article je me suis parfaitement rencontré avec M. Popham; mais quant au point d'attaque sur les provinces de Groningue et de Frise, nos opinions étoient d'abord un peu différentes. Je me suis trouvé vouloir attaquer le taureau par le flanc, lui par les cornes.

“ Le projet de M. Popham consiste, pour ce qui régarde ces deux provinces, à porter une force de 9 milles hommes dans l’isle d’Ameland ; à fournir de là des armes, des munitions, et des troupes, s’il le faut, aux habitans de la Frise et de la Groningue, qu’il dit savoir disposés à se débarrasser eux-mêmes de leurs oppresseurs ; et à faire avec le reste des forces, et celles qu’y joindra l’Angleterre, une descente en Zéelande, dont, à mon avis, il a parfaitement bien combiné les opérations.

“ J’ai eu l’honneur de vous expliquer dans plusieurs entretiens que nous avons eûs ensemble à Berlin sur le chapitre de ces descentes, les raisons qui me faisoient préférer, à tout autre projet, celui de pénétrer dans la Groningue du côté de Delfzyl, et je vais prendre la liberté de vous retracer ici sommairement ces mêmes raisons.

“ 1° En opérant une descente avec 15 milles hommes près de Delfzyl, je me rendois probablement maître de cette place en y jettant quelques bombes, et je me procurois par là une première place d’armes très importante.

“ 2° En même tems que je me présentois devant Delfzyl, je pouvois porter des troupes sur le fort de Buyrtang et sur Coeverden ; et il y a bien peu d’apparence que, vû le dénûment où se trouvent ces deux places, ainsi que Swartsluys et Zwol, elles se fussent disposées à faire quelque résistance.

“ 3° Maître de ces points, je l’étois des provinces de Frise et de Groningue, et je pouvois, en me trouvant au milieu de leurs habitans, avec bien plus de fondement compter sur leurs bonnes dispositions. qu’on ne pourra le faire lorsqu’on ne sera qu’en possession de quelques-unes des îles sur les côtes de la Frise.

“ 4° L’ennemi vouloit-il porter des secours de troupes dans ces deux provinces, j’étois en état de l’en empêcher, en prenant avec les miennes une position sur le Vecht, d’où je pouvois moi-même faire des incursions dans les provinces de Gueldre et d’Overysse, qui probablement n’auroient pas tardées à se soulever en faveur de la bonne cause.

“ 5° Enfin, une fois établis dans la Frise et la Groningue, j’attirois indubitablement dans mon parti la majeure partie de l’armée Hollandoise, que je pouvois employer dans les places, tandis qu’avec les troupes étrangères, je pénétrois plus avant dans la république.

“ M. Popham a objecté à ces argumens. 1° Qu’ une descente du côté de Delfzyl seroit regardé par la Prusse comme une infraction faite à sa ligne de neutralité, puisqu’elle prétendoit avoir la souveraineté sur les deux branches de l’embouchure de l’Ems, appelées l’Ooster et la Wester Ems. 2° Que s[a] M[ajesté] l’Emp[ereur] des Russies ayant déjà donné son entière approbation au projet d’attaque de M. Popham, ce seroit peut-être l’en dégoûter tout-à-fait, que de lui montrer des difficultés, ou de lui proposer des changemens.

“ Vous pensez bien, que j’aurais eu bien des choses à opposer à la première de ces objections, mais que je n’avois rien à répondre à la seconde. Cette dernière me parut en effet si grave, que je ne hésitai pas un instant à entrer dans les vuës de

M. Popham, et me proposai tout de suite de les appuyer auprès de l'Empereur, s'il arrivoit que sa Majesté daignât m'en parler. Tout bien considéré, il faut se demander ici de quoi s'agit-il? De dégager la Hollande. Or, que cela se fasse, en dirigeant l'attaque principale contre la Zéelande, d'après le plan de M. Popham, ou contre les provinces de Groningue et de Frise, d'après le projet de M. Stamford, peu importe, pourvu que les chances soient à peu près égales, comme elles le sont en effet.

“Vous voyez, d'après ce que je viens d'avoir l'honneur de vous dire, que c'est la réussite de la chose qui me tient à cœur et non la gloriole de la faire marcher conformément à mes vues, pour qu'il m'en revienne un peu plus d'honneur. C'est vous dire en peu de mots que j'ai tellement adopté le plan de M. Popham que je l'envisage dès à présent comme s'il m'appartenait; mais soyez sûr en même tems que je n'en agis ainsi que par ce que je le trouve bon,—parfaitement bon. S'il en étoit autrement je vous le dirais avec cette franchise que vous me connoissez. Je suis trop pressé aujourd'hui pour m'entretenir plus longtems avec vous, quelque envie que j'en aye, et je suis affligé de n'avoir pas le tems d'écrire un mot de lettre à notre excellent Comte de Panin. Veuillez me rappeler à son souvenir. Je lui suis attaché ainsi qu'à vous par tous les sentiments qu'une vénération sans bornes peut inspirer.”

INTELLIGENCE RESPECTING HOLLAND.

M. d'YVOY to H. FAGEL.

1799, June 19. Emerick.—“J'eus hiër quelqu'un du pay's chez moi, qui m'a assuré que Daendels a perdu toute confiance, et qu'on travaille à le culbutter. On se plaint beaucoup de la peur et du peu de support qu'on a à attendre des anciens Régens. Personne presque n'ose ni ne désire se mêler des affaires. La majeure partie des bien-intentionnés est dans le même cas. M. d'Enghuysen vient me voir de temps à autre; il est très-bien disposé, et ne ménage rien pour la bonne cause. Je me flatte d'avoir trouvé moyen d'établir des correspondances dans les différens ports de la Hollande, et dans les villes de Dort et Delft pour les magasins. Mais comme jusqu'ici je n'ai encore aucune certitude de ce que je puis employer à cela, je dois aller avec trop de retenue pour m'en promettre une expédition aussi prompte que cela mériterait. Quant à la correspondance directe, la défense de la pêche sur la côte y porte grand obstacle, les gouvernails et agrès de tous les batimens pêcheurs ayant été enlevés. J'attends réponse s'il sera possible de l'établir avec l'escadre Anglaise devant le Texel même, et je ne désespère point que cela pourra s'exécuter, puisqu'on m'assure qu'il n'est pas difficile d'entretenir commerce avec eux devant le Texel. Je serois charmé en attendant qu'on m'instruisit (1) comment et à qui je pourrai adresser mes lettres; (2) si dans un cas pressant je puis envoyer mes lettres par estafette jusqu'à Cuxhaven à l'agent des paquet-boats; tant que la correspondance directe ne sera pas établie, elles pourront arriver de cette façon à temps, et ne seront pas huit jours entre Cuxhaven et ici, comme c'est le cas en écrivant par la poste ordinaire; 3^o à qui en ce cas je devrai les adresser en Angleterre, et que l'agent à Cuxhaven soit autorisé à les expédier à leur destination par le premier paquet qui mit en mer, sans qu'il soit nécessaire qu'elles entrent dans la malle.

"La reflexion amène en Hollande la peur dans les esprits. Je ne doute pas qu'on ne commence à faire des propositions, et qu'un chacun ne veuille avoir l'honneur d'avoir contribué à un changement; mais j'espère qu'on tiendra bon, et qu'on n'entrera dans aucun arrangement qui ne pourroit que lier les mains pour la suite. Pour l'armée, on n'a besoin de gagner aucun officier, car je réponds que du moment qu'une force étrangère se montrera sur la frontière, ou qu'une révolution commence (ce qu'on empêchera autant que possible, avant qu'il en soit temps) l'esprit du soldat sera bon, et qu'ils chasseront leurs officiers. Il en est à peu près de même des bourgeois. Il y a peu d'endroits où le peuple redemandera ses anciens Régens, et c'est sur cela, je pense, que j'ai les notions les plus sûres. Je ne puis rien dire par la présente de la Belgique. Le Prince Héréditaire a gardé Tuijl, et je ne l'attends de retour que dans 10 ou 12 jours avec les intentions de s'Altesse.—Le rapport ci-joint est de quelqu'un qui est allé seulement pour fixer la correspondance dans les deux provinces, et ne sert, par conséquent, qu'à donner une idée générale de la situation actuelle." Extract.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, June 20. Berlin.—"I have thought myself obliged to write so much at length in my public despatch that I have very little to add for your private eye. The letter upon which I have had to write so tedious a comment has in no respect surprised me, because I did not very much expect anything so good as a plain, clear, and reasonable proposal; but it requires nevertheless a good deal of attention, and is upon the whole worth the trouble which you see I challenge from you in the consideration of it. We had heard of this letter from Brunswick, before we saw it, by the means of M. de Gallatin, who is there, and who, being a confidential friend of the Duke's, had seen a copy of it in his hands before it had reached Finckenstein, to whom it was addressed. The Duke's remarks upon it to M. Gallatin were, that we ought to accept the proposition at once, and that we should observe that the condition did not require the capture of the strong places, but only required positions upon the Rhine; the truth however is that there are two sentences in the letter, in one of which the word "positions" stands alone, in the other there is added to it the phrase of strong places upon the Rhine; we were, too, obliged to reason upon Finckenstein's interpretation of it, and he seemed to think (though evidently not informed upon the point) that the capture of the two fortresses was intended to be expressed; if it was, you will certainly agree that we did right in rejecting it; if any other sense is to be given to it, there is an easy way for Haugwiz to do so, upon Finckenstein's report of our conference. It was the secretary of the conference who questioned me as to money from England, if the proposition should end only in requiring the Russians to take a position which would block the garrison of Mentz, and as he is a shrewd man and well informed of what is intended, I am inclined to believe that this may be the proposition intended. It is not entirely impossible that as the military here have all the notion that the scarcity of forage ought to delay their operations till harvest, it is not impossible that they seek only to drag on the negotiation till that period of acting should arrive; but much is gained in drawing from the King even so feeble an expression of decision for war; and now that he is once advanced so far, I cannot help believing that they would soon quicken their march if they thought we were sailing into Holland as fast as I trust and hope we are.

"I perceive it is imagined that Haugwiz will not return much before the King, so that another fortnight may pass before we can fully discuss this matter. Though I have not noticed it in my despatch, it is right that you should be informed that from more than one quarter I am told of General Daendels in Holland having said that, in order to resist this damned coalition, they should be obliged to call in Prussia; is this a proof of Daendels paving the way for a revolution in which he will introduce the forces of Prussia? Yet Fagel thinks him a thorough Jacobin; if so, can it be possible that he can have reason to hope for Prussian assistance to support the Batavian republic? I think that cannot be; but it is possible that Prussia may try a Dutch negotiation of its own for the deliverance of Holland, and that possibility is another strong motive with me for wishing to see the question quickly determined by your Russian expedition. Panin's journey to Carlsbadt is necessary for his wife's health; it will do some harm in giving a notion of our negotiation failing; it may do some good if it alarms and quickens the government here. I will try to obtain as much of the good, and prevent as much of the evil as I can. I am impatient to hear what you do with our Dutch fleet, and what measures the old Stadt and Greffier and you are taking; it will all do well."

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE TO H. FAGEL.

1799, June 22. London.—"Je vous envoie mon projet d'ordre pour le Capitaine Van Braam, que je vous prie de communiquer ce matin à my Lord Grenville. Je désirerois obtenir une déclaration par écrit de la manière dont les vaisseaux seront traités et, s'il se peut, une copie des ordres que my Lord Duncan recevra à cet égard, avant de faire expédier et envoyer cet ordre; afin que je puisse être sûr que les vaisseaux qui voudront, resteront des vaisseaux appartenants à la République des Provinces-Unies, et que lui seront rendus à la paix, et dès qu'elle sera délivrée du joug des Français et de ses oppressions actuels; et que ces vaisseaux resteront sous mes ordres comme Amiral-Général des Provinces-Unies; et que sa Majesté Britannique daignera pourvoir à l'entretien de ces vaisseaux, et de leurs équipages, jusqu'à ce qu'ils puissent retourner dans leur patrie. Il me serait fort agréable de pouvoir obtenir à cette occasion la délivrance des prisonniers Hollandais qui se trouvent dans ce pays, et qui voudraient se laisser employer à bord de ces vaisseaux pour en compléter les équipages; et particulièrement celle des malheureux pêcheurs, tant de Schieveningen que d'autres villages d'Hollande, qui ont été pris durant cette guerre; et, s'il était possible, d'avoir une liste de tous les prisonniers Hollandois qui se trouvent, tant dans les différentes prisons que sur les vaisseaux qui servent de prison, avec les noms des bâtiments, et le lieu, et le temps où ils ont été pris. Je la recevrai avec la plus vive reconnaissance, puisqu'alors on serait à même de voir quelles personnes on pourrait délivrer sans risque, et quelles personnes il serait peut-être utile de ne pas délivrer avant la paix, et le rétablissement des choses dans notre patrie. J'ai dressé la précés en Hollandais, et vous prie de vouloir bien la traduire en Français, afin que Messieurs les Ministres puissent la mieux comprendre, et suis prêt à y faire les changements que sa Majesté trouvera bon, et jugera pouvoir mieux servir au but de délivrer notre patrie, et d'ôter les moyens de défense à ceux qui, sans aucun titre légal, y exercent l'autorité suprême. La seule chose sur laquelle je dois insister est que ces vaisseaux restent vaisseaux de la République des Provinces-Unies, et que je soye sûr qu'ils retourneront dans les ports de la République quand elle sera délivrée. Je vous prie aussi de faire remarquer que je promets de récompenser, mais non de garder au service, ceux qui passeront, et que les récompenses peuvent être en gratifications ou pensions. Si cela était sujet à trop de difficultés, de les employer après le rétablissement des choses avec les officiers qui sont restés fidèles à l'ancienne constitution, et n'ont pas voulu reconnaître ou servir les oppresseurs de leur patrie."

LORD GRENVILLE to the LORDS OF THE ADMIRALTY.

Most secret.

1799, June 25. Downing Street.—“A confidential communication having been made to his Majesty's government that several of the officers commanding the Dutch ships of war in the Texel are desirous of throwing off the yoke of the present government of the United Provinces, and of joining his Majesty's fleet, provided that the ships and their crews shall, in that case, be considered as belonging to an allied power, and as being under the orders and direction of the Prince of Orange, I have received the King's commands to signify his Majesty's consent to these conditions. The enclosed copies of a note which I have addressed to the Prince of Orange on this subject, and of the orders which his serene Highness has transmitted to Captain Van Braam, will explain to your Lordships the conduct which is to be observed by the commander of his Majesty's fleet after a junction has been formed with the ships of war from the Texel; and I have therefore to signify to you his Majesty's pleasure that you communicate both these papers to Admiral Lord Duncan, or the officer commanding his Majesty's fleet in the North seas. It is probable that by means of a fishing boat, or through some other channel, Captain Van Braam will open a secret communication with Lord Duncan, and will settle with him the signals to be made, and the measures to be taken for the execution of this plan; and it is his Majesty's pleasure that his Lordship should be instructed to enter into such communication, and to concert such arrangements as may appear to him best calculated to facilitate and ensure a junction between his Majesty's fleet and the ships from the Texel; provided that the commanders of the latter appear disposed to act with good faith, and in conformity to the orders transmitted by the Prince of Orange. It is farther his Majesty's pleasure that, in the execution of this plan, his Majesty's officers should not only abstain from any hostile proceeding against the Dutch ships of war which shall, according to such concert, come out in order to join his Majesty's fleet, but should treat the officers and crews with the kindness and attention due to the officers and crews of ships of war belonging to a power in alliance with his Majesty.

"It is likewise his Majesty's pleasure that, after the junction has been formed, his Majesty's fleet, or such portion thereof as may be judged sufficient, should, together with the Dutch ships, immediately proceed to Yarmouth, or some other port of this kingdom."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 25. Harley Street.—"Par les dépêches que votre courier vous a apporté ce matin du Chevalier Whitworth vous devez être bien content de mon Empereur. Je vous envoie quelques-unes des lettres que j'ai reçu de Sa Majesté Impériale. Il y a d'autres que je dois vous lire, et que je vous apporterai demain avant ou après le levé du Roi, suivent que vous me fixerez l'heure.

"Après avoir lue les pièces que je vous envoie, faite-moi l'amitié de me les renvoyer, car j'en ai besoin, et si vous voulez en avoir de copies, je vous les ferai copier chez moi, et je vous les enverrai demain.

"Craignant que n'avez perdu la clef de mes cassettes, je vous envoie cacheté la clef qui me reste, et si vous n'avez pas perdu la votre, dans ce cas renvoyez moi la mienne cachetée.

"Je suis enchanté de plus en plus du zél de mon souverain pour la bonne cause, et de la noblesse avec la quelle il le fait.

"C'est nos deux souverains et nos deux patries qui auront la gloire de rendre le bonheur à l'Europe."

Postscript. "Mr. Hammond vient de m'écrire dans ce moment pour m'avertir que vous allez envoyer un courier ce soir pour Petersbourg. Je vous supplie de le remettre, au moins à demain au soir, car il faut que je vous entretienne avant; la différence de 24 heures n'est pas grande, et je ne suis pas prêt pour répondre ce soir à tout ce qu'on m'a écrit, et ce me sera impossible d'écrire la dixième partie de ce que j'ai a grifoné."

2nd Postscript. "Les Comtes Kotchoubey et Rastopchin m'écrivent que l'Empereur consent à l'envoi des vingt-six milles homme pour la libération de la Hollande, et qu'on n'attend que l'arivée du General Stamford pour régler cette affaire. Je vous envoi aussi ce que j'ai reçu du Comte Panin, et je vous prie de me renvoyer le tout."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, June 25. Cleveland Row.—"You will naturally suppose the pleasure with which I received the despatches by Fabiani, who has however been so tardy that I think he must be put on the superannuated list. I shall send a messenger either to-morrow or the next day through Berlin to Petersburg, but as this depends on other people in some degree I cannot be sure. Lord Minto goes on Friday or Saturday. He will pass through Berlin. I am occupied with what you so earnestly press." Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, June 25. Berlin.—"As I find by Sir Charles Whitworth's despatch under flying seal of the 11th instant, that a messenger from thence will pass through Berlin to-morrow or next day, I merely write a line by the post of to-night to tell you that no new event of any description has happened since my letters of the 20th by Wiffin. The King passed one day with the Elector Palatine at Anspach on the 20th, and Count Haugwitz continues with him, so that our business does not advance in discussion. Count Schulemburg is ordered by the King to meet him at Dessau, and it is possible that Count Haugwitz may then return to Berlin, unless he remains to complete the royal progress; but nothing certain is known of his intentions.

"We have letters from Turin of the 5th instant which describe the government established there by order of Suwarow, and seem to speak with confidence of their expectation of being soon masters of the citadel, as their provisions are scanty, their garrison only one third of its number, and that third divided in its wishes and interests.

"The last letters from Swisserland are from Bern and Geneva on the 12th, on which day both those cities were still occupied by French troops; but at Berne they had already decreed the release of the hostages, and everything bore the appearance of immediate retreat, the main army then marching upon the line of Soleure to Basle; at Geneva French engineers had arrived to put the city in a state of defence, but nothing had been begun, nor was it clear that they had the money, the time, or the men necessary for the construction of new works of defence.

“From Paris all the accounts agree in describing the immediate expectation of a great explosion. I have reason also to believe that Azara is upon the point of being recalled, the Directory being well satisfied with Urquijo, and not desiring to support Azara in contradiction to him. At Paris they report their fleet to have left Toulon on the 31st, but they do not seem to speak positively of this; they do however agree that the damage done to the Spanish fleet by the tempest will require some weeks before it can be repaired.

“The last mails from Italy and Germany brought no authentic accounts from Naples, nor any good intelligence of the real situation of Macdonald and his army.

“Count Panin went on Saturday to Carlsbadt. I write by the post and therefore could add nothing very interesting, but I have in truth nothing to add since my last despatches by Wiffin.”

Postscript. “Lord Folkestone is just arrived here from Mittau. I open my letter to say that the Vienna post of the 19th June is just come in. I enclose from Sir M. Eden a gazette by which it appears, I think, that Moreau has joined Macdonald’s army at Savona. Sir M. Eden adds that the Toulon fleet (consisting of 24 sail) had landed 3,000 men at Vado, and that a regular report of this had been made by General Sechendorff on the 8th to head quarters at Turin, but without any date, or any mention of the English fleet; and on the 10th Suwarow was marching by Asti towards the enemy, having left the citadel of Turin blockaded.”

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, June 26. Cleveland Row.—“This is an answer to a great many hitherto unanswered letters of yours. No. 27 is about the gun boats moved from the mouths of the German rivers to the coast of Norway. I believe you attach rather more importance to the thing than belongs to it, but in truth some measure of protection to our trade against that swarm of privateers which have their resort to the bays of Norway was become absolutely necessary, and Lord Spencer thought he had no resource for the purpose but in these vessels. If we succeed in my proposal of bullying the Danes into common sense we may then be at liberty to resume our blockade of the Wadden’s.

“I can by no means answer for it that Haugwitz’s suspicions, as applied to Lord Liverpool, are wholly unfounded. He loves a little contraband trade as dearly as if he shared in it, and I believe really thinks that the commercial interests of this country are very much promoted by manœuvres of this sort, to which I am ex officio naturally hostile.

“You will have seen by my having said nothing to Whitworth about Napper Tandy and the others that I saw that subject in the same light that you did.

“Now as to our great project. My joy in Whitworth’s despatch is greatly damped by what he says about the flotilla, and still more by two letters from Kotchoubey and Rostopchin which my friend Woronzow gave me to read to-day, and which express a great deal more doubt on the subject than Whitworth seems to have been aware of. There is however no use in reasoning about this, for before you can receive this letter the aye or no will have been finally pronounced, and you will know the decision. But then comes this unfortunate business of transports. If we do not in some manner or other get assistance on this head either from Russian flotilla, or from English ships in the Baltic, the whole project is, I fear, irrecoverably defeated, though my sanguine colleagues do not yet allow it. But the fact is not the less apparent because they shut their eyes. The end of June is now come, transports are now to be provided for 10,000 men, and when that is done, then we are to see if we cannot begin to provide for 10,000 more. And I thought all the while that transports for 20,000 were preparing! and they were urging me to make the 20,000, 40! All my hope is therefore in Popham's zeal and resource, and dashing spirit. But if he also should have relied on the thing being done for him here, then all is over for this year. Still however, even with this opinion, I urge on the measures for these 10,000. They have been preparing transports for 10,000 British troops for the Zealand expedition; a part of them is now employed in bringing troops from Ireland; a part consisted in revenue cruisers which could not be spared out of the N[orth] Sea. But when the moment comes I should hope about half of this quantity of transport might be added to the 10,000 above mentioned, so as to leave the Zealand expedition to shift a little for itself, and to send at once transports for 15,000 Russians. But do all you can to urge and stimulate Popham to find or to supply resources from thence, for here it is but too evident that we shall be miserably deficient. The difficulty that is stated on this head of transports exceeds all imagination. One would think that in carrying on all the trade of the world we do so without any ships.

"You talk of other people being asleep and ask what the Stadtholder is doing. Why, he is fast asleep, snoring, and not even dreaming of doing anything. Nor has he (in my conscience, I believe it) the least desire to return to Holland.

"You will have seen that Lord Minto is named, and within a few days after receiving this letter you will see him at Berlin in his way to replace his Irish Lordship of Henley. I anticipated your judgment of preference, and made the offer to Pelham, but he would not hear of it. Lord Minto seems right enough in his ideas just now, and I hope will continue so, but he takes with him his Corsican Lord President, who I wish was anywhere else. Of your other names I see little that is promising, except Lord Amherst, of whom I will enquire more.

"Pitt told me that he thought Watson had spoken to him unfavourably of Diemar, but I have had no opportunity of learning any further particulars, and Watson's judgment of men cannot be implicitly relied on, though I believe his integrity may. Perhaps one of the reasons against their complying at Petersburgh with our project of the flotilla may be found in the desire to keep always in their reach this powerful instrument of hostility against Sweden. Perhaps the objection may be no more than an unwillingness to own how much all this part of their force has been suffered to go to ruin. I entirely agree in your ideas as to the plan of your going to Petersburgh to supply that energy which is wanting in Whitworth. I rely much on Stamford and Popham; the latter I know, and the former I hope, to be peculiarly well qualified to inspire activity and exertion, and we cannot spare you at Berlin in the present moment, especially under the circumstances which you have mentioned to me about Paget.

"Instructions are sent to Lord Duncan to endeavour to settle with V[an] B[raam] the execution of his plan. You will receive by this messenger a copy which the P[rin]ce of O[range] sends to his son of his orders on this subject, and also a copy in English for yourself of the orders. A duplicate of them will be sent into Holland directly by a channel which seems a safe one. May one not however doubt whether there is any real disposition to come out, and whether the whole is not rather a plan for managing a loop-hole in case of a new revolution?

"I have had several conversations with F[agel] on the prospects that are opening to us. He yesterday sent the P[rin]cess an account of our plan and a note stating the extreme importance of forming our plan of insurrection, and of establishing in each province comm[itt]ees of persons capable of putting the thing in motion with a reasonable hope of controlling its direction. He is to see her to-morrow, and in the meantime is working on the subject. When this is tolerably digested, one of his brothers will go to you at Berlin with it, and will return from thence to Münster, where he will establish himself in order to keep up the correspondence.

"I am vexed at the success these cursed French intriguers have met with at Petersburgh. I am incredulous, and am quite persuaded that even if our reports (of Paris insurrections and of Barras being at the head of everything) were true, still we should never get any assistance from him till his assistance would not be worth having." Copy.

LORD CASTLEREAGH to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

[1799,] June 26. Dublin Castle.—"I have been honoured with your Lordship's letter of the 19th, and shall not fail to avail myself of its suggestions as soon as Lord Mountmorris returns to Ireland. I hope his Lordship is not the only convert which a deeper investigation of the subject has produced.

"Knowing how deeply your Lordship is interested in the success of the measure of Union, I should trouble you with some particulars of our progress, were not your Lordship in possession of the official correspondence. I look forward with much anxiety to an opportunity of communicating with your Lordship in person on the many important points that yet remain to be considered of this interesting work ; and trust I shall receive the Lord Lieutenant's permission to visit England in the course of the summer, when I shall beg leave to solicit a renewal of that confidence with which your Lordship honoured me when last in London, and from which I derived so much valuable information on the subject of my mission."

SIR MORTON EDEN to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, June 26. Vienna.—"I avail myself of the messenger Slater's return to England to convey to your Lordship my sincere acknowledgments for the immediate and very flattering attention which your Lordship has been pleased to give to my wishes communicated to your Lordship by Lord Auckland, who, in all that he has done on the subject, acted in perfect conformity to the desires and sentiments which I had more than once expressed to him, and the result of whose endeavours cannot but give me entire satisfaction.

"I have, at the same time, to express to your Lordship my most grateful sense of the very flattering terms in which your Lordship has been pleased to speak of my services, and of my retreat from the foreign line; and to return your Lordship my unfeigned thanks for the representations which your Lordship purposed to make to the King, in order to induce His Majesty to mark my retreat by some gracious testimony of His Royal approbation and favour.

"Next to the satisfaction which I must necessarily feel from a conscientious discharge of my duty, my greatest pleasure must be to know that I have acquitted myself, in the honourable but very arduous situation in which I have been placed by your Lordship's protection, in such a manner as to have met with your Lordship's approbation. Your Lordship's very handsome letter has left me nothing to desire on that head, and I shall retire into private life with the most lively sense of the many and very great marks of kindness which I have uniformly experienced from your Lordship, and the remembrance of which I will cherish to the last hour of my life.

"The choice of my successor must give satisfaction here. I will cheerfully remain with him as long as he may think that my services can be useful to him."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1779, June. London.—"Le porteur de ce billet est le négociant Flamand, dont j'ai eu l'honneur de vous parler hiér. Je crois qu'il vaut mieux qu'il vous voie seul. Il est prévenu sur l'unbounded confiance qu'il doit avoir dans la probité et secrecy de mon ami Lord Grenville. Puisse-t-il réussir avec vous à tirer ses braves compatriotes du joug des monstres qui les assassinent."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June. London.—“Je suis complètement de votre avis au sujet de la proposition, et je transmettrai les papiers que vous m'avez communiqué à ma Cour par le courier prochain. J'aime à croire, et je me flatte, qu'on y verra la chose comme on le doit.

“Le ciel continue à bénir nos armes. Nous allons en Italie de succès en succès ; et il paraît que l'Archiduc pourra continuer à commander.”

LORD W. BENTINCK to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, June 30. Alexandria.—“I take the liberty of sending your Lordship the copy of a letter which Field Marshal Souvarof has this day written to Lord Nelson.”

MILORD NELSON, BARON DU NILE.

“Tachez de devenir Duc de la rivière levante, ponente, et de Gènes, avec Malta. Je vous embrasse tendrement. Excellence, grand Nelson.

Votre frere, ami, et adorateur.

(signed) Comte Alexandre Suworow Rimnikski.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 1. Harley Street.—“Je vous envoie les lettres de notifications de l'Empereur et de son fils aîné à Sa Majesté le Roi au sujet de la naissance d'une princesse, que je vous supplie de remettre à Sa Majesté.

“Je vous envoie, en meme tems, la lettre que le courier du Chevalier Whitworth m'a apporté du Comte de Rastopchin ; come son écriture est peu lissible, mon fils l'a copié, et il n'y a qu'un mot peu important que j'ai souligné qui ne présente aucun sens. La lettre de Hawkwitz à Finkenstein est vraiment impudente. Ils veulent rester neutres, nous défendent de passer par leur territoire, et quand nous aurons repris les deux fortresses, dont l'une a été livrée par l'Autriche, et l'autre a été prise parceque la Prusse ne l'a pas empêché, c'est alors seulement que cette dernière se déterminera à entrer en Holande, où il n'y a pas de troupes pour défendre le pays. Le Comte Panin fait bien de s'en aller d'une Cour qui se joue si indécemment des autres.

“J'espère que vous êtes content de la célérité avec la quelle on a dépêché l'affaire pour la quelle le très dilligent Capitane Popham est venu chez nous. Son voyage est miraculeux ; en six jours de Shernes à Cronstat, c'est inoui !

“Les huit milles Suedois, avec les dix-sept milles Russes, feront un bon corp pour délivrer la Holande. Je ne m'imagine pas que vous ayez besoin des huit vaisseaux de ligne que la Suède vous offre. Quand à ce qui se fait à Berlin, vous avez sans doutte reçu de Monsieur votre frere tous les détails possibles. Ils sont bien désagréables.

“En vérité si l’Autriche et la Prusse n’étoient pas en Europe, elles mériteroient bien qu’on les abandonne à leurs mauvais sort, et qu’on les laisse révolutionner par les Jacobins.”

Enclosure 1.

COUNT RASTOPCHIN to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, June 13. Petersburg.—“Je vous écris cette lettre que j’envoie par le courier de terre, et une copie sera expédiée par mer, afin que vous soyez instruit de l’objet de cet envoi.

“Le Capitaine Popham est arrivé ici de la manière du monde la plus singulière, car il n’a mis que six jours de Londres jusqu’à Cronstadt; il a été présenté aujourd’hui à l’Empereur, a eu une conférence de trois quarts d’heure, a diné, et reviendra après demain. Vous connoissez l’objet de sa mission, voici ce qui en résulte :

“L’Empereur donne 17,000 des troupes de la division de la Livonie.

“Ces troupes seront embarqués à Libau et Riga. Les transports seront Anglais et aux fraix de l’Angleterre. L’Angleterre fournira à l’entretien de ces troupes dans le trajet, et pendant tout le tems que ce corps restera aux ordres et à la solde de l’Angleterre. En cas que l’expédition ne puisse pas avoir lieu en Hollande, alors les troupes seront transférées en Angleterre pour y hyverner, et être ramenés en Russie au printemps, ou employé de nouveau d’après les circonstances. Le Lieutenant-Général Herman commandera ce corps; c’est un élève de Bauer, homme de mérite. On fixe le départ au 1 d’Aoust.

“Le Roi de Suède a offert de son propre mouvement 8,000 hommes pour servir contre les Français, et une flotte de 8 vaisseaux et 4 frégates. Il prioit l’Empereur de lui négocier des subsides de l’Angleterre. On lui a dépêché un courier avec la proposition de donner ce huit mille hommes pour la Hollande. S’il y consent on les embarquera à Gottenburg, et cela fera avec les notres 25,000. Sinon, les 17,000 Russes seront embarqués seuls. Les probabilités sont pour, au pis aller, cela occupera les forces des Français, et attirera leur attention. Cela peut décider le Roi de Prusse à entreprendre quelque chose de son côté. Car, alors, il y aura tout à gagner et rien à risquer. Une fois le Roi de Suède dans la coalition, le Dannemarc entrera aussi. Selon moi, cette expédition, qui ne dérange en aucune manière les mesures de l’Empereur, peut avoir les suites les plus importantes. Dieu veuille que la prospérité accompagne nos braves et respectables soldats.—La cour de Vienne est inconcevable, la masquée a fait encore une farce. Elle souffre M. Hompesch comme un phantome de Grand-Maitre à Trieste, il y a Cour et envoi des députés. Je vous dirai que l’Electeur de Bavière fait ses soumissions; on a expédié un courier à Vienne pour arranger cette affaire.

“Je ne sais si M. Thugut sera content de cette reconciliation, car il aimeroit assez qu’on le laisse faire de la Bavière ce qu’ils ont fait de Venise. Le Comte Cobenzl est bien malade; il est dans un état affreux, faible, couvert de plaies, et frappé de son état. Les médecins craignent qu'ils ne l'en tirent pas. Le jour de baptême il y a eu des grâces. Malgré mes prières l'Empereur m'a fait Directeur-General des Postes. C'est une place qui embrasse tout l'empire. Ce n'est ni les revenus immenses de ce département, ni les gens à y employer qui m'embarrassent. C'est l'ordre à y établir. Adieu M. le Comte ; plaignez-moi et souhaitez-moi plus de santé."

Enclosure 2.

Portrait du Maréchal Souvarow.

"Le Maréchal, Comte de Souvarow, est un homme d'une taille moyenne, âgé de 65 à 66 ans, et quoique très maigre, il est encore jusqu'aujourd'hui plein de force, de feu, et d'activité. Son corps est d'une trempe si extraordinaire, qu'il est aussi inaccessible au froid et aux intempéries de l'air, qu'il est insensible aux fatigues. Sa manière de vivre et ses mœurs sont d'une simplicité sans égale. Une botte de paille forme son lit ordinaire, et lorsqu'il est en campagne, la première chaumière qu'il rencontre au bout de sa marche lui sert de palais. Personne n'est plus sobre, ni plus frugal que lui. D'une famille distinguée, né au milieu de l'aisance, il a conservé cette austérité de mœurs qui tient du stoïcisme, mais dont la source est infiniment plus pure. Ennemi de la mollesse, du luxe, et de la volupté, il s'est durci de bonne heure dans le choix qu'il a fait du métier le plus rude, qui est celui de la guerre ; et ce n'est que dans ce métier, au bruit des armes, et au milieu des combats, qu'il trouvait ses plaisirs, et qu'il passait sa vie. Avec une âme ardente et taillée en grand, un esprit juste et entreprenant, un cœur généreux et désintéressé au point de dédaigner même les richesses, et avec une force de caractère qui le rend aussi inflexible et ferme dans le bien qu'insensible à la crainte, cet homme, en embrassant la carrière des armes, a cultivé les talens militaires par de profondes études ; et l'on peut dire, hardiment, que nul homme n'a médité davantage sur les campagnes des grands capitaines ; nul n'a étudié mieux l'art de faire la guerre, tant des anciens que des modernes ; et nul n'a conservé, peut-être aussi bien, la mémoire des grandes actions qui se sont données sur les différens théâtres de la guerre. Plus philosophe que la plupart des guerriers, il a senti que l'homme n'est pas purement et simplement machine ; que si le corps, qui en fait une de ses parties, est sujet aux loix de la mécanique, sa partie la plus noble, celle qui dirige le mouvement et commande au sentiment, n'obéit qu'à des loix qui, suivant sa nature, lui sont particulières ; et que si l'on ne cultivait que la partie la plus grossière, sans songer à mettre de l'accord avec l'autre, l'homme se réduirait à l'état d'automate ; et pire que cela, car sa propre volonté, n'étant ni entièrement détruite, ni dirigée, pourrait souvent se refuser à suivre la direction qu'une impulsion étrangère voudrait lui donner. D'un autre côté, connaissant le désavantage incalculable qu'ont toutes les troupes automates, et par conséquent, sans passion, vis-à-vis de celles qui sont électrisées par les sentimens qu'on a soin de leur inspirer, dont l'imagination est exaltée par la magie des différens tableaux qu'on trace devant eux, et qui sont enivrées de zèle et d'ardeur par tous les prestiges qu'on met en usage : ce Général ne se bornait pas aux seuls exercices qui donnent de la souplesse et de la dextérité aux troupes, mais il s'occupait en même tems de l'esprit de l'armée, qu'il a toujours cherché de cultiver ; en se servant pour cela de tous les moyens que son génie pouvait tirer de la connaissance exacte du caractère des individus qu'il commande, de leur génie, leurs opinions, mœurs, coutumes. Un seul exemple suffira pour donner une idée de la manière dont il s'y prenait. Lorsque la Grande Cathérine, peu de tems avant sa mort, se détermina d'envoyer au secours de l'Empereur 60 mille hommes contre les Français, elle nomma le Maréchal Souvaroff pour commander cette armée, et lui communiqua là-dessus, quelques mois d'avance, ses volontés. Le Général rassembla les troupes destinées pour cette expédition autour de son quartier-général, et faisant venir, tous les jours et tour à tour, chaque regiment à la parade, il lui lisait, lorsque la parade était finie, quelques petites instructions qu'il avait soin de composer lui-même. Ces instructions, écrites de la manière la plus simple et la plus analogue à l'esprit d'un soldat Russe, roulaient sur ses devoirs, et sur les parties qu'il lui était indispensable de connaître, comme guerrier ; mais il y délayait en même tems quelques ingrédiens, bien choisis et bien calculés pour produire en lui une horreur pour les principes atroces des Français républicains, une haine pour cette nation dégénérée, et une ardeur pour la combattre. Non content de cela, il ne laissait échapper aucune occasion qu'il croyait être propre pour entretenir en eux ce sentiment. Lorsqu'il les exerçait, par exemple, soit par regiment, soit par corps, c'était toujours les républicains qu'on avait devant soi ; c'est eux qui étaient l'objets de toutes les attaques et de tous les manœuvres qu'on faisait, et les bayonnettes au bout des fusils étaient toujours dirigées contre eux lorsqu'on marchait en colonne serrée. Toutes ces choses ne pouvaient manquer de produire l'effet qu'il désirait, et qui était celui de faire sur eux une impression si forte, que le nom seul de Français républicain puisse leur servir de signal pour le combat. Ajoutez à cela que personne ne s'est plus appliqué à étudier l'art de se faire aimer des troupes, et n'a mieux réussi, parceque personne n'a été plus convaincu que Principes pro Victoria pugnans, comites pro principe. Si d'un côté la vérité de cette maxime est attestée par les expériences journalières, qui nous font voir que les armées les moins propres à triompher sur leurs ennemis sont toujours celles qui sont composées d'individus dont les ames froides portent aussi peu d'affection pour le chef qui le commande, que d'intérêt pour la cause qu'ils défendent ; d'un autre côté, les succès brillants et non interrompus du Comte Souvoroff ne la confirme pas moins. Il serait difficile, dans un écrit de cette nature, d'entrer dans les détails de ses exploits qui viennent à l'appui de cette vérité ; c'est pourquoi l'on se bornera de dire simplement que ce général, ayant fait toutes les guerres que la Russie a eues dans les derniers 45 ans, s'est trouvé à un nombre de batailles que pas un guerrier de nos jours n'a eu occasion de voir ; qu'ayant eu pour la plupart le commandement en chef, il s'est constamment tenu au-dessus des revers de la fortune ; et que dans toutes ces occasions, la gloire n'a jamais hésité, un seul instant, de se déclarer pour lui. L'on pourrait également ajouter qu'il n'est, peut-être, pas aisé de trouver, dans les fastes de la guerre, un second exemple d'un général qui eut livré autant d'assauts que lui, et qui eut emporté des villes aussi bien défendues que celles qui, à la suite de combats sanglans, ont été forcées de céder à la valeur de ce chef, et à l'intrépidité des troupes Russes qu'il commandait.

sont portées ne peut paraître qu'un fait peu croyable pour toute autre nation. La distance qui les séparait de Varsovie, le centre des forces réunies de la Pologne contre lequel ce général dirigeait ses efforts, était de plus de 700 verstes, ou près de 485 milles Anglais. Dix jours de marche ont suffi pour ce trajet. Au bout de ce tems, à peine arrivé au point où il brûlait déjà d'impatience d'y être, qu'il fait une reconnaissance assez générale et assez complète pour connaître la position de l'ennemi sur tous les points possibles; et lorsqu'il n'eut plus rien à désirer de ce côté, il se décide sur-le-champ d'entamer cette ville du côté de Prague, et distribue les ordres nécessaires pour le mettre en exécution le jour suivant. Ce jour arrive, et quelques minutes décident du sort de la Pologne et terminent cette guerre. Ce trait-ci, avec tous ceux qui sont connus de lui, comme celui d'avoir battu avec une poignée d'hommes et mis en déroute totale l'armée nombreuse des Polonais commandés par le Prince Oginsky, lors de la première confédération; celui d'avoir complètement défait avec un corps de 10 mille hommes toute l'armée du Grand Vizir, une victoire qui lui a valu cette grande considération dont il jouit dans l'armée Autrichienne; tous ces traits, dis-je, avec une infinité d'autres, sont certainement les meilleures preuves que l'on puisse donner pour faire voir combien le jugement que quelques-uns ont porté sur lui, et dont nous avons parlé plus haut, est mal-fondé."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 1. Wimbledon.—"Lady Jane, at the request of a corps of volunteers in our neighbourhood, is obliged to perform a ceremony this forenoon in presenting their colours, and having nothing to do in town which I could not do here to better purpose, I have not gone to-day. It was at any rate my intention to be with you to-morrow forenoon at eleven o'clock, having appointed Sir Ralph Abercrombie to be at your house at that hour. You'll recollect I mentioned to you my intention in the view that Mr. Fagel, or anybody you please, might likewise be present, in order that the subject might be considered in different lights. I shall come to you at half an hour before eleven.

"Don't be uneasy about the transports; I shall bring it all right. Entre nous, I think Lord Spencer sometimes listens when he ought not to official difficulties stated by his naval colleagues at the Board, without exercising his own understanding and authority on a general view of the subject as a member of Government. I have desired Huskisson to send for your perusal the letters I have wrote to the Admiralty, and it is my intention to write a private letter to Lord Spencer this morning to state the total impossibility of a great and urgent public service being obstructed from the want of a thousand or fifteen hundred seamen which can, without the smallest inconvenience, be taken from guard-ships or others for a short time.

"I must send Lord Spencer the despatches from Popham the moment they come from the King; but I will accompany them with a memorandum to send them to you as soon as he has read them."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, July 1. Cleveland Row.—"This letter will not go till to-morrow night, but as I may probably be hurried then, I begin it now.

"Your despatch by Wiffin brought me in yesterday from a very fine walk at Dropmore, and I am afraid I hardly thought myself repaid by the perusal of Haugwitz's display of the King of Prussia's most valorous resolution to make war the very moment it shall be clear that he can do so without either expense or danger. I most perfectly agree in the opinion you have stated of the impossibility of our acceding to the condition of taking Mentz and Ehrenbreitstein, operations which, you well know, I have from the beginning had no fancy for; but I am inclined to go a little further in my negative resolutions, and to decline all engagement that shall be founded on any condition of Prussian co-operation, because where it is so evident that Prussia does not mean to give herself roundly and fairly to the cause, but to preserve in her hands every species of back game, I am not willing to afford her so easy a means of doing this as must arise out of any such engagement, the non-performance of which may always be pretended, and frequently with some show of reason. We must therefore do our business ourselves. If Prussia will help us in it, even for the eleventh hour, it is well, lucro appone; but if not, let us be quite sure that we can do without her.

"But then these cursed transports! pray tell me your opinion (we shall have full time to receive it) whether in the present state of affairs we might not with our 10,000 men from here strike the blow against Walcheren without waiting for the other attack which is, I am grieved to see it, still at two, should I not say three months distance. Transports to go from here to Riga one month, even if they were ready to-day. To embark the troops and to bring them to Yevern or rather to Gothenburg, one month more. Then the time, be it more or less, of preparing the attack and making it, and the result must bring the actual operation late in September; not an unfavourable season by any means for acting in Groninguen and Overysse, but full late to commence operations by sea against Zealand or Holland.

"If we attack Walcheren in one month from this time, and we could do it in less if this cursed transport service does not stand in our way, we could in all probability make ourselves masters of it without much difficulty, and there seems every reason to hope that we could hold it for two months longer against the whole force that the Batavian Government could bring against it, supposing their French allies as well occupied as they are now, and as they are likely to be. The course of this operation would naturally point to that quarter every effort that the Dutch Government could make, and would leave the n[orth] e[ast] frontier totally open to our projected attack supposing it executed any time in September; and the success of this latter being thus facilitated and almost ensured, the whole country could ultimately be reduced.

“The inconvenience (and almost the only one) to be apprehended from this change in our projects is that the appearance of our forces on the coast, and still more their success, would probably occasion insurrections in almost every other part of the United Provinces, and these (as we should have no means of supporting them) would probably be crushed at once, the mischief of which would be infinite in a public light, besides the ruin which it would bring on so many individuals.

“On the other hand, if we are to delay our attack for three months longer we give great time for strengthening the vulnerable points, and we defer acting till the season is very unfavourable for our share of the attack. I really hardly know to which side my mind leans in this balance.

“The offer of Sweden, if it had been made six weeks ago, would have relieved all our difficulties, for there we might unquestionably procure transports sufficient. But now we shall hardly save time by this resource, though we may avoid other difficulties by it.

“If even now we could make the King of Prussia take one manly resolution, we might save much time and expense by landing our troops at Lubeck, and marching them either to Hamburgh, or at once to Bremen, or even to Deventer. But this is not very likely at the same moment that he prescribes to the Russian army, whose assistance he asks for, that they shall not march through his territory, or any other enclavé.

“Did I mention to you in my last letter that I have set Fagel to work, and that his brother, who is here, will be sent to you with the result of all we can do here; which all however I fear will not be much?”

July 2.—“I guessed rightly enough that I should have little time to write to you to-night, but the despatches to Whitworth will tell you much of what I wished you should know. You see our friend Paul has blabbed our secret, and this is the worse considering how much time must elapse before we execute our schemes. In other respects things look well.” Copy.

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE to the HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, July 1. Hampton Court.—“Je vous envoie une lettre pour M. de Rhoon avec sa copie: je vous prie de la lui faire parvenir si vous n’y avez point de remarques; et si vous avez quelques raisons de croire que cette démarche pourroit être nuisible, et contrecarrer des mesures que vous pourriez prendre pour obtenir le but que nous nous proposons, sçavoir, la délivrance de notre patrie, je vous prie de me les marquer, et de me renvoyer la lettre afin que je puisse juger si vos raisons sont bonnes pour ne pas l’envoyer. On désire en général ici que

M. de Rhoon soye employé à travailler au rétablissement des choses, à cause de son zèle pour la bonne cause, et que lui aime à être employé. Je rends justice à son attachement à la constitution, mais je ne voudrais pas que, pour satisfaire à ses désirs, on empêchat l'effet de ce que vous pourrez faire pour la délivrance de notre patrie, et ce seroit lui rendre un mauvais service à lui-même que de le mettre en avant, et de rendre par là, sa rentrée dans notre patrie et son rétablissement dans ses emplois plus difficile ; l'expérience m'a prouvé que son trop grand désir de tout faire a nui souvent aux affaires, et qu'il a désiré d'obtenir, et a obtenu, des commissions qu'il auroit été à souhaiter pour lui et pour moi qu'il n'eut point eues, telle que celle de changer les magistratures des villes d'Hollande en 1787 et 1788. Vous êtes mieux en état de juger que moi si ma lettre peut lui être remise sans difficultés, et je vous laisse le maître d'agir selon les circonstances, vous priant de me faire scavoir, le plus tôt le mieux, ce que vous aurez fait de ma lettre, afin que je puisse en informer ceux qui voudraient que M. de Rhoon fut mis en activité." Copy.

Enclosure.

The PRINCE OF ORANGE to COUNT DE BENTINCK RHOON.

1799, July 1. Hampton Court.—“ Mon fils m'ayant informé de la continuation de votre zèle pour la bonne cause, et de votre désir de voir une contre-révolution s'effectuer dans la République des Provinces-Unies pour la délivrer du joug des François, et de ceux qui sous leur autorité y exercent le pouvoir suprême sans aucun droit : je vous prie de me communiquer vos idées à ce sujet, et spécialement sur les moyens que vous croyez qu'on pourroit employer pour organiser une contre-révolution dans la province d'Hollande, dans le cas où l'on pourroit avoir l'assurance d'être promptement assisté par une armée étrangère.

1799, [July]. Memorandum of MONSIEUR VAN DE SPIEGEL, on the project of a Union of the Dutch and Austrian Netherlands under the House of Orange.

“ Serait-il avantageux pour notre république, qu' au moyen d'un arrangement à faire à la paix générale, les dix provinces ci-devant autrichiennes fussent réunies aux nôtres, et ne formassent qu'une république ?

“ A considérer la question superficiellement on dirait qu'oui ; car il semble qu'un pareil arrangement donnerait un grand accroissement de forces à l'état ; et si l'on fait dépendre uniquement de là le bonheur d'un pays, l'on a raison ; mais il est encore d'autres considérations qu'on ne doit pas négliger.

“ En premier lieu la république changerait par là entièrement de forme, et il faudrait conclure une ligue tout-à-fait nouvelle avec des contrées qui diffèrent de nous par la religion, par les mœurs, les intérêts, quelques-unes même par le langage ; or il est à peu près politiquement impossible d'espérer une réunion solide et sincère entre des éléments aussi discordants. L'Empereur Charles Quint a déjà énergiquement voulu cette réunion, mais il a été obligé d'abandonner son projet à cause des difficultés qu'il y voyait. On le reprit pendant la guerre avec l'Espagne, et la pacification de Gand de 1756 semblait y paver les voies ; mais on ne tarda pas à s'apercevoir combien il en résultait peu d'avantages, et, trois ans après, les Sept Provinces se séparèrent des autres et conclurent entre elles l'Union d'Utrecht.

2. “ Notre république est bâtie sur des bases toutes différentes de celles qu'il faudrait alors ; nous avons été une puissance maritime et nous deviendrions une puissance continentale ; la chaîne de fortifications qui avait été construite contre des attaques qui pouvaient nous être faites du côté des provinces Autrichiennes, devra être placée ailleurs, et comme ces provinces n'ont point de forteresses, on sera obligé d'en construire des nouvelles. Notre politique a toujours été d'empêcher que le commerce ne se transportât de chez nous dans la Flandre et le Brabant, ce qui serait certainement arrivé au moyen de l'Escaut jusqu'à Anvers, d'Ostende, et d'un canal qu'il aurait été facile de creuser depuis Bruges, si notre république ne s'y était constamment opposée par la force et par les stipulations des traités. Maintenant ces maximes devraient être changées ; et n'en résulterait-il pas bien vite que le Brabant et la Flandre redeviendraient ce que ces provinces étaient il y a 300 ans, savoir, le théâtre d'une prospérité sans bornes, tandis que la Hollande et Zeelande rentreraient dans leur ancien état, et serviraient de nouveau de demeure à quelques pauvres pêcheurs.

3. “ Le voisinage de la France ne nous entrainerait-il pas dans des guerres continuelles ? La politique de nos ancêtres a toujours consisté à éviter ce voisinage, et à avoir plutôt une puissance intermédiaire entre la France et nous : c'est pour cette raison que le Prince Frédéric Henri d'Orange n'a jamais pu réussir à faire la conquête des Pays-bas, conformément au traité de partage avec la France, quoiqu'il les ait attaqués à plusieurs reprises à la tête des armées Françaises et de celles de notre république ; mais chez nous on voyait ces projets avec déplaisir, et on les a toujours traversés. C'est encore pour la même raison qu'en 1701, lors de la Grande Alliance entre l'Empereur, la Grande Bretagne, et notre République, le roi Guillaume stipula que les Pays-bas Espagnols serviraient de barrière pour l'état, mais ne chercha jamais à lui en procurer la propriété, ni en tout ni en partie. Le but de cette barrière, qui explique toute notre politique à l'égard des Pays-bas Espagnols, était d'en assurer la souveraineté à une puissance dont il ne fut pas probable qu'elle devint l'alliée de la France, et qui, en même temps, fut assez considérable pour défendre ses états ; le tout cependant de telle manière que notre république conservât toujours une influence suffisante dans les Pays-bas, pour pouvoir empêcher soit que le souverain de ces provinces en fit une place d'armes contre nous, ou qu'il y protégéât le commerce au préjudice du nôtre. Dans ce but nous entretenions des troupes aux Pays-bas, et étions maîtres de la navigation de toutes les rivières dont la France aurait dû se servir pour entrer dans notre pays (excepté du côté de l'Empire) pendant que nous étions, en même temps, en possession du commerce intérieur le long de ces rivières.

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE to J. FAGEL.

1799, July 3. Hampton Court.—“Le Prince d'Orange croyant utile pour les intérêts tant de sa patrie, que de sa maison, d'avoir une personne de confiance au Continent qui puisse y être employé par son fils le Prince Héréditaire d'Orange à correspondre, tant de la part du Prince d'Orange que de celle du Prince Héréditaire d'Orange, avec des anciens membres de la Régence, et avec d'autres personnes bien-intentionnées qui se trouvent, soit dans l'intérieur de la République des Provinces Unies, soit dans ses environs, a fait choix pour cet effet de M. Jacques Fagel, et l'a chargé de se rendre dans le courant de ce mois en Allemagne, d'aller, directement après son arrivée à Cuxhaven, à Berlin auprès du Prince Héréditaire d'Orange, et de prendre ses ordres, et les renseignements qu'il pourra lui donner sur les moyens de correspondre d'une manière sûre avec les bien-intentionnés qui se trouvent dans le territoire de la République des Provinces-Unies, ainsi que sur le choix des personnes avec lesquelles il pourroit et devrait correspondre. Il se rendra en suite à Bremen, ou à tel autre endroit peu éloigné tant de la frontière de la République des Provinces-Unies que du port de Cuxhaven, et qui puisse être un endroit intermédiaire entre Londres, Berlin, et la République des Provinces-Unies, que le Prince Héréditaire d'Orange pourra lui indiquer, et s'y établira. Il pourra porter en compte ses débours, tant pour le port de lettres que pour les voyages qu'il pourra faire avec l'aveu du Prince Héritaire d'Orange, soit en Allemagne, soit dans l'intérieur de la République, soit même en Angleterre dans le cas où le Prince Héritaire d'Orange pourroit trouver nécessaire qu'il s'y rendit pour faire rapport de bouche au Prince d'Orange de la situation des choses, ou prendre ses ordres sur des articles qui ne pourroient être confiés au papier. Il pourra assurer les anciens Régens, et autres personnes bien-intentionnées, sur la discretion desquelles il pourra compter, et avec lesquels il correspondra, de l'intérêt que sa Majesté Brittanique daigne prendre au sort de la République des Provinces-Unies et de la Maison d'Orange, et de son intention de prendre les mesures nécessaires pour faire agir avec efficace la garantie du Stadhoudérat qu'elle a donné par le traité de — du ——— 1778.

“ Il tachera par le moyen de ses correspondances d'entretenir les bons sentimens des bien-intentionnés, de prévenir un découragement qui empêcheroit de tirer parti de leurs bonnes dispositions lorsque l'occasion pourroit devenir favorable d'effectuer le rétablissement de la constitution légitime de la République des Provinces-Unies et du Stadhoudérat ; mais en même tems il évitera tout ce qui pourroit les engager à des démarches inconsidérées, ou à une explosion prématurée, avant que les troupes des Puissances alliées pussent le soutenir et seconder leurs efforts, pour tacher de se délivrer du joug des Francois. Il informera le Prince Héritaire d'Orange de toutes les choses importantes qui parviendront à sa connoissance, et agira d'après ses directions. Il écrira aussi au Prince d'Orange ce qu'il apprendra d'intéressant, et si cela presse et ne peut être confié à la poste, il est autorisé d'envoyer des exprès avec ses lettres. Quant à d'autres choses secrètes qui ne sont pas assez importantes pour les envoyer par exprès, il les écrira en chiffre, et se servira du chiffre que le Prince d'Orange lui fournira.

“ Enfin il fera ce qui est en son pouvoir pour être utile à sa patrie et à la Maison d'Orange, d'après les directions qu'il recevra du Prince Héritaire d'Orange, ou du Prince d'Orange.”

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 3.—“ I have endeavoured, agreeably to your wish, to express in the enclosed paper your own and Mr. Grenville's ideas, which agree perfectly with my own, and to combine them both with the information and advice which, I have reason to believe, the Prince and Princess will have given to the Hereditary Prince, in consequence of what I suggested to them in your name, and with the establishment of that correspondence which is the principal object of my brother's journey. A detailed and regular plan of the nature alluded to can, I think, be definitely settled only by persons of the description mentioned, and being actually in the country, communicating their ideas on the subject to the Hereditary Prince, by means of the correspondence which is to be set on foot. I know that the Hereditary Prince is already in correspondence with some persons of that description, as, for instance, with a Mr. van de Poll[†] at Amsterdam, a man of considerable abilities and influence in that city; with Mr. d'Enghuysen in the province of Gelderland, and others. The Princess further points out to him some persons who might be usefully employed in the same way. He will of course instruct my brother to correspond with them, particularly for attaining the object in question, and I have not the least doubt myself but that, by this means, it will be attained.

"I take the liberty also to submit to you whether you would not think proper to authorize my brother to inform, in general terms, Mr. Charles Bentinck in your name that the general circumstances of Europe are such as to afford a nearer prospect of a favourable change of circumstances in Holland, and to desire him to correspond with the Hereditary Prince on the measures to be taken in the provinces of Friesland and Groningen on the approach of an armed force from without, which will enable the well-disposed inhabitants of those provinces to come forward.

"I don't know whether the enclosed paper will exactly answer your intention, either in point of substance or in form. I must submit that to you. I am still more in need of your indulgence with respect to the language. Writing in English in Lord Grenville's name would, under any other shape, and any other circumstances than the present, make me appear ridiculous in my own eye.

Postscript. "If I should not hear from you to the contrary I mean to call with my brother to-morrow morning before 11 o'clock. If he is to set off by next Saturday's packet, he must leave town Friday, very early in the morning."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 6. Berlin.—"I do most heartily give you joy in forwarding to you without delay the important intelligence of the conclusion of all your Petersburg arrangements, and I know not how to do justice to all that seems due to the extraordinary exertions and success of Captain Popham which have been well supported by Sir Charles Whitworth. Unfortunately he entirely forgot to send two letters to me from General Stamford, so that I know not a word of the General's opinions,* but I think I can answer for his approving all that marks so strongly the zeal, intelligence, and activity of those who have been so successfully at work. Perhaps I might have wished that the fleet of galleys and the navigation of the Eyder had not been put by from political speculations about Hamburgh, or military apprehensions of summer camps and Danish boors; but where there is so much to commend, one must not allow oneself to be too critical, and the merits of Popham are too great to bear any remark other than of great praise in this important transaction; for the same reason I do not object to the objectionable part of

* See letter of General de Stamford to Mr. Grenville, dated June 18, 1799, on page 96.

Whitworth's treaty in leaving to the Emperor the absolute recall of all his ships at any moment, and yet consenting to give him two months extra pay even in the case of sudden recall; but the ships are there, the troops will be there, the expedition will take place, and must succeed, and therefore I am, as you will doubtless be, au comble de la joye. I really am only doing bare justice when I praise in my despatches the conduct of the Hereditary Prince of Orange; he is reserved, prudent, and laborious to the greatest degree, and I have found him in every respect disposed to do all that his talents and situation can afford, and that without any appearance hitherto of wishing to press forward his own ideas and opinions; he approves highly of what I have told him respecting the object in question, and I have recommended to him to make all his arrangements respecting the officers who are to be collected, and the other facilities which can be offered from the interior, without giving to any one individual person the knowledge of the proposed expedition. This is difficult, but it is necessary, and he has promised to conduct himself scrupulously upon this principle. It will however be necessary that some place should be fixed for the embarkation of those officers who will be wanted in the interior, and who dare not pass the frontier by land. I must take this opportunity to state to you that Robert Fagel is very apprehensive of the bad effects which may arise, if you should have taken an exact copy of his letter to his brother, and if that copy should reach the Stadtholder or the H[ereditary] P[rince], because there are six words in Dutch which speak slightly of the Prince of Orange's mémoire. I have therefore promised that, if you have taken a copy, you will erase those six Dutch words for fear of accidents, and I am confident you will not forget to do so as the letter was a private one, and not intended for the public eye.

"With respect to our Berlin negotiation, I can add but little to my public letter. I understand from Haugwiz that these military difficulties have all arisen from the Duke of Brunswick himself, who has taught the King to believe that he must not run the risk of a French army collecting on the Moselle, a risk which Haugwiz holds as cheap as I can do. He is sanguine in his belief that his projet de convention, which I am to see to-morrow night, will furnish the grounds of a real agreement, and he has promised distinctly to specify the point at which the Russians are to arrive; he is certainly sincere in his belief that the King will really act sooner than he will be bound to do, and I am ready enough to believe this, because I have always thought they must act as soon as they are aware of our project, and that cannot now be long a secret. I have some reluctance therefore to consent to pay them sooner for acting only in the case in which they can act without danger to themselves; but, upon the whole, the early declaration of Prussia is still so important, that I am inclined to think every practicable inducement should be resorted to for it, however disgusting it may be to act in measure with such feeble and wretched politicians. I am not quite without apprehensions that the Emperor of Russia may at last find his army so drained as not to furnish the corps which he had offered to Prussia; but when I recollect that a Prussian war with France will set the Emperor free from all disquietude on the Prussian frontier, I trust that he will not hesitate to fulfil his promise if the Prussians will claim it. It may however possibly happen that the Emperor will refuse, and I have reason to believe that, in such a case, the Prussian Ministers will be still more disposed to concert only with England, for I have remarked that Haugwiz has always caught with great avidity at the loose hints by which I have endeavoured to learn his wishes in such a case. It is in reference to this possible case that I am inclined to recommend separate conventions on the part of Russia and of England with Prussia, because then our contract may stand good by our accepting a positive epoch of time, instead of the general description of time implied in the arrival of the Russian troops. You will probably agree with me that the demand of Russian troops for Mentz and Ehrenbreitstein was intended to stop the march of the 45,000 men, and divert them from Austrian to Prussian co-operation, but I have stoutly defended your subsidiary corps, and have told Haugwiz we could not discuss with him the march of our troops till he made himself a party to the measures of which he now made question.

"I presume that you will have instructed Lord Minto respecting the Austrian cession of Austrian Flanders; till some measure is taken upon this point it will be found full of difficulties; the desirable thing seems to me to be to obtain from Austria some declaration respecting their abandonment of the Low Countries, such as they have already on former occasions made at Berlin; but it will be very necessary to keep them at Vienna to their original measure of compensation in the Venetian territory, as you are doubtless informed that they are openly looking to a great part of Piemont as necessary to complete their compensation, and I find their greediness increases with their success. I have sent the Dutch intelligence to Stamford. On the 1st instant Popham is to meet General Thule from Stockholm at Petersburg.

"To the Dutch intelligence which I had enclosed, I now add a letter this moment received from the H[ereditary] P[rince] of Orange. I perfectly agree with him in thinking that the Texel fleet could usefully assist the insurrection of the coasts of the Zuyder Zee, but I have observed to him in answer that the new batteries which are constructed on the shore were considered by Van Braame as commanding entirely the fleet while in the Texel, and of course rendering all co-operation impossible till it shall be out of reach of that control. The other demand of arms is one which it is natural for him to make, and desirable that you should assist as you can, but my yeomanry recollections upon that subject do not give me great confidence in your assistance upon that point, as I do not ever recollect that there have in latter times been any surplus of arms in England. I have omitted to offer you my special congratulations upon the transport difficulties under which you laboured being now completely overcome; for you will observe the first division is provided with Russian ships, for the second there are, by your own account, English ships sufficient, and for the third I have no doubt but that Sweden will hire her ships to Popham, or at the worst the Russian ships can come back to fetch them."

Enclosure.

REPORT FROM M. D'IVOY.

1799, July 3. Emerick.—“On dit que Sa Majesté Prussienne a fait savoir au gouvernement Batave qu'elle désiroit que tout fut remis sur le même pied qu'avant 1795; que dans ce cas elle offroit sa protection et emploieroit ses forces afin que le tout se fit sans confusion; mais que, dans le cas d'un refus, elle se verroit obligé d'employer la force, et que là-dessus il falloit une réponse en trois jours.—Les autorités à la Haye ont été assemblées, extraordinairement, le 25 à 7 heures dans la matinée, à l'occasion de dépêches arrivées la veille de Paris par courrier. Rien n'en avoit transpiré, mais on les croyoit relatives au changement qui y avoit eu lieu, et dont Lombard et Brune n'ont été instruits que par le Directoire Batave, dont les membres appréhendent beaucoup de la continuation de Barras. Après l'assemblée on s'est aperçu de beaucoup de trouble, et depuis, on a remarqué beaucoup d'irrésolution, surtout par rapport aux travaux et arrangemens militaires. On vouloit même que l'ouvrage au Greb fut provisoirement suspendu, mais mes nouvelles d'avant hièr ne confirment point cette circonstance; elles m'annoncent, au contraire, qu'on augmente les garnisons sur l'Yssel.

“Les Francois ont fait entrer, il y a quelques jours, 80 pièces du plus gros calibre dans Venlo, venant de Maestricht, dont 40 au moins sont Hollandoises. Cela fait présumer qu'ils se retireront dernière la Meuse, d'autant plus que mille paÿsans sont occupés à transporter les magasins de Dusseldorff et Cologne sur Maestricht et Breda.

“Ce qui suit est en chiffre :—

“Il y auroit moyen d'avoir, soit au Texel, au Helder, ou à Helvoet, un bâtiment qui se chargeroit de passer les dépêches en droiture; ainsi par ce moyen on pourroit établir une correspondance directe. Cela reviendrait à 4 florins par jour à titre de leggeld, parceque le bâtiment devoit être toujours disponible, et le trajet serait payé en conséquence. Je n'ai pris aucun engagement encore, désirant de savoir préalablement lequel de ces trois endroits on préféreroit; et d'être instruit où et comment l'on voudroit que ces batimens abordassent. Quand je serai informé des intentions à cet égard, il sera temps de mettre cette affaire en train. Extract.

BRITISH EXPEDITION TO HOLLAND.

NOTE OF LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY, K.C.B.

1799, July 6.—“The object of the present armament is the conquest of that part of Holland to the northward of the Waal.

“The advanced season of the year demands the greatest promptitude and vigour in the execution of it. No operation which does not immediately tend to the accomplishment of this object ought to be undertaken. It would waste your strength and your time to conquer islands; except in so far as they are necessary to secure to you a firm footing on the continent of Holland, and to keep up your communication with Great Britain. The United Provinces must be attacked on the Meuse, or by a landing in the province of Groningen. The first mode of attack seems in the abstract most advisable. It gives you at once a footing in the province of Holland. It enables you to avail yourself of the Waal, as a line of defence on the side of France. It opens an immediate communication with Great Britain. It affords you a prospect of getting possession of the province of Holland during the good weather. It takes the lines of the Greb and the Yssel in the rear; and it gives you the probability that, on the conquest of the province of Holland, the other provinces will submit. All these advantages are of little moment if your force is inadequate, or if the means of landing the troops are precarious. Should your force be sufficient to attack the island of Voorn, and to effect a landing on the mainland at the same time, the object would probably be attained. But if you cannot effect a landing without previously getting possession of Voorn, the difficulty would be increased, because, whilst you were reducing the Brill and Helvoetsluys, the enemy would collect his force, and would throw many difficulties in your way. The question then is, “can a fleet pass up the Meuse if the enemy is master of the island of Voorn?” Should this be practicable, which is the point where a landing ought to be made that will enable the troops to hold their ground until reinforced, and keep up their communication with the shipping? It has been said that a landing may be effected at Schevelinge. This is obviously a precarious undertaking. But should the weather admit of it, the troops thus landed ought to march immediately and co-operate with their friends on the Meuse. Unless on the most favourable concurrence of circumstances no attempt on Holland ought to be made until the first division of foreign troops is within reach and ready to co-operate. At the moment of execution, demonstrations ought to be made from the mouth of the Somme to the Ems.

“A number of regiments of cavalry being ordered for foreign service, and transports prepared for their reception, will add to the uncertainty and increase the alarm. As in the execution of this plan everything depends upon accurate information, the following queries are stated:—

Queries.

1st. What is the probable force in the Province of Holland?

Answers.

1st. By Lord Grenville.—The French force cannot exceed 10,000 men. Little account is to be made of the Bataves.

* Margin. Answered in the negative by Col. S.

2nd. Is the navigation of the Meuse clear and practicable for heavy transports and 50 gun ships, from its mouth to Schiedam or Rotterdam?

3rd. Can the fortifications at the Brille, or on the opposite side of the Meuse prevent ships from passing up?

4th. Should neither the fortifications of the Brille nor the difficulties of the navigation of the river prevent ships from passing up to Schiedam or its vicinity, at what point can the troops be disembarked to the greatest advantage?

5th. Should it be necessary to take possession of the island of Voorn, where ought the landing to be made?

6th. What is the state of the fortifications of the Brille and of Helvoetsluys?

7th. What garrisons are at present in these places?

8th. Would not the possession of the island of Voorn and of Williamstadt give several and advantageous points of attack upon Holland?

2nd. By Colonel S.—that he believes the passage for heavy ships to Rotterdam is by Helvoetsluys, which is the branch of the river leading to Rotterdam by Dort. The passage by the Brille would not answer for large transports.

3rd. By Colonel S.—Yes.

5th. By Colonel S.—On the west side of the island.

6th. By Colonel S.—The fortifications are good, the Brille has a covered way, and a wet ditch.

8th. By Colonel S.—Yes, certainly.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 8. Berlin.—“I think that I now begin to trace the exact operation upon the wretched politics at Berlin, which I had ventured to predict would be the sure consequence of the vigorous measures which you are pursuing from Petersburg; and through all their doubts, their difficulties, their apprehensions and irresolutions, I think I now see strongly their new fear that we shall at length somehow or other do the business without them, and leave them to the solitary enjoyment of the solitary system which they have so curiously carved for themselves among the great powers of Europe. Count Haugwiz is now so convinced of our being determined to complete the business without them, that I am persuaded he is sincere in the desire which he professes to engage the King of Prussia with us, and I am inclined to believe that he speaks truly when he represents his difficulties to consist partly in the personal reluctance of the King to commit himself to the measure of war, and partly in the military doubts suggested by the extravagant caution of the Duke of Brunswick. I do not see any reason to think that Count Haugwiz is as yet informed of the Baltic expedition, but it is hopeless to imagine that 15,000 men can be embarked there by the assistance of an English officer, without pointing out pretty distinctly the object of its destination. I made so many criticisms upon the paper which he shewed me that I have not been able yet to obtain from him a copy of it, though I am making another effort to get it for you before I close this letter. If he acts up to his conversation of yesterday in the alterations which he promises to make, I think it highly probable that we shall speedily come to an understanding with respect to the English share in this convention, as he agreed to endeavour to adopt the idea of employing the million, which they asked, in monthly payments for the remainder of this year, according to the proportions of the last Prussian and Russian subsidies. I do not see any great difficulty likely to arise on our own part so as to defeat the conclusion of the arrangement. The greatest difficulty which I apprehend is on the part of the Emperor of Russia who may hesitate to incur this new drain both of men and money, though it is certainly a direct offer made from him to Prussia, and one which Count Panin considered himself as authorised to conclude upon, if Prussia should accept it. We must not however forget that the present Baltic armament was not in question when he made the offer which is now claimed by Prussia, and that their home force is therefore diminished at Petersburg by the number of the 18,000 men who are now to embark on the Baltic. I shall not put these difficulties in the way of Panin or of Paul, but I do not on that account feel perfectly satisfied that I shall not hear of them; these difficulties may likewise be increased by the confidence which the Emperor may entertain of the success of this Baltic expedition, and by the reluctance which he may have to admit Prussia into the share of a conquest which his chevaleresque character may make him glorious to reserve to himself. There is likewise to be added to this the reflection that his finances are scarcely sufficient to furnish at his own cost another German army of 40,000 men, and Haugwiz is so persuaded of his present poverty in men and money, that he assures me we shall not have more than 30,000 of the 45,000 Russians whom we are to pay for; an information which, to Haugwiz, I appeared to discredit, but which is important enough to require your attention and that of your commissary. There would be no difficulty whatever upon the subject of this new Russian force demanded by Prussia, if we could make the troops of the Baltic expedition count in the Prussian estimation for the new army which they require; in fair reasoning the troops who land in Holland will offer a more effectual assistance to Prussia than any who could approach the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, and there is no question but that the spirit of the condition is more advantageously fulfilled by the Russians acting on the Dutch and Flemish side of the Rhine than by their acting towards the German and right bank of it; and I think I could easily shew them, in defiance of all the doubts of their irresolute Ducal commander, that 25,000 or 30,000 of the allied troops in Holland, in giving to Prussia the disposition of the whole of its own force for its German frontier, give to it more effectual support than could arise from 40,000 men approaching to the fortresses of Mayence and Ehrenbrietstein; but unfortunately we cannot have the benefit of this discussion without making them parties to our military projects, before they are absolutely engaged to co-operate with us; and we must observe too that, however strong our general reasoning on this point might be, we should have to contend with all the prejudices which they would feel against an expedition calculated to put Holland into the hands of Russia instead of Prussia; and therefore that, by making a communication to them of our plan, we invite their certain opposition to it; and yet, without making that communication, we cannot reasonably demand to have the benefit of it in our convention with them. Perhaps I over-rate the jealousy which I apprehend from them on this subject, but I own I should not be surprised to find that they will soon discover the object of our expedition, and that they will at all hazards pre-occupy the country by a Prussian force. If they did this early enough to save us the risk and expense of the Baltic expedition, I know no great harm in our having quickened them by that threat into doing what we have wished them to do; I only object to their having such a knowledge of our plan as would lead them to throw difficulties in our way without taking the task into their own hands. The fair and liberal course of proceeding would be to give them the knowledge of our new means for Holland, and take credit with them for that force as applying to the force which their convention demands from Russia; but to justify this frank and open communication we ought to be more assured than I am that none but a fair and liberal use will be made of this communication; it may however happen that the Prussian Cabinet may obtain the knowledge of our enterprise before we have completed our convention, and in that case, as there would be no secret to keep respecting it, there might seem to be some advantage in openly claiming this force as being to make part of the assistance which they claim from Russia.

"Another idea which has occurred to me is that I might, without risk, state to Haugwiz an intention on the part of Great Britain to attack Holland by sea, and I might claim that the number of troops landed in Holland shall be considered as equivalent to the troops which he asks for the neighbourhood of Ehrenbreitstein; the only objection which I see to this is that, though it does not actually tell our secret, it very much suggests the knowledge of it. Perhaps I am all this time fighting with a shadow, perhaps the Emperor will give his troops according to his offer, and I should like that best because that would produce for us the largest mass of force; and I own I am strongly inclined to the opinion that every possible exertion should be made to the greatest extent, in order to push with effect the advantages of this campaign, and give to our enemy no breathing time to recover himself. In my conversation of yesterday I again felt the ground as to the possibility of our concluding with Prussia singly, in case the arrangement could not be made acceptable at Petersburg; and I think I see it would not only be practicable to do so, but that in fact they wish rather for a separate connection with us, although they require at the same time the assistance and support of the arms of Russia. I have however taken care to tread this ground with great caution, professing always that our present intimate connection with Russia is an object the most forward in the views of the British Cabinet. Upon these various difficulties and doubts I shall be glad to receive any suggestions which you will furnish to me; but if any occasion presents itself for a tolerable conclusion, I shall conclude as fast as possible for the best, and I will take my chance of being hanged, drawn and quartered afterwards; the only sine quâ non upon which I shall immoveably rest is, that no payment shall take place until the King of Prussia shall explicitly declare himself at war with France for the deliverance of Holland and the pays limitrophes, with a sure and strong frontier to them. By the pays limitrophes Cologne is, I understand, included, as well as Berg and Juliers which are, as you know, reversible to Prussia. The English debate has made the King think it necessary distinctly to express that he will enter into no engagement for the re-establishment of Louis XVIII. nor will he undertake for a step more than the rescue of Holland and les pays limitrophes, with a sure frontier; and having gained that he will return to the defence of it, and will pursue no other object in France military or political; if he does that task well, I shall be better satisfied with him than I have hitherto been.

“The Prince of Orange has just left me; by his last accounts the French appear to take alarm about Maestricht, and they occupy themselves likewise upon the Greb; but this is nothing; we must not hope that if we give them time and means of preparation they will not turn them to some advantage. I understand that the Batavian Directory has been sounded without effect; that they admit their own situation to be desperate, but do not lend themselves to the suggestions which are held out to them. The Prince has consulted me upon the position which he himself should personally take, and I have recommended to him to make no decision as yet, but to look to the probability of either marching in from Ameland at the head of that division, or of meeting it at the head of the well affected in Groningen and Friesland; I am rather inclined to the first of these two measures because I think the Russians will be less unpopular if they are headed by the Prince, and because the situation of the Prince will be less exposed at the head of a regular force than in the first explosion of the interior of the country; but we shall have some time, and I hope not much time, to make this decision.

"I ought to have mentioned that in Haugwiz's last conversation he spoke of the impossibility of preserving the ecclesiastical possessions, in any final settlement of the Empire. I have not yet been able to trace the exact object of this opinion which he has now for the first time expressed, and I contented myself with observing how desirable it was to keep the principle of l'intégrité de l'Empire as much untouched as possible.

"My letters from Flanders speak of great and redoubled vigilance in the Brussels Directory, and apprehensions of a renewed system of terror there as well as at Paris. My correspondent urges the necessity of a direct negotiation immediately from England in that country, and says they are afraid to negotiate with Prussia and the House of Orange. I have not time to send you the Dutch and Flemish correspondence."

LORD MINTO to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1779, July 9. Cuxhaven.—"I sailed from Yarmouth on the 5th instant, a fog having prevented the Latona from sailing the day before. I landed to-day, and shall immediately proceed on my journey. On my passage I had occasion to learn that the officers on this station think the blockade of the Dutch ports would be much more effectual to distress the enemy if the Scheld were also included in the blockade, the trade for Holland being now in general directed to that river. I am persuaded your Lordship will think this point worthy of consideration.

"I have also learnt that the peculiar situation of Embden affords a channel, which is not neglected, for a very extensive and fraudulent trade between England and Holland. I have seen in the possession of Captain Sotheron, who commands the Latona, positive evidence of a direct connection between several houses in London and merchants in Holland.

"The vessels employed in this trade are bound to Embden, but the Dutch port being on the other side of the same river, they do not even use the ceremony of unloading at Embden, but carry their cargoes directly to the Dutch side and send them by canals to the interior of Holland. As the supply of Holland may seem advantageous to England in a commercial point of view, although it undoubtedly counteracts the exertions which are making to distress that country as an enemy, it is for the wisdom of government to consider whether means should be employed to restrain this intercourse with Holland. I understand that it is much favoured by the government at Embden, and the officers do not understand that there is a British consul at that place. An agent of our government would no doubt be useful at Embden in detecting and checking these irregular practices.

"As these matters are altogether foreign to my mission I should not take the liberty of troubling your Lordship with them otherwise than in the form of a private letter."

EXPEDITION TO HOLLAND.

Minute of Lord Grenville.

1799, July 10.—“The first plan which was given in for the deliverance of Holland (and which can be considered as at all applicable to the present circumstances), was contained in the mémoire of the Duke of Brunswick, dated October 22, and received here November 7, 1798.¹

“It rests entirely on the possibility of seizing by surprize or secret correspondence one of the strong places in Groningue or Overysse, and of forming there a Dutch army of 10 or 12,000 men, which should be transported in flat-bottom boats from Staveren to Enchuysen, while one Prussian army should pass the Yssel and advance on the Greb, and another occupy the French between the Rhine and the Meuse. This operation to be favoured by a diversion made from this country either against the Texel or against Zealand.

“A proposal had a few months before been in consideration here for seizing the islands of Ammeland and Schiermonick Ooge, in concert with some of the inhabitants of the provinces of Groningue and Overysse, who were thereupon to have risen and disarmed the Batares, there being at that time no French troops beyond the Yssel. The person who gave in this plan, and who is unquestionably a man of much ability and knowledge, is now on the frontiers of the republick, and is in correspondence with the King’s government.

“Various proposals have at different times been made respecting Walcheren, but these it is conceived to be unnecessary to detail here. This paper (No. 3) also contains some considerations respecting the line of operations to be followed by the armies in Holland and the Netherlands.

“About the beginning of May in the present year the state of the Court of Petersburg was judged such as to afford a probability of obtaining a body of troops from thence, which, being brought by sea, might operate on one part of the United Provinces, while the British Army could co-operate with them by an attack in a different quarter. Communication was had with Captain Popham as to some of the details of these ideas, and particularly about the means of transporting and disembarking such a force if furnished by the Emperor of Russia.

“And the paper (No. 4) having been received from him, he was instructed to proceed to Petersburg with directions for his conduct, as in (No. 5.)

“A letter (No. 6) was written to Mr. Grenville at Berlin communicating to him what had passed on this subject, and desiring him to prevail upon General Stamford to proceed to Petersburg in order to explain and concert the military details of such an expedition, in so far as related to the part to be allotted to the Russian troops.

“Mr. Grenville’s despatch (No. 7) of the 21 May, describes the plan which General Stamford formed for this purpose, and which he proceeded to Petersburg to recommend.²

"It consists in landing 15,000 men in the neighbourhood of Delfzyl, having 5,000 more in reserve in the principality of Yevern, where the depot of provisions was to be formed.

"This army was to make itself master of Groningen and Overysse, while the British force should take possession of Zealand, and Lord Duncan's fleet block the Texel, or even make some demonstration of attack there.

"The progress of these attacks was supposed sufficient to ensure a counter-revolution by internal risings in all the Provinces, particularly as by the latest accounts it appeared that the whole French force on that side amounted only to 15,000 men from Mayence inclusive, about 5,000 being in and about Mayence, 5,000 men in the other fortresses, and 5,000 only in the interior of the Republic. (See Mr. Grenville's despatch, where he states these numbers from the authority of Count Haugwitz.)¹

"Captain Popham arrived at Petersburg near three weeks earlier than General Stamford, and it being found necessary in order to obtain the Emperor of Russia's consent to the King's proposal, to suggest to him some distinct and precise plan of operations, an attack on the three points of Walcheren, Goree, and Ammeland was proposed by Captain Popham, and after some discussion adopted by the Emperor with that eagerness which belongs to his character. When General Stamford arrived the whole business was nearly settled, as appears by Sir Charles Whitworth's despatches, Nos. 33, 34, 35, 36 and 37, and by Captain Popham's letters. The latter describes his project as including the occupation of Groningen and Overysse in the same manner as General Stamford's, but as differing from it as to the point of disembarkation, which the one proposes to be on the Island of Ammeland, the other on the continent, and near Delfzyl. It is to be observed as to the latter that some little doubt may arise respecting the line of neutrality at the mouth of the Ems, but this might probably be arranged or disregarded if the point were decided in a military view.²

"By Sir Charles Whitworth's last letter, No. 37, it appears that the treaty was to be signed at Petersburg on the 22nd, and it would probably be conformable to the copy (No. 10) which Count Woronzow has in confidence communicated to Lord Grenville.

"According to that project the Russian troops would amount to 17,600 men, viz :—

17 battallions Infantry
2 companies Artillery
1 do. Pioneers
1 squadron Hussars

to be embarked with their artillery, but without any horses of any kind.

"For these, transports were to be provided in part by Russia and in part by this country, but the whole at our expense. The Russian ships of war which the Emperor lends for the purpose are calculated to hold 8,000 men, and to be ready by the middle or end of this month (July). The whole of the troops were to be ready to embark at the same time. But the transports for the 10,000 men could not be depended upon as being to be procured even in part in the Baltic, and measures are therefore in course to send the whole from hence. They are however not yet sailed, and when they sail their voyage can hardly be calculated at less than 1 month—it may be more.

“In consequence however of Lord Grenville’s letter to Sir Charles Whithworth, extract of which is annexed [No. 11], it is probable that the first division of 8,000 men would sail as soon as they were ready, and rendezvous at Gothenberg. And it seems proper that the orders to this effect should be repeated. (See also what Captain Popham says on the subject in his note 15–20 June.)

“It may be hoped therefore that this first division may arrive at Gothenberg about the third week in August, and the second division in a fortnight or three weeks afterwards, according to the date of the arrival of the transports at Revel. The Swedish troops that have been offered are 8,000 men. It is conceived that the most expeditious mode will be to collect these at Gothenberg, and that transports may readily be procured there for their use, so as the whole may be ready by the time that the first division of Russians arrives there—say the middle of August. On this point, however, further details are expected, and the troops themselves cannot yet be relied on with certainty, though there appears great probability of our having them. To this force either of 18,000 or of 26,000 men, according as we get the Swedes or not, is to be added that which is now collecting in this kingdom, and which may be put at 10,000* infantry, and 6,000 cavalry. It is to be observed that the Russians having no cavalry with them except a single squadron of Hussars, it would be necessary that, as soon as they are to act in any country where cavalry would be wanted, a due proportion should be joined to them from this country; and that this is indeed stipulated in the treaty.

“The points therefore to be decided are, supposing the two operations of Groningen and the islands of the Meuse determined on;

“1. What proportion of this whole force of about 45,000 men should be allotted to these two operations, and which troops to each?

“2. Whether the operations may not commence on the arrival of the first Russian division at Gothenberg, supposing the British and Swedes then ready?

“3. With respect to the operation against Groningen, whether the landing should be made at Ammeland, or on the continent?

“This, it is conceived, must depend on points of detail, respecting which particular information must be procured and easily may, but the final decision of which must in some measure depend on the opinion of the officer commanding that operation.

* Increased to 12,000, July 13, 1799.

“The papers annexed (No. 12) contain some information respecting Groningen during the last year, and by the means of the communications established, the most minute details may be obtained as soon as it is judged safe to let our agents see that our enquiries point to that quarter.

“With respect to the operation against the Province of Holland, Sir R[alph] A[bercrombie]’s note contains the queries which are in the first place necessary to be answered. Steps are taking to procure information upon them; and the note (No. 13) may be of some use in that respect. It is to be remarked that if, on a fresh consideration of the force to be employed, it should be judged necessary to bring it all to bear exclusively on one point, that of the islands of Holland, such a determination must without delay be stated to the Emperor of Russia, in whose mind it may raise some, but probably not insuperable difficulties.

“As the obtaining the port of Gothenberg for a depot, though it is probable, yet cannot be entirely depended upon, some consideration ought to be had whether, in the contrary event, the first division of Russians must be brought to any rendezvous in Great Britain, or whether they could be carried straight to their point of attack. And in either case what steps are to be taken for supplying them with the horses which they may want in the first instance.

“A plan should also be formed and digested beforehand for arranging as extensive a system of diversion as possible, and it might perhaps not be wholly impossible to circulate and accredit the report that the expedition is destined against Havre, or St. Malo. A shew if not a reality of attack on the Texel fort would, as it is conceived, be of the utmost importance in the same view. It should also be considered what steps must be taken with regard to the Dutch rassemblement, as it is called, which must form the foundation of the army to be raised by the Prince of Orange on his restoration.”

Minute by Mr. Pitt.

Afterwards by 10 or 15,000 British Infantry and 3,000 Cavalry who may also be ready by about 20th August. And then to penetrate into Holland. INTELLIGENCE FROM HOLLAND.

1799, July 11. Beckestein (North Holland).—“Il m’a été impossible de débrouiller votre citron, ce que j’attribue à l’humidité que la lettre aura contractée entre les mains du porteur. J’ai cependant compris que vous désirez que je remette la lettre moi-même. J’ai écrit le même soir, mardi passé, à l’homme en question (van Braame) en le priant de me fixer un rendezvous; mais sa réponse a été négative, parcequ’en l’absence du chef, il remplit sa place, ce qui l’oblige à rester à son poste. Je lui ai écrit en conséquence pour lui demander si ma venue chez lui ne seroit pas sujette à caution; car je sais que déjà il a eu une entrevue pareille. Sa réponse me déterminera. Je l’attends demain, et si je vais chez lui je vous ferai part de ce que j’y aurai fait. Comme je suis dans le cas de rencontrer beaucoup de connoissances, vous ne trouverez pas la précaution que j’ai prise superflue. Vous me connoissez assez pour être persuadé que je ne négligerai rien pour bien m’acquitter de cette commission. Pour ce qui est de l’homme je crois que si l’on désire de lui qu’il se rende chez vous, il ne le fera qu’à bonnes enseignes, et en étant sûr d’y être bien reçu et bien traité. Il teint beaucoup à l’honneur de la Castille; il est un peu enthousiaste, un peu beaucoup même; rempli en outre de cette idée d'orgueil et d'indépendance nationale que les émigrés, en imitation du Roi Jaques, ont si fort mise à la mode; d'ailleurs brave homme, et homme brave en même temps. Robert vous aura sans doute dit qu'un de mes camarades a eu une conversation avec ce même homme, dont il a fait part à M.M. de Kinsk et de Bylands. Comme vous ne m'en dites rien, je suppose que l'intention n'est pas d'en informer ces Messieurs." Written with lemon juice. Extract.

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1779, July 12. Berlin.—“I must not detain Johnson any longer than to say I have received yours of the 1st. You will already have found by the former despatches from Petersburg, and you will see by these that the first division will be ready, and will be embarked at Revel, and on their way to the Sound by the end of this month. If this division should by your orders attack Groningen and Friesland from Ameland, as soon as you can attack Walcheren, and if I succeed in obtaining Prussian co-operation to give support to your enterprise by declaring and marching, all will do well, and the second division from the Baltick of Swedes and Russians will come in as a corps de reserve in later days. I am almost tempted to engage absolutely for you upon almost any terms if I can engage Prussia to this step, and I can work upon it independent of Russia. Stamford, as you see, has given way to Popham, and he really thinks the plan of Ameland very practicable. It is then to these two objects of Ameland and Zeeland that I imagine you will direct your combined attack of the first division of Russians, and the embarkation of British. They will be more than enough with Prussian co-operation if I get it; they will be enough, I believe, if I fail of obtaining it; but I think I shall have it. Do not groan therefore over the tardy transports which do not come, but trust to the 10,000 first division from Revel, and add to that your 10,000 from England for Zeeland, and all will move prosperously. I do not like to promise for Prussia, but I am more sanguine here than I have ever yet been, and I think I have reason. You will see that I have no great hopes of Lubeck being admitted here, but if the King of Prussia shall have declared upon the expedition of 10,000 men to Ameland and 10,000 to Zeeland, he will then I presume not refuse his consent, for then he will be at war. God bless you, I am tired to death. I do not write of good Berlin hopes to Petersburg for fear the Emperor should slacken and trust to Prussia entirely for Holland.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 12. Berlin.—“If my predictions respecting the conduct of the Berlin politicians had not been obvious enough to be the predictions of everybody who considered the subject, I should have been vain of the accomplishment of my prophecy ; for it is evident to me both from the second edition of the project, and from the course of a very long conversation with Count Haugwiz that we are at last upon the eve of obtaining our concert with them, and in good truth I attribute it only to their seeing plainly that we were determined to do the thing without them. My former private letter will have prepared you for the advantage which I am endeavouring to take of the publicity which attaches to our preparations for some expedition from England. I am sure that you will all approve of my endeavours, if I succeed in obtaining a declaration from Prussia to welcome our Baltick expedition ; and if I do not succeed in this point, I trust at least that you will think I have proceeded with sufficient caution to prevent any bad consequences from my speculations upon this important subject. I have however still one more apprehension respecting Russia, or rather I should have, if the calculation of time did not afford some security against that apprehension. I should be afraid that if our success at Berlin was known at Petersburg before the whole Baltick expedition was afloat, the Emperor might prefer to leave it to the arms of Prussia to make the easy conquest of Holland ; nay I will own fairly that it has sometimes also passed across my mind that I was not doing wisely in giving hopes in England which might lead also there to relax in the active pursuit of our Russian expedition. I will trust however that this latter danger is imaginary altogether, and I will trust to Captain Popham's activity for hurrying the Russian army on board, before there can be any question of convention or co-operation from the Court of Berlin. I have not yet been able to despatch Johnson, and I am vexed to have already detained him six and thirty hours, but as I am to see Count Haugwiz at eleven this morning, I cannot but believe that you will prefer my keeping him two or three hours longer in order to speak of Haugwiz's conversation since he has seen the King, for yesterday evening I was disappointed of the conference which I had expected with him, and to this moment I cannot answer with any certainty for the result of yesterday's consultations at Charlottenburg.

“By the second sketch in article third, you will see that they propose to begin their preparations as soon as the Russians begin their march ; if they adopt my proposal of considering an English expedition in Holland as an epoch of their declaration, I should see no difficulty in requiring them to prepare immediately, and I presume that as soon as the convention is signed, they would become entitled to a fair communication of those plans which they are bound to co-operate in ; according to this idea, therefore, I think in naming the subject I have done enough to justify the making it a ground of condition, but I shall tell them that no confidential communication of details can be made to them till by their treaty they have engaged themselves to co-operate with us ; the only previous specification which they are entitled to is to fix the number of troops whose landing in Holland ought to engage them in hostility ; I mean to state that as low as they will take it, and not higher than 20,000 men, of which number we are pretty sure ; on their side I imagine they will require four weeks for preparation, and if they will engage for that time I shall be content. You see I go on reasoning upon this as if I was sure of success ; I own I feel sanguine, though not certain. I conceive it is probable that even if they do adopt my new epoch, they will still make the offer from the Emperor of 45,000 men a condition, but I have no great fear of refusal from the Emperor after so direct an offer, although I think he would probably be very slow and tardy in supplying those troops, from the difficulty which he made of furnishing more than 18,000 for Holland. I think, however, it is plain that the Ministers here do not so much want the actual assistance of the force of Russia, but that their object is to engage that country as deeply as possible in the expense and dangers of the contest. I therefore expect that when the Emperor has signed and sealed and begun his march, they will be ready enough here to act without him, if no new danger should assail any flank of any of their Minister-Generals or General-Ministers. On the third article of the seconde esquisse, I remarked that the Declaration to be made ought rather to be to the General Commanding the French troops than to the Directory, in order to avoid all delay between that measure and the immediate advance of the Prussian troops, and this idea was not objected to by Haugwiz, who agrees with me in regarding this Declaration only as a form ; but I shall endeavour to give to it as short an interval of time as is possible, for I think it is to the last degree absurd to give your enemy notice of your approach and desire him by his answer to fix the period of your attack ; upon the last sentence of this article I told Haugwiz that I thought the direction of the Prussian troops on the day of hostility should rather depend upon military concert according to the circumstances of the day, than be specified in a treaty, but he said that the King thought he acted more fairly in plainly saying he would not be positively bound to march into Holland, unless his left was sufficiently protected ; upon the whole I give less importance to this object just now, because I hope I can trust that from our Baltick expedition we are much less solicitous to fix the Prussians down to entering the United Provinces ; what we want is their hostility to France, and the new impression of dismay which will be produced at Paris by their seeing a new and powerful enemy pressing upon them with all the other defeats and misfortunes of the campaign.

"Upon the convention I have said in my despatch all that I can say till I come to closer quarters ; I hope I shall limit the sum somehow or other to one million from 1st August to 31st December, by periodical payments to be made on the 1st of every month ; and I presume there would be no objection to making the first payment on the 1st August, if they will positively engage for acting the first moment that we land, or that the Russians arrive in the cercle du Haut Rhin.

"By the fifth article you see Haugwiz retains the hope of being again upon the defensive after success, but as far as our treaty is concerned in this, it gives me no pain, as our monthly payments will secure us against any improper application of our money; as far as it regards the general politics of Europe, though I had rather keep Prussia as an active ally against France, if however Prussia will fairly defend the Dutch provinces with their new limits, and maintain them against France without a new peace, I shall be content; against the separate peace of Prussia we have likewise the security of the sixth article, for I apprehend we shall not let Prussia make their own peace first, and ours afterwards.

"I send you some interesting Dutch papers respecting the state of their military defences. I think it is evident that the French expect us in the provinces of Groningen and Zeeland, and their attention to the Greb betrays their apprehensions of Prussia; they are applying with increasing activity, and I trust that their doing so will produce, as it ought, redoubled activity at London and Petersburg; I was going to add too, at Berlin, but I must now see Haugwiz and will tell you if I can add that word at my return."

1 p.m.—"I am just returned from Count Haugwiz; all goes on well, he has seen the King who approves the second sketch, and we send to invite Panin to come in haste from Carlsbadt and do his business here. Haugwiz gave to me also the royal approbation of my project to make a new epoch of our claim to his declaration as soon as we had landed a force in Holland, and Haugwiz desires himself to draw up his notion of our separate convention of subsidy, with this new condition stated in it. I shall be very proud of myself if I succeed in this to my wish. The Baltick expedition begins however to be much talked of, and Haugwiz told me to-day that they were alarmed at Copenhagen by our project of landing at Lubeck. I told him I was very glad of it, and that I desired no better than that the whole northern coast should be alarmed from Lubeck to Ostend, because the more general was the alarm, the more easy it would be to cover any real enterprise which it might be wise to undertake; he again spoke of the necessity of our understanding each other for military co-operation in Holland, and I again told him that as soon as he had made himself an active ally by signing a treaty for active hostilities, we would then concert and communicate with him upon our military operations.

"I enclose to you two letters from Stamford for your private eye; they have added to the esteem and admiration which I have for him. Popham's present despatches to Dundas I have respected as they are not under flying seal. I think he has infinite merit and deserves infinite praise; I will not quarrel with him for his desiring to make that praise exclusive.

"I expect Stamford the end of this month; I hope he will come to take possession of Holland, and then I shall fairly have worked my passage home through Helvoetsluys. I am going to give the H[ereditary] P[rince] of Orange another sum of one thousand pounds; if he has as much discretion and economy in public finances as in his own there will be no ground of complaint, for I do assure you that among the princes of the day he is one of the very best that I have seen. I shall wait impatiently for Panin; he has sent me a report from Carlsbadt dated 8th instant of Sir Sydney taking Buonaparte and his army, and of Suwaroff having announced at Vienna the taking of Alexandria, and of Klenau having again beaten the French at Modena, taking 3,000 prisoners and two generals; but these are unsupported reports; that which I mention in my despatch is sent from Munich both to Haugwiz and to the Bavarian Minister. If I judge of your fatigue by mine, you must be heartily tired of me both public and private. Pray send a messenger instantly to tell me how far you approve or disapprove, for I shall go on as fast as I can."

Enclosure 1.

GENERAL DE STAMFORD to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, June 29. St. Petersburg.—"Le départ du courier chargé de vous porter ma lettre du 26, se trouvant retardé de quelques jours, je profite d'un instant de liberté que me laisse la vie très dissipée à laquelle je suis obligé, pour vous écrire encore quelques mots.

"Les difficultés pour les subsistances de l'armée Russe de 45,000 hommes, dont je vous parlai dans ma lettre d'avant-hier,¹ seront levées. M. de Cobenzl vient de donner à ce sujet les plus fortes assurances à l'Empereur, et comme il a des pouvoirs fort étendus de sa Cour, il a expédié, dit-on, des ordres très-précises en conséquence. Les préparatifs qui se font à Cronstadt intriguent furieusement ce Ministre, et pour le moins autant que sa face hideuse, toute convertie d'ulcères, intrigue son médecin, qui ignore probablement s'il pourra le tirer d'affaire sans que le patient y laisse le nez ou les oreilles. Il m'a taté et tourné de toutes les manières pour tirer de moi quelques éclaircissemens sur ces préparatifs; mais se persuadant enfin que je n'en savois pas plus que lui, il m'a dit tout bonnement qu'ils ne pouvoient avoir pour but qu'un de ces trois objets: d'embarquer un corps de troupes soit pour le Portugal, soit pour les côtes d'Angleterre, où elles seroient à portée d'être transportées en Irlande, soit enfin pour faire une descente en Hollande.

"On m'assure qu'il n'a tenu qu'à Cobenzl, à son arrivée ici, d'avoir 40,000 Russes de plus; mais qu'il n'en a pas voulu, parcequ'il a craint de donner à l'Empereur de Russie une trop grande influence sur les dispositions ultérieures de la Cour de Vienne. On voit, à travers tout ce que cet homme dit, le faiseur de paix qui ne demanderait pas mieux que de renouveler le traité de Campo-formio avec quelques avantages de plus pour l'Autriche, sans s'embarrasser le moins du monde de ce que deviendrait tout le reste. J'avoue que j'eus une belle peur en voyant, ces jours passés, débarquer ici son ancien collègue le Marquis de Gallo; mais je suis rassuré depuis que je sais que leurs chiens ne chassent plus ensemble. Ce dernier dit à qui veut l'entendre que l'Autriche se soucie si peu de voir le Roi de

Naples rétabli sur son trône, que si elle trouvoit à faire pour elle-même une paix comme elle la désire, la condition que le royaume de Naples restât république ne l'effaroucheroit pas un seul instant ; et que c'est pour cette raison, et pour recommander les intérêts de son maître à l'Empereur, qu'il est venu ici. Voilà donc un Câmpe-formien bien converti. Dieu veuille les convertir tous.

“ Je ne vous parle pas, de notre affaire κατ'ἑξόκην par ce que je sais que M. le Chevalier Whitworth vous tient au courant de tout ce qui se fait ici à ce sujet. Graces à l'activité de M. Popham, la chose se presse avec toute l'ardeur possible. Cependant, je crois devoir ajouter encore quelques mots à mon apologie sur ce que je n'ai pas, comme vous l'auriez peut-être désiré, insisté sur un nombre plus considerable de troupes. Tout étoit déjà convenu et concerté entre sa Majesté l'Empereur et Messieurs Whitworth et Popham, lorsque je vins ici ; et quelque diligence que j'eusse pu faire, je n'aurois jamais pu y arriver en même tems que le dernier. Or, l'Empereur ayant d'abord aquiescé à la demande qui lui fut faite, mais en declarant qu'il ne pouvoit pas accorder au delà de 17,000 hommes, auxquels il a trouvé bon depuis d'ajouter encore mille, j'aurois certainement indisposé ce monarque si je m'étois avisé de revenir à la charge pour lui demander un nombre plus considerable. Ma position entre ce Prince et M. Popham, dont il avoit déjà adopté les plans, étoit delicate. L'Empereur est un prince tel qu'il le faut pour la salut de l'Europe ; c'est une ame de feu, pleine de noblesse, sensible à l'honneur et à la gloire, et n'ayant en vuë que de faire triompher la cause dont il a embrassé la défense ; mais ces sentimens veulent être ménagés ; un mot, une expression inconsiderée, la moindre contrariété dans sa volonté, cette volonté prévenue ou trop pressée, peuvent tout-à-coup arrêter chez lui les résolutions les plus importantes. Il souffre l'observation quand elle est juste et il se rend ; mais il faut une grande délicatesse pour oser la lui présenter, et pour qu'il n'en soit pas blessé au début.

“ J'ai rencontré dans M. Popham un homme plein de zèle, de talents et de connoissances. Il me paroît né avec ce courage qui ne doute de rien, et à qui les choses les plus difficiles paroissent aisées ; mais j'ai tout de suite pu m'appercevoir qu'il joignoit à ces qualités ce degré d'ambition qui porte l'homme qui en est doué, et qui se voit chargé de quelque entreprise, à vouloir seul en recueillir toute la gloire. Je devois par conséquent le ménager, et surtout ne lui donner aucun ombrage. Au lieu donc de chercher à lui faire adopter mes idées, je me mis à examiner attentivement les siennes, et trouvant que d'après son plan les principaux efforts seront tournés contre la Zéelande, ce qu'il vaut peut-être mieux que s'ils l'étoient contre la Frise et la Groningue, j'y aquiesçai sans la moindre contradiction, en lui observant simplement, ainsi qu'à M. Whitworth, qu'il est d'une importance extrême d'user de toute la prévoyance possible, pour éviter les cas où l'on seroit obligé de sacrifier un grand nombre de troupes. Ce qui m'a paru avoir fait sur M. Popham l'effet de lui faire examiner de nouveau son projet d'attaque, et d'y faire de très excellens changemens, qu'il a eu la bonté de me communiquer hiér.

"Mon départ va être retardé de quelques jours encore, M. le Vice-Chancelier m'ayant fait dire que l'Empereur se proposoit de me charger d'une lettre pour le Prince d'Orange. Si je la reçois aujourd'hui, comme je l'espère, je partirai sans faute demain." Copy.

Enclosure 2.

ESQUISSE SECONDE D'UN PROJET D'ARTICLES, DE
M. DE HAUGWITZ.

1799, July 10. Berlin.—Article 1. "Le Roi s'engage à co-opérer avec la Russie et l'Angleterre à la délivrance de la Hollande et des pays limitrophes.

Article 2. "S[a] M[ajesté] accepte pour cet effet l'offre amicale que lui a faite s[a] M[ajesté] l'Empereur de Russie de concourir à cette expédition, en y employant un corps de 45,000 hommes.

Article 3. "À mesure que les troupes Russes avanceront vers les frontières de l'empire Germanique, le Roi de Prusse préparera, et rassemblera de son côté, les moyens nécessaires dont il aura besoin pour l'entreprise qui fait l'objet de sa co-opération.

Nota Bene. "Ici l'on exprimera la force de l'armée Prussienne qui doit agir, proportionnellement aux arrangements pécuniaires dont on sera convenu.

"Du moment que les troupes Russes auront dépassé les frontières de la Franconie, et seront arrivées dans la partie de l'empire qui est située entre le Mayne et le Rhin, le Roi s'engage d'adresser à la République Française une déclaration péremptoire pour la sommer d'évacuer, dans un délai donné, le territoire des Provinces-Unies et des pays limitrophes. Si cette sommation n'est pas suivie d'une réponse complètement satisfaisante, et du prompt effet qui doit en résulter, le Roi combinera dès lors ses opérations militaires avec celles des troupes de s[a] M[ajesté] l'Empereur de Russie, et poursuivra, dans un concert ultérieur, l'expédition projetée contre la Hollande et les pays limitrophes qui fait le but de la présente convention. Mais avant d'en venir à l'exécution même de cette entreprise, le Roi présuppose que les troupes Russes seront déjà parvenues à former le blocus des forteresses de Mayence et d'Ehrenbreitstein, pour couvrir le flanc gauche de l'armée Prussienne.

Article 4. "L'Angleterre s'engage à fournir à la Prusse les secours pécuniaires dont elle aura besoin pour sa co-opération, et à les continuer jusqu'au terme où elle finira, sur le taux et d'après les répartitions qui seront réglées dans une convention particulière à conclure entre les deux Cours.

Article 5. "Dès qu'on sera parvenu à délivrer la Hollande et les pays limitrophes de la dépendance dans laquelle le Gouvernement Français les retient présentement, et qu'on aura procuré à ces pays une frontière solide qui les mette à l'abri des entreprises futures de la République Française, la Prusse se bornera dès lors à des mesures purement défensives, et telles que l'état des choses les exigera, sans être censée liée par la présente convention à s'immiscer ultérieurement dans les affaires intérieures de la France.

Article 6. "Dans le cours de la guerre, et surtout vers l'époque de la paix générale, les trois Cours se concerteront entre elles sur les affaires qui regardent l'Italie et la Suisse, mais particulièrement sur l'ordre des choses à rétablir dans la république des Provinces Unies, et sur les affaires qui se rapportent à l'empire Germanique. Et à l'égard de ce dernier, elles se chargeront d'une garantie mutuelle, tendante à maintenir intactes les principautés ou possessions héréditaires en Allemagne." Copie.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 12. Harley Street.—"Je vous prie de me faire l'amitié de m'envoyer un billet avec lequel Rogerson et moi nous puissions entrer dans votre chambre des Pairs pour voir la prorogation du Parlement.

"Je supplie de vous souvenir de la notte que vous m'avez promis de m'envoyer, pour que je puisse écrire par le courier de ce soir, en conformité de ce que vous ecrirez vous-meme."

INTELLIGENCE RESPECTING HOLLAND.

July 12. Bremen.—"On assure, à n'en presque pas douter, que le corps Russe qui descend en trois colonnes de la Bohême et d'Hongrie vers le bas Rhin est destiné en partie à appuyer les mesures d'insurrection dans les Provinces-Unies. Il n'est presque pas douteux que, du coté de la Prusse, on n'entre de cette manière incidemment en lice, soit pour ou contre. Il semble qu'on médite à Berlin de jouer le rôle de Médiateur, et l'on voudra, peut-être, se faire valoir dans cette qualité au moment où on le jugera convenable.

"Lorsqu'on en sera venu au moment de délivrer la Hollande la bombe éclatera, l'on se déclarera, et l'on voudra prévenir que la Russie et l'Angleterre seules ne rétablissent le Stadhoudérat en Hollande." Extract.

SECRET REPORT FROM FRANCE.

[1799] July 13.—"Le nouveau Directeur Goyer [Gohier] a quelqu'esprit, quelques-uns des talens qui caractérisent l'avocat, aucun de celles qui sont nécessaires à l'homme d'état, aucune de connoissances que sa place exigerait. Il est Jacobin; il était avant la Révolution avocat à Rennes; il fut connu particulièrement par un mémoire qu'il fit pour un M. Desgrées du Coup, contre M. le Duc de Duras. Le vérité est que Goyer n'avait fait qu'y donner son nom, et que ce mémoire avait été fait par un autre avocat. Roger Duclos lui ressemble à tous les égards, il est plus éloquent, mais il a moins d'esprit. Le général Dumoulin est jacobin sans talent, sans aucun esprit. Tout dépend des armées, si elles continuent à être battues tout achevera de désorganiser. Le découragement et l'indiscipline se portent à leur comble ; le Gouvernement n'effraye plus. On cesse de payer, le crédit achève de se détruire, et les armées restent sans approvisionemens ; mais si la victoire revient aux Français, les conscripts marcheront aux armées, les fournisseurs feront des avances, et la résistance peut se prolonger. Mon ami chargea l'homme dont on a parlé d'aller chez Brune, et de lui faire des questions sur la situation présente, et voici leur conversation. 'Hé bien, général, où en sommes nous ? tout va fort mal.—est-ce qu'il n'y a pas quelque espérance de ramener la victoire?' 'On n'en remporte pas—avec les soldats découragés qui ne veulent plus se battre.—Il est vrai qu'on va former un camp sur le Bas Rhin ?—et avec quoi voulez-vous qu'on le forme, quand on n'a pas même de troupes pour renforcer les armées qui agissent?'—'On dit qu'on veut vous donner le commandement d'une des armées en activité ; je le désirerais beaucoup ; vos talens' 'Et moi, j'en serais fâché ; qu'est-ce que je ferais de soldats qui, comme je vous l'ai dit, ne veulent plus ni obéir ni se battre ?'—L'officier de garde entra, la conversation changea, mais comme bientôt on reparla des armées, cet officier ne craignit point de dire devant le général qu'il y avait assez longtems qu'on se battait, et qu'il fallait la paix, et le général ne répondit rien.—On a copié littéralement cette conversation, parce qu'elle met à portée de connoître l'opinion que les gens les plus instruits de l'état des armées ont aujourd'hui des forces de la France.

"Il est évident que Syès, en faisant ou consentant à la révolution qui a déplacé les trois Directeurs, a été d'accord avec les deux partis qui divisent les conseils, mais il est très difficile de croire qu'il consente à laisser dominer les jacobins, qui ne veulent point de Directoire. Il ne reste qu'à savoir si c'est lui qui joue les Jacobins, ou qui a été leur dupe : plusieurs décrets tendant à diminuer la puissance Directoriate, l'établissement de la commission des onze, semblant annoncer que c'est Syès qui a été trompé. L'on aura bientôt le mot de l'énigme ; si cette commission se maintient, elle culbutera le gouvernement. Les papiers publics le disent dissident, et les nouvelles du 2 Juillet de Paris parlent de la création d'une nouvelle commission de six membres, pour faire un rapport prochain sur l'état actuel, et sur les moyens d'y obvier, et de rendre à la France la supériorité. Pour peindre tout ce qui tient au gouvernement il suffit de dire—qu'il n'y en a pas un seul qui ne soit à vendre, et qui ne se donnât au premier qui lui assureroit, sous un autre gouvernement, de l'argent, ou un équivalent de la place qu'il perdrait ; et qu'à l'instant où l'approche du danger commencerait à leur inspirer des craintes, tous, sans excepter les Directeurs, se laisseraient aisément gagner, si on leur donnait une garantie de leur vie, de leur fortune, et un azile dans quelque partie de l'Europe ; on est de même persuadé que si les craintes que les Jacobins leur inspirent devenaient plus vives, il ne serait point impossible de traiter avec eux. Voilà les détails que la personne qu'on a proposée pour être instruit de tout ce qui se passe en France, a donné à mon ami, il y a huit jours.

“Voici les nouvelles qui m'arrivent de Hollande par ce courrier. Le parti Jacobin paraît prévaloir, et s'est étayé de Daendels, qui jusques hiér avait été leur antagoniste. Il passe pour certain que c'est Brune qui a fait cet arrangement : on le juge par les liaisons extérieurs des deux généraux. Ce nouvel ordre de choses déplace les Directeurs Zaarsollen et Emmerens qui demandent leurs démissions. Van der Goos, ministre des affaires extérieures, a donné la sienne. On croit que Daendels pourrait être nommé Directeur ; le général est vain et présomptueux, et pourrait bien donné dans un piège qu'on lui tendrait en l'éloignant du généralat, où il n'est pas aisé de faire de lui ce qu'on voudrait, parceque les troupes Bataves lui sont attachées, c'est à dire, les officiers qui lui doivent en plus grande partie leurs places, et leur avancement. Le ministre Français Lombard a été rappelé subitement sans avoir eu le tems d'emmener avec lui sa famille. On l'accuse de liaisons avec les Anglais, d'accord avec le ministre de la marine Batave, pour livrer le pays aux Anglais, et leur en faciliter l'entrée.

“Le gouvernement Batave vient de donner l'ordre aux commandants et municipalités des villes de Breda, Bois le Duc, Steenberg, et Bergopzoom d'approvisionner leurs places dans l'espace de deux mois.

“L'homme de la Haye écrit un seul petit billet, où il dit que l'on est inquiet à Paris pour les provinces de Bretagne et de Poitou, où on craint qu'il n'éclate des troubles, lorsqu'on voudra mettre à exécution la loi qui rassemble ou fait marcher les classes, et prélever le contingent de l'emprunt forcé de 100 millions. J'ai eu quelques détails hiér sur le Brabant : grand découragement parmi les habitans, et tout préparé pour un soulèvement, s'il paraît de troupes. Les conscrits désertent tant qu'ils peuvent ; il y a huit jours, trois postes qui gardaient les portes de Malines ont déserté en entier. Les conscrits du pays n'ont pas meilleure volonté : les gendarmes n'osent pénétrer dans les villages, ni dans les bois, retraite des fugitifs, parcequ'on les fusille.”

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

Note de l'objet dont nous avons parlé ce matin.

1799, July 13. Dropmore.—“La Cour de Vienne ayant témoigné au Lord Henley son désir qu'il fut envoyé au quartier-général de l'Archiduc un officer-général de la part du Roi, ainsi que de celle de l'Empereur de Russie, pour concerter les opérations futures des deux armées, Sa Majesté a accédé à cette demande, et Sa Majesté désireroit que le Général Korsakoff fut autorisé d'entrer dans cette discussion, et d'appuyer les plans qui seront proposés de la part du Roi en conformité aux idées qui ont déjà été communiquées et approuvées à Petersbourg. Elles consistent en faisant joindre aux 45,000 Russes sous le Général Korsakow, les troupes Russes servant actuellement en Italie—mettant le tout sous les ordres du Maréchal Souvarow, et les faisant marcher en France, et particulièrement sur Lyons. A cette armée on joindroit les Suisses que l'on pourroit lever, et les 6,000 hommes de Wurtemberg.

“Mais pour le succès de cette opération on le croit absolument nécessaire qu'elle soit soutenue à droite et à gauche par les armées Autrichiennes, et cela d'assez près pour que les armées puissent, en cas de besoin, se soutenir réciproquement, ou même se réunir.

“On regarde donc le projet (annoncé à Lord Henley par M. Thugut) du siège de Mayence comme étant aussi incompatible avec ce plan qu'avec toute autre vue d'attaque vigoureuse contre la République. Et on désire vivement d'être appuyé par la Russie en protestant contre cette mesure.” Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 14. Berlin.—“The enclosed packet arrived here this morning from Vienna by estafette. I profit of the departure of M. De Luc, who quits Berlin this evening, to forward it to you; he means to travel night and day, and therefore you will soon be in possession of the agreeable news concerning Buonaparte; I shall have an additional pleasure if his defeat and discomfiture shall have been brought about by Sir Sidney; I do not care how much he vapours about it, provided he does the thing, and I do not agree in any respect with those who are fastidious enough not to admire his spirit of activity and enterprise because he dresses like Charles the Twelfth, and talks more of himself than is consistent with perfect modesty and discretion. The last of my letters by Johnson was written in so much hurry and after so much fatigue that I am not sure it will have been quite intelligible to you. I have however sent to you by a short official despatch my letter to Captain Popham, by which you will see that I not only entirely agreed with you in the project of an immediate attack by the two divisions, but, knowing the importance of time, I have already suggested the same project to Captain Popham, as one which may very probably be approved by the Government and acted upon; he will certainly feel bound to wait for your orders, and it is absolutely necessary that he should receive your directions as to the time and means of co-operation in the attack from England; but, at all events, if you ultimately pursue this plan, it will be useful that Popham should have been thus early apprised enough of it to turn it in his thoughts, and to consider of such arrangements as may be necessary to the execution of it. I shall expect to-morrow or next day to advance with M. de Haugwiz in the discussion of the pecuniary convention.

“The more I consider the whole subject, the more I am persuaded that, if possible, I must pursue my project of engaging the Prussian declaration by the march of our enterprise, and making them agree to act openly so soon as our two divisions shall have set foot in any part of the United Provinces. The advantage of this agreement will be that it can be concluded at once, whereas the condition of the Russian march may meet with great doubt, delay, and difficulty at Petersburg. I see no reason why we should not pursue in one treaty the epoch of the Russian march if it can be obtained, but I shall care little about the success of that if I can accomplish the other treaty, and bind them by that to act as soon as we shall act in Holland. It is not the part of a good politician to feed you with these good hopes upon grounds which I see perhaps with too sanguine an eye: but provided these hopes do their duty in England, they will tend rather to redouble the activity of your measures than to suspend or relax them.

“We begin to hear much of magazines forming by Prussian commissaries near Wesel; the Duke of Brunswick has sent to the Prince of Orange for two or three confidential officers, and the expectation of the public begins to grow alive upon the appearances of Prussian co-operation. You will perhaps wonder that I have spoken so slightly at Petersburg of my hopes here, but I am afraid of diverting the Emperor from the great project which he is now engaged in, to the little calculation of Prussian hopes, and I wish him still to think, as I do, that our only sure hope is in our own exertions.”

LORD GRENVILLE TO THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, July 16. Dropmore.—“The despatches which this messenger carries to Sir Charles Whitworth will put you au fait of our present projects which are much more forward than I ventured to flatter myself they would be by this time. Knowing as you do how much I am attached to operations en masse preferably to diversions, you will naturally imagine that I fell in very readily with the opinion expressed by our military advisers here in favour of bringing so large a proportion of our force to the westward, and making the other operation serve rather as a point d'appui for insurrection than as a serious and principal attack. I only hope the change will not discourage Stamford, nor diminish the zeal of our Emperor who conducts himself as an Emperor should. A letter from Lord R. Fitzgerald informs me, on the authority of his Russian colleague, that we have got our Swedes, so that there can now be no doubt of our force being amply sufficient for the progress of the enterprise, provided it is so for its beginning, and on this point I do not find that the person who is to execute it entertains the smallest doubt. We have taken all the means we can think of to alarm the Dutch Government for Walcheren; but it is unlucky that we cannot spare ships or men enough to make a show of landing, though without really doing so.

“The business of transports is also advanced much beyond any hopes that I had allowed myself to entertain, and within these few days we have obtained an additional aid in East India ships which seems to put the thing out of all doubt. If we ourselves are not too late, the lateness of the season will operate in some respects in our favour, for once in possession, it will be less easy to undertake any operation to dislodge us.

"We are waiting with much impatience for your next despatch which is to bring us the explanation of Haugwitz's enigmas. I have, however, little expectation that this explanation will be such as, in the increased state of our own preparations, and with the additional expense which they must of course bring upon us, we shall think it prudent to accept. In truth they have not only let our opportunity pass by, but their own also. We shall now do, by great exertion and expense, what they might have done for us at much less than the million we offered. But in standing by as lookers on of this operation, they will lose a great part of their own consideration and weight, both present and future.

"The thing that perplexes me most in this and in every other part of my business is the conduct of Thugut. If he were paid to thwart all our measures, and to favour those of France, he could not do it more effectually. I have desired a copy to be sent you with this of Lord Henley's despatch No. 75, because I doubt whether he will have done so. My answer to it, as far as it can yet be answered, passes also through Berlin, in order that you may see it and write to Lord Minto upon it.

"I construe the whole thus. Thugut now thinking the Italian acquisitions secure, and the Milanese reconquered, and the Novarese in his hands, looks back to the Low Countries as the next object of scramble. For the success of our forward move into France, and for the effects which that is to produce on the internal government of that country, the real root and origin of all its wickedness, he is not in the least degree anxious; and considers it only as a diversion which will put Mayence, the Netherlands, and the left bank of the Rhine into the hands of Austria to cut and carve as she thinks proper.

"With regard to the Netherlands we may perhaps be beforehand with him, as far as relates to driving the French out of the open country, and organizing a government of the Brabançons and Flemings themselves; because, even if he executes his plan, the siege of Mayence will occupy him till winter; and if we execute ours, there is little reason to believe that any of the towns of the Dutch frontier will hold out as long as that; unless perhaps Maestricht.

"But the real difficulty of the whole is this, that unless we can get the Archduke's army to co-operate directly (not by diversion) with the Russians, the force of the latter cannot be sufficient to to produce real impression on France. Korsakow's is called 45,000, say 40,000. Suwarrow's Russians, taking both bodies, cannot at the end of the campaign be put at more than 15,000 the one and 10,000 the other. It would be safer to calculate the whole at 60,000 Russians; add 6,000 Wurtemburghers, and 14,000 Swiss (if we get them) and the whole is 80,000 men. A formidable body for any one line of attack, or for a narrow country like Lombardy and Piemont, bounded by Alps on one side, and sea on the other. But it is nothing for advancing into France, where your base is of no greater [less?] extent than from Basle to Geneva, and where every step you go lengthens both your flanks. The siege of Mayence would, in fact, be no diversion at all with a view to this operation, for the French would neglect it, leave the place to occupy the Austrians as long as it could, and would bring all their force to bear on the advancing army.

"We must therefore, if we are persuaded as I am that nothing will terminate this war but such success in France as enables us to restore the monarchy, take some measures to dissuade the Court of Vienna from this ruinous or insidious project. How to do this is the difficulty. When they have once set their hearts upon the recovery of the Netherlands, and have the means pretty much within their own power, will anything make them abandon this object except the assurance that we will take care of it for them? Can we give them this assurance? Could we do the thing, and, if we could, what will Russia say to it? The only thing that seems at all distinctly stated in Haugwitz's riddles is the idea of giving a better frontier to the U[nited] P[rovin]ces, which means, in other words, giving them a part or the whole of the Netherlands.

"I had formed a project within these few days of proposing both to Berlin and Vienna some compromise on this subject, by which Austria should enjoy, perhaps a nominal sovereignty, but certainly an annual payment equal to the greatest surplus revenue that the Vienna treasury ever drew from Brussels; while, as to real government, those Provinces should be placed under the direction of Holland, and should unite in some federal compact with that country. Complicated as this seems, it is not much more so than the present state of the sovereignty of Neuchatel as with respect to Prussia and Swisserland, nor would it be difficult to find a mode of executing it, partly on the principle of the barrier treaty, and partly by applying that of mortgage for the Imperial loans here, and acting on that principle according to the practice recognised in the Empire. But the solid objection is found not to the mode of executing it, so much as, in limine, to the thing itself. It does not, I fear, hold out inducement enough to the Austrians to acquiesce in it for the present, and it would undeniably be a state of things that could not last, and that must be the seed of future wars, in which this country, both from her engagements, and her interest in the subject, would be compelled to bear her part.

"We have therefore resolved to suspend our decision till your next letter arrives, because that will give us a little more insight into the views of Prussia. If the result is (as I rather expect) unfavourable, or at least not sufficiently decisive to induce us to close with it, the present tendency of my opinion would be to take Austria at her word, and to offer to her that, if she will abandon this project of Mayence and the Netherlands, and suffer the Archduke to act towards Basle, Belfort and Besançon, we will send our Russians to Lyons, and having re-established royalty in those provinces during the winter, proceed in the spring as far as our success will carry us, giving to the Court of Vienna the guaranty of Great Britain and of Russia that no peace shall be made which does not restore the Netherlands to them.

"This you see is a large project, and requires being deliberately and maturely considered. And the quarter in which it presents most difficulty is on the side of Prussia. It can hardly be hoped that Berlin could be a tranquil spectator of such a result, and if they were, without acting, merely to draw together an army in Silesia, the whole plan might be deranged.

"In like manner if we refuse, or if Russia refuses, to accede to Thugut's plan it is impracticable, for unless Swisserland and the Upper Rhine be protected by Korsakow, there can be no question of the Archduke's going to Mayence.

"Any one of the four Powers might, if it pleased, destroy even the brilliant prospects that we have now before us, but how to make them draw together for one common object, and with one combined plan, is still, as it always has been, our great difficulty. The unbounded influence which we have just now at Petersburg offers us for this purpose better means than we have yet had, and you see I do not neglect to avail myself of them.

"We leave you, as you see, but little time for what is to be done in the Dutch Provinces by the Hereditary Prince of Orange, but the thing presses; and you will, I know, as far as depends on you, rather push it on than let it be retarded by any cause which you can either remove or diminish." Copy.

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 16. Downing Street.—"I think the mail of to-day, as far as relates to Berlin, a little less encouraging than your brother's preceding dispatch of the 6th. Neither seem to throw any clear light on the question what Prussia aims at respecting the Netherlands; but I suppose the expression of 'Holland and the neighbouring Provinces' must be supposed to include the Netherlands. If so his operations, if they take place at all, will make him nearly master of the Netherlands for the time, however he may mean to dispose of them afterwards. I believe, on the whole, this is the best thing that could happen, provided he acts in time to prevent Russia diverting its force to the same quarter. In this view the great objection to the proposed or rather expected convention is the clause about Mayence and Ehrenbreitstein, as I suppose this fourth army of the Emperor Paul is so far from those quarters that, if Prussia still waits for its arrival, Austria may hope to reach the Netherlands before him, our great object being to prevent Austria from acting on that side this year. We seem still to be in as great a difficulty as ever to decide what is the best line for that purpose. What instructions do you incline to send either to Berlin or Vienna under these circumstances? The prospect of concluding with Prussia seems near enough to leave us no subsidy to transfer to Austria. The chance of Prussia's occupying the Netherlands seems to make any offer on our part to co-operate with Austria for recovering them another year nugatory. There are, at the same time, pressing, and I rather think, decisive reasons for concluding with Prussia, if they will close on the terms your brother expects. But then I see no inducement left to bring Austria to concur heartily in our plan for the remainder of this campaign, except good argument, and the chance of the influence of Russia ; and I much doubt whether these alone are sufficient to make them act rationally."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 16. Park Street, Westminster.—“The change of things which has brought us back to the same hopes as at the beginning of the war, seems to have brought us likewise to the same errors. We are proceeding equally without regard to those allies who, if not in the first instance, must in the last be the most necessary of all ; and are letting loose upon the Royalists in the interior all those whom the successes of the allies have set aside from combating upon the frontiers. The garrisons of Milan and other places are now about to do the same thing that the garrisons of Mayence and Valenciennes did at the beginning of the contest. They are to be employed in garrisoning Brest, and keeping in order the Royalists of those provinces. Surely it is necessary that something should be done with a view to this evil. My idea is that, in the case of any future prisoners taken upon capitulation, one of the conditions should be that they should not serve (either against the allies or) against any party in France acting in the name of Louis XVIII. It is perfectly possible, and most likely, that such a condition will produce no effect in the use that will be made of any prisoners so surrendered ; and that not a man the less will be employed against the Royalists. But the same may be said probably in the case of any condition made in favour of the allies. The chief advantage will be in the impression made upon the Royalists, and in its furnishing the most safe, and possibly the most efficacious, of all modes of manifesting to the well affected in France the sentiments with which the allies are actuated. If this opinion should be adopted, you will probably think that no time should be lost in communicating an instruction to this effect to Wickham and Lord Minto and others who may be in the way to dispose the Austrians ; for the Russians, I hope, will need no persuasion to adopt this measure. The want of it will produce no small degree of distrust and discouragement.

“It appears by accounts from all quarters that a considerable tendency to insurrection is showing itself throughout the whole extent of the Royalist provinces. It is certain, indeed, that it must be so. The disposition has never ceased to exist, and having only been kept down by the strong hand of military force, is sure to rise the moment that pressure is removed. Do we mean to leave this spirit wholly unassisted ; and, while we are seeking and relying upon insurrection everywhere else, to reject it in the quarter where we are sure to find it in its highest degree of intensity, and where it can alone prove directly and completely effectual? If we do not, it is high time that means should be taken to co-operate with these dispositions; and that we should not be to seek at the moment when some successful operation on the part of the Royalists may call upon us for immediate assistance. The first thing to be done is by countenance, and communication, and reasonable assistance to show that at a proper time we mean to co-operate with them; and thus to endeavour to gain their confidence, and acquire in some measure the direction of them. It is by these means that we may hope to hold them back; which may be more important and probably more difficult than to bring them forward. I am the last person in the world for wishing that at this moment the spirit of royalism in these provinces should break out into any acts of open violence. But this is the moment when a secret organization should be going forward, and means be taken for preparing them for what may be desirable, or what may be necessary for them to do at a period of which we cannot tell the exact distance.

"Sir S. Warren is, I understand, likely to be employed soon. If he is allowed to take on board with him a proper supply of arms and ammunition, his zeal and intelligence in this service will find the means of conveying them into the country without exciting any dangerous attention. An application has lately been handed over from me to Frere, with a note from me recommending a compliance with it. It is a matter of small amount; but in the spirit of economy which I have always acted upon in these concerns, I should, upon second thoughts, recommend a more limited compliance even with that request. I would willingly save a hundred pounds in the quality of the arms, to have a hundred more to lay out on the pressing exigencies of individuals here, or on the other side of the water, who may want it for shoes and stockings. Means should likewise be taken for increasing the supply of arms from Jersey and St. Marcouf. Though each cargo is small, the quantity thus introduced into the country may be made to become not inconsiderable; and if the insurrection shall break out, every firelock gives a soldier. When matters are more advanced, and the allies shall be certain of entering France, I should clearly be of opinion for taking possession of Haedick and Houat, and protecting them against sudden attacks, during accidental absences of the naval force, by a blockhouse. The force which Sir S. Warren should have with him should not be less, and I don't know that it need be more than two or three ships of the line in addition to his frigates. I have the best reason for saying that, with the most trifling preparation, the ships may be made perfectly independent of this country in respect of water. One of the reasons for taking possession of these two islands is that they may become safe depositaries for stores to be left there, which now are always liable to be discovered and seized by the enemy. I shall be much surprized if, with a force stationed in Quiberon Bay, we shall hear any more of convoys continually passing into Brest; of which, in the course of the present summer, I doubt whether there have been less than four hundred sail."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 17. Harley Street.—“La quantité de troupes que vous donnez pour l'expédition fera grand plaisir à l'Empereur. parceque mes amis Kotchoubei et Rastopchin me marquent qu'il a désiré que vous en donniez, car il a une grande opinion, et come de raison, de la valeur des Anglois, et il s'est servi de ces mots, j'ai autant de confiance dans leurs troupes qu'ils en ont dans les miennes; et comme vous en donnez plus qu'il n'espérait, il en sera enchanté. Par une lettre que je reçois dans ce moment de Sievers, notre chargé d'affaire à Berlin, je vois la confirmation de espérance que vous m'avez donné par votre billet d'hier. Ainsi je me flatte que vous viendrez ici, et que j'aurai le plaisir de vous voir.”

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 18. Downing Street.—“On considering the doubts you state, and all the circumstances suggested in your brother's letter, I incline to think still that it is very desirable that the Prussian convention should, at any rate, be completed on the conditions he mentions without delay; and I should be much afraid of the effects of now desiring any fresh reference hither. Indeed it is more than possible that any instruction to that effect will be too late, as your brother will, I think, have signed the convention in the meantime. But there is certainly great awkwardness, at least, in withholding, in that case, the knowledge of the measures we are ourselves taking; and there might, I think, even be great advantage, and at all events could be no harm, in communicating them. We shall be so near the very moment of acting, that we shall at most be only telling our secret a few days before it will tell itself, and too late for Prussia to oppose us, even if so inclined. We shall have the chance by a frank communication of bringing them to accept our operations as a substitute, either in the whole or in part, for the aid of Russian troops on their left; and may induce them, if they are really in earnest, to act immediately, destining, if necessary, a part of their force (which our support on the other side will enable them to spare) to watching Ehrenbreitstein and even Mayence. By their acting immediately we shall secure the point which I mentioned in my note last night (and which still seems to me very important) of their occupying the Netherlands (if that is part of their plan) so soon as to put the march of the Austrians to that quarter out of the question. By the other plan of waiting for a reference hither and to Petersburg, we should, I fear, give such notice to Austria of the Prussian schemes as would induce them to quicken their march towards Mayence, both for the purpose of occupying the Netherlands as soon as possible themselves, and of making it necessary for the Emperor of Russia to march all the further force he can spare to supply their place on the side of Switzerland; and by this means making it impossible for him to fulfil his condition with Prussia, and so retarding, if not finally preventing the advance of the Prussian troops. Under all these circumstances I rather think the right instruction to your brother would be that, if the treaty is not already signed, he should, as soon as the Prussian Ministers declare themselves ready to sign it (but not till then) state to them confidentially our plan, and endeavour to insert an article substituting this co-operation for the proposed blockades. And if it should have been signed, that he should, immediately on receiving the instructions now sent, make a similar communication, and endeavour to sign a similar article as an additional and separate article to be made part of the convention. This is the result of the best consideration I have given the subject. But I should like so much better to talk with you upon it that I would come down to you to-morrow if I did not feel that, on the whole, so much seems to turn on the present decision, as to make it almost indispensable to have a Cabinet upon it. If you agree with me in thinking so (which I believe you will) it will probably suit you best to have it as early as between eleven and twelve to-morrow. You will probably find no difficulty in being in town by that time, and may easily return by dinner. To save time I send this without waiting for your answer to my note of last night. I have always forgot to say anything about Sir Charles Whitworth's Irish peerage, which I think he has very fully earned."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 18. Berlin.—“On the night that M. De Luc quitted Berlin I received from him a short note respecting a conversation which he had just had with Count Haugwiz, by which I was led to imagine that new and great difficulties had arisen in the Minister's last conference at Charlottenburg. I cannot however say that I perceive any other new difficulty except in relation to the number of men whom the King wishes us to subsidise, and they are now waiting at Berlin for the military opinion of the Duke of Brunswick upon this question. I am sick of his name, because I never hear it but that I know it is to be the prologue of some new imaginary danger, and the Duke seems to have conceived the extraordinary project of requiring for the military operations which he is to direct, a security which human arrangements cannot furnish; which, if furnished, might be acted upon by an infant as well as a general, and which in the present moment is more completely produced by the events of the campaign than the most sanguine hopes could have led any man to expect. With this difficulty on the one hand, on the other we to have cope with the natural indolence of the King's character, the reluctance which he has to active measures, partly from a diffidence of his own capacity to engage in them, and partly from his mind having been already prepossessed with the imaginary advantages of that negative system which has so long prevailed here. Great as this difficulty is it might have been overcome if there had been a real efficient minister here, with talents, influence, and energy of mind ; but none such is to be found here, and I am placed in the extraordinary situation of having obtained a complete concurrence in the opinions and wishes of the leading minister and the public, without being able to secure any of the advantages which ought to result from such a state of things. Count Haugwiz talks to me without reserve of the difficulties which he finds in combatting the King's prepossessions, but his difficulties offer at least to him an object of contention, whereas with me I have the mortification to find that, in having gained everything, I am not much more advanced than if I had gained nothing. The truth is that the frame of this Government was constructed for the strong hands of Frederick the Great, and was accordingly so arranged as to bring personally to him the effective control of all real business ; the march of this machine continues, but without system, alacrity, or decision, for the King is afraid of business which he does not understand, he is diffident of himself, and there is no minister who has enough of his confidence to work roundly and fairly for the advantage of his Government. At the end of this description you will expect to be told that there is no longer question of our treaty ; yet you must make no such conclusion ; the treaty will go on, and, if the idea which I suggest in my despatch be adopted here of taking the Russian 18,000 in part of the 45,000 offered to Berlin, I think it will probably succeed ; nor am I without some hope of our naval enterprise accelerating the co-operation of the King of Prussia ; but to obtain a positive engagement from him I know not how I can speak with any confidence, when I see that such an engagement could probably only be obtained by the decision of a military opinion, and by the energy of an active minister, and when I recollect that I am to look for these treasures at Brunswick and at Berlin. Yet I am content to look on as long as I can rely upon our pursuing those measures in England which make us in some degree independent of all that we have to complain of here.

"You will see that I have almost stated it as a matter of doubt whether we ought to give to Prussia the advantage of stepping in with a claim to a subsidy when we have actually done the business which was the chief object of it ; and if I could once satisfy myself that, after landing our Russians, Swedes, and English, we could secure Holland upon terms anything like as cheap as Prussian subsidy, I should be the first to deprecate the idea of gratifying them with one farthing ; but upon these questions one must not suffer even a just indignation to prevail over a solid interest, nor will political arrangements admit always of strict poetical justice being done by them. If the Duke of Brunswick, however, condescends to consider 60,000 men as able to take the field against 6,000 I shall have to proceed in my bargain with Count Haugwiz ; he dropped a word or two yesterday by which I should conceive that he meant to propose the subsidy to be extended beyond December, if the monthly payments were adopted ; I do not yet quite see his object, but I shall not think myself authorised to exceed the sum of one million for subsidy, and two hundred thousand pounds for mobilité, and I shall fight hard before he shall obtain the latter, though I see you have properly directed that it shall not absolutely go off upon that point. I should like, if it were possible, to average the frais de mobilité at so much per month; but it is evidently impossible to do so, because to a small average they will not consent, lest they should be left in the lurch in two or three months; and a large average would too much increase our expense if the treaty should be of any duration. In Lord Malmesbury's treaty the 62,400 men at

If from these 62,400 you deduct the 27,000 contingent, you find

If the same proportion be adopted now and applied to the same number, the 62,400 men would cost above 187,200*l.* per month, besides the frais de mobilité. This large scale is probably the reason of Count Haugwitz's preference to it upon the only occasion on which I could draw him into any detail upon the subject; as soon as I can discover his ideas I will explain them to you, but in the meantime, the principle by which I shall be governed will be not to incur a larger expense than that of a million subsidy by monthly payments between the first of August (if they then begin to march) and the 31st December, and I shall only avail myself in case of absolute necessity of the latitude given of 200,000*l.* frais de mobilité.

"I have made an advance to the Prince of Orange of 1,000*l.* for lesser expenses which he requires in the directions given by him, but he is very impatient to know what system can be adopted for raising a military force in Holland, and what arrangements Great Britain intends to furnish towards that object. I presume that the importance of some speedy arrangement upon this point will already have occurred to you, and it should seem to me that no time should be lost in preparing the means for enabling the Hereditary Prince to head a certain number of his own countrymen, and make the noyau of a Dutch army; this subject presses the more because, till your decisions are known upon it, no directions can be given to the many Dutch officers who now expect to receive them. I am impatient to hear what has been done in this insurrection on board the Dutch fleet, but I have as yet no particulars. I expect Lord Minto in a day or two from Brunswick, and General Stamford about the 23rd instant. I write to Mr. Hammond to desire him to tell me from what day I must draw on the extraordinaries for Mr. Fisher's allowance; you recollect that it was promised to be paid in that shape, as the fees of office would otherwise tell heavily on it.

“Our last accounts are that the Archduke was waiting the success of a march of General Haddick with 15,000 men to turn the position of Massena; a report prevailed on the 5th at Zurich that Moreau had been beat, but I suppose you have more authentic intelligence from Moreau.”

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 19.—“The enclosed is my brother’s last letter to me with an accurate translation of his report to the Hereditary Prince, which was originally written in Dutch. The memoire mentioned in both these papers, was a sort of instruction given by the Hereditary Prince to my brother before his departure; he was directed by it to endeavour to engage some old friends of two officers of the ancient navy who had taken service under the present government [Van Braam and Capellen] to remonstrate with them on their conduct, and to give to them assurances of suitable rewards if they would contribute towards bringing the fleet back to its duty. I cannot say that I think this report so satisfactory as I could have wished, nor Van Braam’s assurances so positive as I was led to believe from my brother’s first letter, which was sent by Mr. Grenville, and which your Lordship delivered to me the day I saw you, Mr. Pitt, and Lord Spencer in Cleveland Row. What I do not understand is the time when Van Braam’s project is to be executed. He will not effect a change on board the fleet as long as it remains within harbour, on account of the batteries at the Helder. But then he objects equally to sailing, and will use his utmost endeavours with the present Government to prevent the fleet from sailing. This seems to be contradictory. I shall be happy to know your opinion on this subject.”

Enclosure 1.

R. FAGEL to H. FAGEL.

1799, July 6. Schoenhausen.—“J’ai fort bien reçu votre lettre du 24 du mois passé, et pour y répondre tout de suite par le courier qui part aujourd’hui, et puis rectifier tout ce qui doit y avoir eu de louche dans un rapport fait à la hâte, au moment où je m’y attendois le moins, et échauffé d’un voyage de sept jours et sept nuits; quand à la chose même, je vous envoie la copie exacte du rapport que je mis par écrit le jour même de l’entrevue avec M.M. d’Enghuysen et Verheul, l’homme en question. La parole que je lui avois donnée de ne le point nommer, et le danger réel qu’il y a pour lui d’être connu, m’ont seuls engagé à cacher son nom. François, qui m’avoit accompagné d’Amsterdam chez Job May, auquel j’étois adressé, a été témoin du refus qu’a fait celui-ci de se charger de la commission dont il étoit question dans le mémoire que j’avois pour lui, fondé sur ce que cela le compromettroit auprès de ses anciens camarades, en ce que, disoit-il, ils me jetteront la pierre d’avoir terminé à leur désavantage et au profit de leurs ennemis une affaire qui, en elle-même, peut avoir des désagréments pour le Prince même. Vous avez donc bien jugé que François étoit instruit de ma commission ; ne nous ayant pas accompagné à Aanholt, ce n'est pas [de] moi qu'il sçait les détails ultérieurs.

“J'apprends par une lettre de lui que May les lui a donnés. Il y a donc sûr à parier qu'il remettra à Verheul l'ordre que vous lui avez envoyé : soit que cela ait tenu à la manière dont je me serai expliqué, il paroît qu'on n'a pas compris comme il faut le projet de Van Braam, quand au pilote et à l'officier à envoyer à l'amiral Anglois. Vous sentés fort bien qu'il lui est impossible de se mettre sans le plus imminent danger en communication directe avec lui, et que même on ne doit point l'essayer de votre coté. Van Braam m'a semblé désirer tout simplement que le commandant Anglois sçût à quoi s'en tenir quand il verra venir à lui les deux personnes désignées. Il n'a d'autre raison de vouloir d'empêcher la sortie de la flotte que la crainte et la presque certitude, où il est, que son plan ayant réussi, comme nous le désirons, n'occasionne de la part du parti révolutionnaire un mouvement qui culbuteroit le Gouvernement modéré d'aujourd'hui, et exposerait nombre de personnes au plus grand danger, et, surtout, extorquant le peu d'argent qu'il y a encore.”

Enclosure 2.

R. FAGEL to the HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE.

June 6. Coesfield.—“Conformément à mes instructions je devois communiquer à M.M. d'A. et d'Enghuisen le mémoire relatif à la flotte : d'après cela ce dernier m'en demanda une copie pour la faire voir à un ancien officier de la marine, des sentimens duquel il répondoit. Sachant que ce dernier étoit M. Verheul, ami de M. J. May, je crus ne pas devoir refuser cette demande. Cependant n'ayant point reçu de réponse satisfaisante de M. J. May, j'étois sorti du pays assez mécontent, lorsqu'à mon arrivée sur la frontière, M. d'Yvoy y reçut une lettre de M. d'Enghuisen qui me fit différer mon départ jusqu'au jeudi, 6 Juin. Ce jour-là M.M. d'E[nghuisen], Verheul, et d'Yvoy se rendirent à A [Anholt] et M. V[erheul] fit, pour autant que je m'en rappelle, le rapport suivant.

“Dès la première communication du mémoire du Prince Héréditaire, M. V[erheul] y avoit trouvé les mêmes difficultés que M. J. May avoit remarquées, relativement à la proposition à faire par un des officiers de l'ancienne marine. Il préféroit effectuer une révolution à bord des vaisseaux, sans qu'on fut dans le cas de la devoir aux officiers actuels, et afin de prévenir toute espèce d'engagement du Prince Héréditaire, ou de sa part, avec les dits officiers. Plein de zèle pour la bonne cause, M. Verheul étoit parti pour la Hollande peu de jours après la communication que M. d'E[nghuisen] lui avait faite, afin de s'aboucher avec Van Braam. Ce qui lui réussit complètement.

“Après que ces deux Messieurs se furent entretenus quelque temps sur la situation actuelle des affaires dans la République, et que Van Braam eut clairement donné à connoître combien sa position étoit facheuse, et combien il seroit charmé de contribuer à un changement dans l'état des choses, M. V[erheul] lui dit enfin, qu'il n'y avoit pour lui qu'un seul moyen de rétablir son honneur, et d'effacer la tache qu'il avoit contractée en se laissant employer par la république Batave. M. V[erheul] ayant assuré Van B[raam] des bonnes intentions qu'on avoit à son égard et à celui de M. de Cappellen, et lui ayant représenté, en même temps, qu'il pourroit rendre le service le plus important à sa malheureuse patrie, proposa la mesure suivante comme la seule chose qui restât à faire à ces Messieurs. Il faut, dit-il, effectuer une révolution à bord des vaisseaux, et cela de la manière suivante. Van B[raam] inviterât certain jour ses officiers à bord de son vaisseau, et après un repas cordial et gai, il se levera de table et rentrera tout d'un coup, une paire de pistolets à la main. Alors il leur donnera ordre du ton le plus sérieux de l'écouter sans donner aucun signe de mécontentement. Il déclarera ensuite que le moment est venu de se soumettre de nouveau, ainsi que le pays entier, au souverain légitime, et d'obéir aux ordres qu'il leur donneroit en son nom.

“Le premier qui ne voudroit par contracter cet engagement devoit être, tout de suite, arrêté, ou même tué. Pendant que ceci se passera dans la cabine, la même chose se fera dans le même temps parmi l'équipage, déjà préparé au moyen des bas-officiers (qui sont presque tous bons). On aura soin de poster d'abord un nombre convenable d'hommes auprès des pièces, on coupera la figure de la liberté hors du pavillon, et l'on criera Orange boven. Le Sieur Van Braam n'hésita pas un moment à donner sa parole d'honneur qu'il l'entendrait ce qu'on vient de dire, d'autant plus qu'il ne doutoit nullement que la chose ne réussit très-bien : il ajouta que la plus part de ses officiers (à l'exception de son premier officier) verroient avec plaisir un changement de choses dans la République.

“L'Amiral Story, dont le Capitaine de Capellen est l'officier de pavillon, n'occasioneroit guères d'obstacle dans ce projet, vu qu'il est regardé par les équipages comme un homme de peu de caractère. Van Braam a déclaré de plus qu'il seroit fort mauvais d'effectuer une révolution à bord de la flotte, tant qu'elle restoit en rade, vu que les trois batteries à boulets rouges qui ont été construites au Helder, pouvoient en tout temps empêcher les vaisseaux de sortir ! Aussi longtemps que cela dépendra de lui, il tâchera d'empêcher auprès du Gouvernement que la flotte ne sorte, mais si elle recevoit ordre de sortir et de mettre en mer, il promet sur sa parole d'honneur d'exécuter le plan et de se joindre aux Anglois. Il enverra alors un pilote avec un officier au commandant de la flotte Anglaise ; le tout à condition que les vaisseaux Hollandois soyent reçus en amis et alliés, et ne soyent pas obligés de baisser pavillon, ni d'éprouver aucun mauvais traitement ni menaces, vu qu'il aimeroit mieux se laisser couler à fond que de s'y soumettre.

“Il a voulu aussi que M. V[erheul] informât de tout ceci l'Amiral Kiusbergen, afin qu'il y ait d'abord quelqu'un qui puisse, dans la suite, donner des ordres, nommer des officiers, et prévenir tous les désordres qui pourroient aisément avoir lieu parmi des matelots, gens difficiles à tenir en respect, amateurs de nouveautés, et qu'il ne seroit pas aisé en pareil cas de calmer, à moins qu'il ne se trouvât sur le champ un chef qui eût leur confiance, et auquel ils fussent dans l'habitude d'obéir.

"Ceci a été fait et promis à mon insu, et j'en ai témoigné mon mécontentement n'ayant point d'ordres à ce sujet. M. Verheul dit qu'il n'avoit consulté que son zèle, et qu'il se flattoit, en conséquence, que le Prince Héréditaire ne trouveroit pas mauvais qu'il en eût agi ainsi, et qu'il eût fait la proposition ci-dessus à Van Br[aam]. Il pensoit n'avoir engagé par là le Prince Héréditaire avec personne d'autre que M.M. Van Br[aam] et Capellen, pour lesquels il savoit par moi et par le contenu du mémoire de Br[aam], que le Prince étoit favorablement disposé."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, July 19. Cleveland Row.—"I congratulate you most sincerely on the successful issue of your long and laborious negotiation, and I certainly agree with you in thinking that the hostility of Prussia must, whatever shape it assumes, be productive of great impression on the minds of people in France.

"But you will easily have collected from my intermediate despatches that the arrangement as it now stands is not without its difficulties, and I own myself at a great loss what solution to suggest for them.

"We are so ready with our expedition that there is hardly time to apprise Prussia of it before it sails, much less to concert with them any part of its political or military details. If we execute the thing and it succeeds, it will do so long before the possible march of a Russian army (a fourth army from that country) can bring it to the Rhine. The King of Prussia may find it less easy to summon the French to evacuate Holland at the very moment we are attacking it; and, at all events, there can be hardly any question of his marching his army into Holland. Certainly you would not recommend that for these considerations, or for any other, we should delay our attack for a single hour.

"Then comes the question, if Holland is rapidly recovered (say in the first or second month), what is it we are paying the Prussians to do for the remainder of the year? The article about not acting with us in any measures respecting the interior of France must, as I conceive, admit of some change in the form, because, as it now stands, it seems to imply some censure on our views, which yet I believe every rational being even in Prussia must allow to be those which afford the only prospect of peace for Europe. But whatever the form be, we understand by it that Prussia means to remain on the defensive and not co-operate in our attack on the territory of France itself, which yet affords the only means of trying the experiment of the Royal Standard. Can we then be paying Prussia for doing nothing, but possibly hanging on the operations of the Austrians ; and can we at the same moment solicit the gratuitous support of the latter in our plans, though calculated for their benefit.

“But a further question arises. Prussia is to act for the deliverance not only of Holland but also of the pais limitrophes. Now must we not before we begin to pay her army understand precisely what these pais limitrophes are ? Whether the Netherlands or the German provinces ? And above all what the Russian views are respecting the situation of those countries from which she drives the French, whether by force or by threats ? A consideration the more interesting from the very remarkable phrase in the sixth article, of security for the hereditary Princes of the Empire to the exclusion of all the ecclesiastical states. The whole of that sixth article is liable to another and a very serious objection. To agree by a public treaty that the three Courts will concert about a peace in Swisserland, Italy, and Germany, is to say, in other words, that England and Russia will join with the Court of Berlin to dictate a peace to Austria, and that at a moment when Austria, with all her faults, is however gaining victory upon victory over our enemies without our paying her for it, and when Prussia asks a million for sitting down armed to see Russia and England reconquer Holland and block Mentz.

“The greatest difficulty of all is that which relates to the Netherlands. After many variations in my opinion I have nearly brought myself to think that the best thing we could do would be to guaranty to Austria the repossession of the Netherlands on some such footing and arrangement as is detailed in the enclosed sketch, which I drew yesterday for Mulgrave’s perusal, and which will, I believe, form the basis of his instructions. Now is it not to be feared that this is the very result which the interposition of Prussia is intended to prevent ; and that while she pretends to be arming for the deliverance of Holland, which we shall deliver without her, and into which she professes not to intend to enter, the real object is, to be in sufficient force and sufficiently near to overrun those provinces at the first appearance of an Austrian cockade there.

“You see that in my despatch I have reserved all these points (for it is these to which I refer) for further discussion in Cabinet before I write officially upon them. But as yet the only solution that I see is in a fresh proposal to Berlin that as we are, as we trust, on the point of accomplishing by our own exertions (to which their indecision has driven us) the principal, and indeed the only distinct object which is proposed in the articles as drawn by Haugwitz, we remain equally desirous of establishing a system of concert and co-operation with Prussia, and are willing to contract with that Court the same pecuniary engagements as are there specified, provided we can see the means of making their force applicable to any other object of common interest.

“You will observe that the idea stated in the enclosed memorandum of allotting to Prussia the blockade of Mentz would perfectly coincide with their defensive plan, without the necessity of admitting into any treaty an article of such obnoxious import as their 5th article appears to us to be.

"I am grieved that at the very moment you had with so much labour and persevering ability brought these people to the point, the total change of our circumstances and situation should necessarily plunge you into a fresh sea of discussion, and that, in many parts of it, by no means of a pleasant kind. But you will, I am sure, even before this letter reaches you, have felt that it was unavoidable.

"I send you all these ideas as the best mode of putting you in possession of what occurs to me, but I have before mentioned that they are all subject to further Cabinet discussion, though I believe they are in general conformable to the opinions expressed to-day, and on which I was on the point of writing to you officially when Johnson arrived.

"I send you the account of the sailing of the combined fleets. I had rather it was otherwise, but so it is.

"Our militia enlisting goes on well, and will, I trust, give us from 15 to 20,000 men. If the enemy land in Ireland we shall want them.

"Might there not be some means, in order to save time, of agreeing that the monthly payments shall run for the first two months, subject to be then discontinued if Holland is then recovered, and if some other operation be not agreed upon by common consent." Copy.

INVASION OF THE DUTCH PROVINCES.

Official Minute by Lord Grenville.

1799, July.—"Mr. Gartshore to proceed first to Gothenbourg in the cutter—then either by land or sea to Stockholm—and finally to send the cutter to Riga. He will be the bearer of a despatch to Mr. Hailes apprizing him of the business, and of the King's intention to accept the 8,000 troops on the same terms as the Russians, to act with us or Russia; but not the ships of the line except fitted as transports. That in all events the ships for the transport of these 8,000 must be furnished in Sweden though at the King's expense. The treaty will probably be to be concluded at Petersburg, but Mr. Hailes is to give the fullest assurances to the effect above mentioned.

"Mr. G[artshore] will communicate to him more particularly the sentiments of the King's Government on the whole subject, and will assist in expediting all the details that may be connected with it. He will proceed with the result to Captain Popham, and will lend himself to such steps as circumstances may require in order to accelerate the whole.

"Mr. Hailes' instructions to be conformable to the above.

"Sir Charles Whitworth to be apprised of this—to be also told what steps are taken or taking about transports here—and about the Baltic ships, there.

"That on Stamford's arrival he will have learnt that the plans in agitation may lead to employ the troops in Groninguen. This will not be done without a co-operation here of at least — men on the coasts of the U[nited] P[rovinces].

"That steps will also be taken to send to Gothenbourg, or elsewhere, artillery, stores, and cavalry.

"He is to do his utmost to induce the Emperor to accede to these arrangements, without which the measure may fail of securing the deliverance of Holland.

"Transports for 3,600 actually under sailing; 6,000 will go in a week or ten days. And the remainder as fast as possible."

COUNT RAZOUMOUSKI, Russian Minister at Vienna, to the EMPEROR PAUL I.

1799, [July 20.] Vienna.—"L'événement de l'occupation de Naples, précédé déjà par la soumission de toutes les provinces à l'autorité royale, a fait penser au Baron de Thugut que le corps destiné par votre Majesté Impériale pour ce même objet sous les ordres du Général Rhebinder, pourrait être employé plus utilement à l'avantage de la cause commune, et aux intentions magnanimes de votre majesté. En me développant sur cet objet ses idées, Monsieur de Thugut a commencé par me dire qu'il ne prétendrait absolument autre chose que de soumettre ses pensées pour le bien commun à la sagesse de votre Majesté Impériale, me sollicitant de lui représenter en même temps que le dit corps restera dans sa position actuelle, prêt à se porter où votre Majesté Impériale jugera à propos de le prescrire, jusqu'à ce que nous recevions ses ordres définitifs à cet égard. Ce ministre présume que l'expédition par la Suisse vers les frontières de France au moyen des corps conjoints des généraux Korsakoff et Derfelden, ne serait point suffisante pour son important objet, et que l'addition de celui du Général Rhebinder en consoliderait puissamment l'effet. Si votre Majesté Impériale n'agréait point cette proposition, il lui semblerait qu'un autre emploi pourrait occuper utilement le général Rhebinder, et ce serait, comme je l'ai déjà indiqué précédemment, de le transporter à Malte. Après que cette île aurait été délivrée des Français, on y laisserait la garnison, qui fait partie de ce corps, et le surplus formant, à vue de pays, sept mille hommes, pourrait entreprendre un débarquement en Provence; on pourrait y joindre 10 à 12 mille Napolitains, ce qui formerait une armée très suffisante pour cette partie de la France, la plus disposée à se soulever contre le Gouvernement actuel.

"Le Comte de Cobenzl recevra aujourd'hui ordre de déclarer l'adhésion de l'Empereur son maître au vœu de votre Majesté Impériale de joindre le corps auxiliaire à celui du Lieutenant-Général Korsakoff, et les dispositions en seront communiquées au Maréchal Souvoroff d'abord après la prise de Mantoue. Il ne reste à cet égard qu'à régler l'approvisionnement de ce corps dans sa nouvelle destination. Il sera enjoint au Comte de Cobenzl de s'en entendre avec le Chevalier Whitworth. On espère ici que ce ministre ne fera point de difficulté d'engager, sa Cour à se charger de cet objet. Si cependant elle s'y refusait, Monsieur de Thugut propose dans ce cas de porter le dit corps à la droite du Général Korsakoff, ou pour mieux dire du Maréchal Souvoroff, et de le joindre à l'armée intermédiaire que agira sur le haut Rhin, et qui sera pourvue des restes des magasins Autrichiens qui ont été formés sur le Danube, et dans la Suabe, pour l'Archiduc Charles. Enfin, si aucune de ces deux mesures ne pouvait s'effectuer, je pense que cette Cour-ci ne se refuserait point à tenir compte aux Anglais de leurs fraix à raison de l'entretien qui a eu lieu de sa part jusqu'ici en faveur du dit corps auxiliaire.

“ J'ai parlé ci-dessus d'une armée intermédiaire. Pour rendre cette expression intelligible, je dois indiquer que, sous peu de jours, il sera décidé à l'égard de la nouvelle répartition des forces qu'on emploiera. Ce travail depuis longtemps en instance, et qu'on dit avoir été différé par la marche du Général Korsakoff, sera fixé de la manière suivante. L'Archiduc Charles évacuera la Suisse à mesure que les troupes de votre Majesté Impériale y entreront. Ce prince filera le long du Rhin pour occuper la partie inférieure de ce fleuve. Il couvrira par sa gauche Mayence, point essentiel par où l'ennemi peut se porter aisément sur l'Allemagne, et forcer les armées Autrichiennes à abandonner leurs opérations, pour défendre les pays héréditaires. Sa droite s'étendra jusques vers les Pays-bas, pour seconder de ce côté la nouvelle expédition que les efforts généreux de votre Majesté Impériale dirigent vers la Hollande. Sur le haut Rhin sera une armée intermédiaire, commandée par le Prince Ferdinand de Wurtemberg, qui pourra entreprendre les sièges de Huningue et de Brisac, pour aider celle de Suisse. Toutes ces dispositions feront l'objet d'un courier que le Baron de Thugut se propose d'expédier sous peu de jours au Comte de Cobenzl, afin qu'il soit à même d'en transmettre les détails au ministère de votre Majesté Impériale.

“ Votre majesté Impériale en faisant mention dans un des derniers rescrits dont elle m'a honoré, de la déclaration à publier par les alliés en commun, m'a ordonné de lui transmettre mes observations sur la manière dont le ministère Autrichien envisageait cet objet. Le Baron de Thugut s'en est expliqué d'autant plus librement que son opinion se trouvait parfaitement d'accord avec le langage qui m'était prescrit, ayant pour principe de différer cette mesure jusqu'à ce qu'une plus grande maturité de circonstances en indique le moment favorable. Ce moment serait celui où les armées, se trouvant sur toute l'étendue des frontières ennemies, manifesteraient aux habitants de la France les intentions bienveillantes de leurs souverains. On chercherait alors à se procurer des intelligences qui mettent à même de juger de la disposition des peuples. Ces dispositions diffèrent indubitablement d'une province à l'autre, et n'ont de conformité que dans le mécontentement contre le gouvernement actuel; celui-ci paraît évidemment adopter le système du terrorisme depuis le dernier changement opéré par le conseil législatif. Les Jacobins les plus outrés, investés aujourd'hui de l'autorité publique, saisiraient avec empressement l'occasion d'alarmer le peuple sur l'approche des troupes étrangères en leur imputant le dessein de démembrer la France et de la forcer à reconnaître un roi. Il paraîtrait donc utile, sous ce point de vue, de fixer la déclaration aux deux bases suivantes, promettre l'intégrité de la France dans ses anciennes limites ; et le rétablissement d'un gouvernement conforme à sa tranquillité intérieure, et, par conséquent, à un état de paix durable avec ses voisins. Cet engagement rassurerait les esprits, et on serait à même d'en modifier l'objet relatif à la forme du gouvernement d'après les notions qu'on acquerrait sur la majorité des vœux des habitants. On est ici d'opinion qu'il faut bien se garder d'être induit en erreur par les prétendues notions des émigrés à l'égard de l'intérieur ; on en a été grandement abusé pendant la dernière guerre, et on le serait de même aujourd'hui. Un officier, revenu il y a trois semaines seulement par l'échange, et qui a séjourné en Franche Comté et en Bourgogne, rapporte que l'esprit n'y est point aussi prononcé qu'on aurait en lieu de la croire en faveur de la royauté, et surtout pour la personne de Louis XVIII. Quant à l'époque où l'on pourrait espérer de mettre pied en France, si les armes des coalisés continuent comme jusqu'ici à être couronnées de succès, on ne pense point que cette entrée puisse s'effectuer avant le printemps. On juge que la saison sera déjà trop avancée lorsque les diverses armées seront rendues à leurs stations respectives, et on présume qu'il serait avantageux que cette entrée se fit à la fois sur l'étendue entière qu'occuperont les armées. Celle d'Italie le plus aisément par la vallée de Barcelonnette. Les Français ne se méprennent point sur la facilité qu'offre ce point ; déjà ils l'ont garni de six à sept mille hommes, et probablement ils y élèveront quelques ouvrages de défense. L'armée Russe réunie pourra, avant l'expiration de l'hiver, occuper la totalité de la Suisse pour se porter par le Franche Comté. L'armée intermédiaire mettra le siège devant les deux places ci-dessus mentionnées sur le haut Rhin, et s'ouvrira sa route de ce côté ; tandis que sur le bas Rhin l'Archiduc Charles se tiendra en mesure d'avancer en même temps. Telle est l'idée générale qu'on se forme ici de l'exécution de ce plan formidable, qui mettra fin glorieusement à la guerre la plus mémorable qui ait jamais été entreprise, et dont les succès, déterminés par la généreuse intervention de votre Majesté Impériale, seront éternisés d'âge en âge par les bénédictions et la reconnaissance de la postérité la plus reculée.

Endorsed by Lord Grenville, "Communicated by Count Woronzow, September, 1799."

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY to
LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 21. Jermyn Street.—"I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship, by Mr. Pitt's desire, the enclosed paper ; perhaps it is too long ; your Lordship may make what use you please of it, either in whole or in part."

Enclosure.

Note on the subject of an invasion of the Dutch Provinces.

1799, July 20.—"Various plans have been offered for an attack on the United Provinces, with the view to recover them from the oppression of France. It has been proposed to seize the island of Walcheren with a British force. This would have been a most important point, should any of the great armies now on foot have crossed the Rhine and the Meuse, and have penetrated into Brabant. The advantages are so obvious that they require no elucidation. Considered as unconnected with any co-operation, it could be of no use to Great Britain. It would have required a strong garrison, and a considerable naval force, to have protected it. And in autumn it is extremely unhealthy.

"Another plan offered has been to occupy the islands of Walcheren, Goree and Ameland, with a view to encourage and support an insurrection in Holland. It is apprehended that the support which the possession of these islands would have given would not have produced the intended effect ; being too superficial. The intention of landing fifteen thousand men in the province of Groningen probably would have produced very considerable consequences if put in execution. We may fairly suppose that such a force might have rescued from the hands of the French, not only Groningen, but Friesland, and part of Overysse. It is doubtful if Coevorden could have been taken during the short remains of the good season. It is probable that the operations of this body of troops must have been confined to the northern part of the United Provinces. The last proposition which has been made has been to concenter the whole force now assembling, and to attack Holland by the Meuse. The advantages resulting from this mode of attack, if fairly estimated, are very considerable.

"The possession of the island of Voorn will afford a safe port, and a free communication with Great Britain. An immediate passage into the province of Holland will be opened. And if the whole force should happily arrive before the middle of September it is hoped that a very considerable progress will be made in the reduction of the provinces of Holland and Utrecht before the month of November. At any rate, we shall be in such force as to form a corps of observation to act on the Waal and the Rhine, and to secure us from any attempt on the part of France. We should likewise be enabled to open a passage to any power on the Continent, who should decide to enter Holland, either on the side of Groningen or of Guelderland and of Overysse, by depriving Holland of her defence on that side of the lines of the Greb—which we should take in reverse—whilst at the same time we should be enabled to facilitate in a great degree the passage of the Yssel. The free navigation of the Rhine to Arnheim would afford a certain supply of provisions to the army, and would save the expense of a heavy transport by land.

“On a fair comparison of the respective advantages attending each plan it is apprehended that the attack by the Meuse is preferable under every point of view, whether the attempt is made by an army from this country, which is not expected to be supported by any of the Continental powers on the eastern frontiers of the Republic, or whether it is made with the expectation of such co-operation. Under this last idea, indeed, it is still more to be preferred to any of the others. For the assistance we should give to such an ally would be immediate, and even operate previously to their attack. We should open the way for them by acting in the rear of the enemy which opposed them.

“In the farther prosecution of the war, should it be found expedient to carry our operations into Brabant, Great Britain, from the augmentation of her force and her naval power, would be able in the beginning of the next campaign to seize Walcheren in the first instance, and to open the communication by the Scheld, and to reduce the remainder of the province of Zealand.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 21. Berlin.—“Courvoisier is arrived here early this morning from Petersburg. Sir Charles Whitworth’s letter to me contains no addition to his despatch except a stronger intimation of his hopes to bring the king of Sweden to more reasonable terms, and his intention to conclude if he can obtain them. I trust that the delay and demur upon the timber contract will vanish with the better assurances given concerning Malta, but I cannot help recommending a little more caution in the unbounded assurances which we give respecting that island (lest their demands should increase with our concessions) and a great deal more caution too in the manner in which we press our demand of timber, and the degree of necessity which we describe ourselves to be under of obtaining that article from Russia. I know that this necessity is very great, but I cannot think that it is either prudent or decorous that an English Minister should represent at Petersburg that it depends upon them ‘that the English fleet should not be stopped in all its enterprises, paralysed in the middle of all its great efforts, and rendered incapable of pursuing and annoying its naval enemies.' I hope Lord Spencer and you will not subscribe to this declaration at Petersburg; I think myself a pretty good Russian in politics, but I cannot consent to make the Emperor consider himself as the Man-Mountain who walks up and down the beach with the English fleet in the same string that held the fleet of Blefuscu. With respect to the Emperor's preference of the Prince de Condé, it evidently originates only in a desire of his keeping in his own pocket the active and efficient person who is to take the lead in France, but I conceive by Whitworth's letter that he will in the end give way.

"Lord Minto arrived here the night before last, and goes on to-morrow with the intention of only stopping two days at Dresden. He had no important conversation with the Duke of Brunswick, who was as usual full of words and civilities to him, but disclaimed having any knowledge of the King of Prussia's intentions political or military; yet at this very moment he had just sent a courier secretly to Haugwiz and to Yastrow, so secretly that I know it only by the chance of the man being seen to arrive and to go from hence the night before last; this courier was probably charged with the Duke's opinion as to the number of men to be subsidized, and as Panin arrived here yesterday, we shall probably see Haugwiz to-night, when I hope to hear something more positively from him. The same reluctance continues on the part of the King, but I believe it could be surmounted without difficulty, if there was not likewise in the minister and in the Duke of Brunswick a little paltry intriguing desire of not committing themselves ultimately till they have learnt more distinctly what is the course of our projected expedition; but I shall leave to Captain Popham and to General Herman to tell them that secret in Holland, and certainly shall give them no more precise knowledge of it at Berlin. They are meanwhile pressing through the Duke of Brunswick upon the H[ereditary] P[rince] of Orange for a more complete information of all that is intended with respect to the interior of the country, the proposed declaration, the intended alteration in the constitution there; but I have strongly recommended to him to be very sparing and cautious in all his communications both at Brunswick and at Charlottenburg, and to keep in his remembrance that at neither of those places is it fit that they should be confidentially trusted, until the King of Prussia will openly and manfully take the part which belongs to him. I am very glad to have to add that I think I can rely upon the discretion of the Prince in this respect. I know that he has been considered as entertaining originally some jealousy of English politics in Holland, and some attachment of preference to Prussia; but if this is not extremely changed, he is a much greater hypocrite than I take him to be, for his constant and uniform language to me is as strong and vehement a reprobation of Prussia as I could myself express, and as cordial professions of acknowledgment to England as I could desire or expect to hear from him. What is, besides this, perhaps a more decisive proof is the new marks which he has given of confidence in the Grand Pensionary, to whom as well as to the Greffier, he is much better inclined than I believe in England he is thought to be. I had yesterday a long conversation with him and with Mr. James Fagel upon the course which it would be the most proper for the Prince to take. I thought there would be too great a danger of sudden explosion in Holland if the Prince shewed himself on the frontiers before we can shew ourselves upon the coast; and yet it seemed very desirable to collect a few influencing persons nearer than Berlin to the frontiers, in order to be more immediately present, and to furnish more promptly to the arrangements which will be wanted; the Grand Pensioner, I thought, might join them to keep them a little in order, and the Prince might go and converse with them there without remaining long enough to produce too early and active irritation in the country. This measure has been adopted. M. Vanderspiegel is desired to come to Varel in the Duchy of Oldenburg, where he may probably be in about a fortnight; and the Prince may there confer with him and a few other leading persons, and may then hold himself in readiness to go wherever the ultimate course of the expedition shall make his presence the most useful.

"I am impatient for the arrival of General Stamford, who is expected in three or four days, because, although the plan was concluded without his ideas having been much previously discussed, I take for granted that he will have acquired or that he will himself furnish more detail as to the exact and precise plan which is to be carried into execution; and in truth without a pretty exact knowledge of the time, the place, the force, and the objects to which that force is to be applied, we shall find it difficult to be as useful to you from the land as you will reasonably think we might be. Meanwhile I hope you will not overlook the necessary object of furnishing some noyau of Dutch army, and of giving the means of putting the H[ereditary] Prince at the head of a regular force of his own countrymen; and when you recollect that all the well-disposed officers are now expecting his orders, you will agree that, if this measure be to any extent adopted, it ought to be brought forward without a moment's loss of time. I have desired him to prepare a short list of those officers whose local knowledge might make it desirable to employ them at any of the appointed attacks either of Ameland, Goree, or Walcheren; but though I mention Goree, I still hope that you will persevere in beginning with the first Russian division at Ameland, supported by the English attack upon Walcheren; and leave to the second Russian division whatever may, at the time of its arrival, be the most useful and advantageous destination of it. How far you will be able to secure the co-operation of the first Russian division for Ameland, and the English division for Walcheren, without losing time in bringing the Russian across to Yarmouth, I do not know; if their going directly from the Baltick to Ameland leaves too much uncertainty for ascertaining the co-operation of the Walcheren attack from England, to be sure the first division must then pass to Yarmouth; but if the direct passage could be safely made to Ameland, I think much time would be gained, and much more advantage had of surprise upon the enemy. I send you some interesting intelligence, the last which has been received."

Enclosure 1.

MÉMOIRE SUR L'ÉTAT ACTUEL DE LA HOLLANDE.

"Nil doute que tous les partis et tous les esprits se réunissent à détester l'empire que les Français se sont arrogés en Hollande. Leur conduite y a été hautaine et cupide ; ils n'ont ménagé ni les personnes, ni les usages, ni les préjugés. Tous sont persuadés que la France a voulu usurper, dominer, et piller. Le gouvernement n'a point dissimulé l'opinion qu'il avait des employés Français, puisqu'il leur a retiré, depuis près de deux ans, toute espèce de disposition de fonds, et qu'il a établi une Directoire de commissaires et d'employés pour surveiller et contrôler les commissaires et employés Français qui ne sont chargés que de présenter les états ; et ce sont les commissaires Hollandais qui, après avoir fait la vérification, donnent l'ordre de paiement. Un changement est donc universellement désiré, mais aucun des partis n'est d'accord sur la manière. Il y a dans la république Batave trois partis très distincts, les Aristocrates, les Stadhoudériens, et les Patriotes. Tous ont des intérêts différens, et plus ou moins d'influence dans le pays, et même dans les troupes. La religion influe aussi notablement sur les vues politiques des habitans, surtout parmi les Catholiques, qui dans le commencement se sont déclarés les plus zélés partisans de la révolution, et qui en eussent été les défenseurs obstinés, si la France n'eût point cherché à détruire cette antique religion de leurs pères. Les Catholiques jouissent paisiblement de l'exercice de leur culte, la révolution a même amélioré leur sort en avouant ce qui n'était que toléré, et en donnant aux membres de cette communion l'entrée aux places et aux charges que la constitution Hollandaise ne leur permettait point. Les Catholiques sont nombreux surtout parmi le peuple ; si la Hollande reprend son ancienne attitude, ils sont persuadés qu'ils perdront leurs droits. Si quelque proclamation ne les rassure point sur leur état à venir, et ne leur donne pas des espérances, on n'éprouvera d'eux aucun secours, et ils attendront impassiblement l'issue de cette lutte. Les patriotes et les aristocrates, quoique divisée d'opinion, se rapprochent cependant par la peur qu'ils ont de se voir écartés des charges et des emplois, qu'ils ne doutent pas qu'ils ne soient donnés de préférence aux Stadhoudériens. Il est, sans doute, difficile d'obvier à ces vûes personnelles, et de détruire les conséquences individuelles qu'elles peuvent avoir. Il est cependant nécessaire d'en être instruit pour tarifier avec exactitude le fonds que l'on peut faire sur l'intérieur du pays, et la manière d'y négotier. si l'on en a le projet. On dit, et répète sans cesse, que les troupes sont bien disposées ; cela est vrai jusqu'à un certain point, mais les officiers, les généraux veulent conserver leurs places, et les émigrés Hollandois, semblables aux émigrés Français, aliennent les esprits par leurs propos inconsiderés, par les prétentions qu'ils affichent, par le mépris qu'ils affectent pour ceux qui sont en place. On ne peut disconvenir que cette conduite ne soit au moins nuisible.

“ Il n'y a en Hollande que deux généraux qui ayent de l'influence et de la consideration parmi les troupes :—Daendels et Du Monceau. On ne croit aucun des deux accessibles du côté de l'argent. Tous deux tiennent à leur état, et ne pourraient être gagnés que par l'espérance de conserver leurs grades militaires. Il parait que, jusqu'à présent, l'opinion publique ne leur a point laissé cet espoir ; leurs caractères différent extremement ainsi que leurs talens. Daendels a de l'activité, de l'espèce d'intrigue nécessaire pour le soutenir dans la place qu'il occupe. Il ne faudrait pas juger de son intrépidité par la révolution qu'il a opérée le 22 Juin dernier ; il a été conduit par des circonstances impérieuses, qui ne lui ont point laissé de choix ; la maladresse, l'irrésolution, et l'impéritie des Directeurs lui ont rendu cette besoyne facile ; avec tout cela Daendels n'aurait rien effectué s'il n'avait point eu Joubert, dont le caractère hardi, entreprenant, on peut ajouter étourdi, ne l'avait poussé et encouragé.

“ Dumonceau a des talens militaires ; il a une franchise, une simplicité qui lui concilie l'amour et la confiance du soldat ; il est zélé républicain par conviction, et fidèle au parti qu'il a embrassé ; il n'est point jaloux de Daendels et a même pour lui de l'attachement et du dévouement. C'est lui qui commande dans les provinces de Groningue et de Frise et le pays de Drenthe, et il s'y est fait estimer. On doit ajouter qu'il est actif et laborieux, capable de n'omettre aucune des précautions nécessaires pour la sûreté du pays qui lui est confié. Les habitans de Groningue lui sont attachés, sont en plus grande partie révolutionnaires, et seconderaient les troupes en cas d'attaque ; il n'en est pas de même de la Frise, où, on assure, que l'esprit est excellent. Ce sont les deux seuls généraux Hollandois qui valent la peine qu'on s'occupe d'eux. La reste suivra le flot, ou la direction que les circonstances ameneront.

aucun individu n'a perdu ni ses préjugés ni ses prétentions. Un mélange de fédéralisme et de patriotisme se mêle dans tous les plans, dans toutes les idées, et rien n'est fixé ni arrêté dans les têtes. Un ouvrage sage et fait par un homme qui connoitrait bien les intérêts généraux de la Hollande, et les intérêts et usages particuliers des provinces, qui saurait les conseiller et proposer un plan qui ferait fléchir les abus, serait de la plus grande utilité, et fixerait des idées qui sont encore bien confuses.

“Pour se résumer, on dira que la Hollande désire une révolution, que tous les élémens sont préparés, mais c'est encore un cahos. Il faut savoir, trainer, diviser, rassurer, et si on n'a pas en main des forces suffisantes pour tout abaisser devant soi, si le concours de l'intérieur est nécessaire pour la succès du but qu'on se propose, il est tems de s'en occuper, et d'embrasser d'un seul coup d'œil les difficultés qu'on a à surmonter et à vaincre ; surtout qu'on se méfie des personnes qui n'envisagent qu'un seul aspect, et jugent de l'ensemble par l'objet qu'ils ont sous les yeux. Leurs intentions sont bonnes et pures, mais on s'égarrera si l'on y met une confiance entière, et on n'aura pas la véritable situation de ce qu'il est si important de connoître.”

Voici les détails donnés par l'homme dont on a parlé dans la dernière :—

“L'armée Batave est forte de plus de vingt mille hommes effectifs ; l'armée Française en Hollande est du même nombre, mais dans celle-cy, il n'y a pas plus d'un sixième d'anciens soldats, le reste sont des conscrits, parmi lesquels il y a une prodigieuse quantité de malades, particulièrement en Zelande, à Nimegue, et à Groningue.

“Le Général-en-chef Brune, cy-devant prote d'imprimerie de Marat, qui a volé beaucoup d'argent en Italie, qui a de la Hollande plus de 40 mille florins de revenu, tant pour son traitement que pour sa table, sans compter les petites exactions qu'il peut faire, et qui est trop diffamé pour ne point craindre le retour de l'ordre, fera les derniers efforts pour soutenir la révolution ; il est aimé du soldat, parce qu'il est libéral envers lui : il a la réputation d'être brave, mais on doute qu'il ait de grands talents. Le général Reubel, qui commande en second, est un imbécile, incapable, et méprisé du soldat.

déteste les Français, il ne peut dissimuler sa haine, et ferait tout pour les chasser de son pays. Ceux des affaires étrangères, de la justice, et des finances, aiment trop leurs places, leur pouvoir, leur traitement pour vouloir un Stadhouder, et il seroit impossible de les gagner. Celui de la guerre leur ressemble; la seule différence c'est qu'on pourroit le corrompre; le Ministre de la police est un Jacobin, et en même tems un des hommes les plus vils et les plus bornés qu'on ait jamais mis dans une administration. Les Directeurs sont des hommes assez honnêtes, ils ont été patriotes, reconnoissent aujourd'hui leur erreur, détestent les Français, sont incapables de faire le mal, mais trop foibles pour ne pas s'y prêter engémissant, dépourvus de toute espèce de talens et de caractère. Van Zoof est celui qui en auroit le plus, c'est en même tems le plus attaché au gouvernement actuel. Si les membres de ce gouvernement voyaient le parti jacobin prêt de l'emporter, ils préféreraient sans doute de voir arriver les étrangers, mais ils n'auroient ni assez de courage, ni assez de moyens pour les servir utilement.

"Il y a dans ce moment au Texel 8 vaisseaux de 74, 3 frégates et 2 bricks prêts à mettre à la voile; les commandants et les capitaines sont patriotes, mais la désertion règne parmi les matelots; beaucoup sont malades et tous sont découragés. L'apparition de quelques vaisseaux Anglois ont été cause de quelques simptoms de mutinerie parmi les matelots, que les officiers ont réprimés à l'instant, mais qui démontrent l'esprit et les dispositions des équipages. Les fortifications des places de guerre sont en très mauvais état, les garnisons très foibles; on vient cependant d'en renforcer quelques-unes. Les finances ne se soutiennent que par l'emprunt forcé; il n'y a point d'esprit public, les seuls mobiles sont le désir de conserver sa fortune, sa place, et la crainte du danger.

"Le gouvernement Français n'a pas retiré de ce pays la dixième partie des ressources pécuniaires qu'il auroit pu lui fournir, s'il avait été aussi habile qu'avidé. Les Hollandais ont eu l'adresse de se montrer toujours dans l'impuissance, de ne rien épargner pour gagner les agens, et les empêcher d'y regarder de trop près. La grande ressource du Directoire français est digne de ceux qui gouvernent, et donne la mesure de leur génie: ils n'ont su que changer perpétuellement les corps qu'ils envoient ici et de faire habiller par les Hollandais 60 à 80 mille homme au lieu de 20 mille. Les rescriptions Bataves perdent 79; les anciennes obligations à $2\frac{1}{2}$ sont toujours à 40, les nouvelles à 39, 36. Le Ministre de France, Lombard, vient d'être rappelé, mais a eu ordre d'attendre à la Haye l'arrivée de son successeur."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 21. Hollwood.—"It seems desirable, as soon as you have any respite from your foreign labours, that we should name a day for renewing and bringing to a point the discussion respecting the intended Order in Council for restraining the importation of slaves into our new acquisition.

"After Wednesday many of the Cabinet (and probably myself among the number) will be absent from London. I shall not be out of reach, nor absent in the whole more than a fortnight, but my brother will probably be absent on his command, and very likely the Chancellor gone for the summer. If therefore it will suit you to fix a Cabinet before the levée on Wednesday, it will save a great deal of delay; and we may take the same opportunity of settling the point (which in one view is closely connected with this) of what we are to restore to Holland.

"The Duke of Portland and my brother and I have already fixed to meet on some other Council business at twelve; but we can leave it at any time when the Cabinet is ready. If you have any leisure in the meantime pray turn in your mind the form as well as substance of the measure, and let me know your ideas upon it. I still hope, on reflection, you will not have been anxious to keep your brother as much in the dark as you intended yesterday."

*Memorandum of LORD GRENVILLE in regard to the intelligence conveyed in H. FAGEL'S letter of July 19, 1799.

1799, July 21.—"As we expect that by the beginning of the second week in August at latest our attack may be made, it seems very important that no time should be lost in apprising either Admiral Kingsbergen or Captain V[an] B[raam] of it, in order that measures may be concerted for a revolution on board the fleet as soon as the first account is received there of the English having landed in any part of the Republic. This may be done by a direct communication through Hamburg and Varel to the person who was entrusted with the last letter; and, as it would not be necessary to name the intended point of attack, there would be no danger even in case of treachery on the part of those officers, or of any accidental discovery, as the Government in Holland must be well aware that the period of attack cannot be very distant."

Memorandum of EARL SPENCER on the same subject.

1799, July 22. Admiralty.—"On the subject of Lord Grenville's mémoire, it strikes me that, even in the event of our effecting a landing, V[an] B[raam] would not attempt a revolution on board the fleet while in port, on account of the batteries; therefore unless he will consent to come out at that time, it would not be adviseable to make an éclat, which would only expose all the well-disposed people on board to discovery, and probably to destruction."

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, July 22. Dropmore.—"In the papers lately received from the interior of Holland the subject of arms is particularly mentioned, and, if our Ameland expedition takes place, it will be indispensably necessary that we should be able and ready to furnish a supply.

* See page 156.

"It seems also probable that we shall soon be called upon to send some supply of arms to the Vendée.

"Will you be so good as to take measures as to the first point, so that the expedition that goes to Ameland may have a supply with it, and may not have to send back to England for this very essential article."

Postscript. "I directed Taylor to send you yesterday the draft of a proclamation for Sir Ralph Abercrombie. It will, I think, be also necessary that something should be published in the name of the Prince of Orange, and if you think so, I will write to him about it.

"Will it not be necessary, in order to guard against accidents, to send orders to the Sound to bring the Russians from thence to Yarmouth?" Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 22. Berlin.—"The picture of shame and disgrace which I am obliged to send you in my public despatch, tells its own story too well to require much additional comment in a private letter. I had certainly rather have died on a dunghill than have undergone the humiliating scene which Haugwiz had yesterday to pass through in his evening conference; and, to do him justice, he did not appear in any degree insensible to the figure which he had to make upon this occasion. He was not, as I believe, altogether prepared for the very decisive tone in which he was answered, and I saw a considerable impression made upon him by the manner in which Count Panin gave him to understand that he was asking for what would assuredly be an audience of leave. With respect to myself, you will observe that I have not been behind-hand in expressing myself with equal decision as to the measure; but I have not thought it expedient upon many accounts to seem to threaten as immediate a departure. In the present moment more than ever it seemed to me that you would all of you wish me to remain here, and in doing so it is not for the first time that I put entirely aside every regard to my own personal feelings and wishes; but while your present expedition goes on, and it is now more necessary than ever, I know that you would be at a loss if I turned my back upon these shuffling politicians and indulged myself in shewing to them all the contempt which I feel for them.

"My first care has been to inform the H[ereditary] P[rince] of Orange of this new state of things, and to put him upon his guard against any overture of this nature which may be made to him. I have found in him the same good sense and good conduct which I have already so much esteemed in him; he said that he should naturally refer any such proposition entirely to the decision of the Stadtholder, and that perhaps he should take that occasion to desire to absent himself in order to go to England, so that by such permission he may put himself at liberty to act without being shackled by his Prussian uniform,

He is entirely agreed with me in believing that it is the Duke of Brunswick who is really the active person in this business, and that being afraid to commit his military reputation to a war with France, he has conceived this mode of settling Holland by Prussian influence without engaging in French hostility. What tends much to confirm this opinion is that every day brings new accounts of the French troops retiring from the country, and brings new instances of the Duke of Brunswick's political intrigues with several persons in the United Provinces whom the Prince thinks very little attached to the interests of the House of Orange; and I was glad to see the Prince express himself determined not to furnish to the Duke of Brunswick any means of information, or the assistance of any persons who can be useful to the enterprise of the allied Courts. With this prudent precaution and reasonable jealousy, I am likewise very glad to see that the Prince proposes to avoid all appearance of breaking in any degree with the King of Prussia, although he will give himself as entirely as it can be wished to the military operations of which I have given him the knowledge: it is chiefly against the Duke of Brunswick that I find him strongly indisposed, and in the present moment, I do not wish him to look more favourably towards that quarter. I have recommended to him great vigilance and attention in tracing all that the Duke of Brunswick is doing in Holland, and I am confident that it is with him that this rare project has taken root; if this be true the course will be that, whenever they have settled their shameful traffic at Paris, the Duke of Brunswick will obtain by his Dutch agents an application to the King of Prussia for assistance to march in and to settle the country, and this march will by them at Berlin be pressed on according to their intelligence respecting our expedition, which I conceive they wish to be beforehand with. Upon this speculation, however, I do not see any change which is to be made in the course that you are pursuing, although I see every motive for all possible diligence in the conduct of the expedition, and I almost grudge the loss of the time which is necessary for Popham to receive his orders to sail from the Sound. Meanwhile I have the pleasure to tell you that General Stamford is just returned, and I delight much in the assistance which he will be able to give at a moment so critical and so important.

"We now approach however so near to the moment where there may be a real want of all the Orangists that can be found, that I cannot help again suggesting to you the advantage there would be in the Greffier's arrival either at Varel, or Berlin, or where he pleases, provided he be more within reach. Upon the whole although I think the conduct of Prussia more dirty and reproachful than it is easy to find words to express, I do not know that the deliverance of Holland will be retarded or prevented by it. It is not our business to break openly with Prussia because they are disgracing themselves in the eyes of their own country and of all Europe; it is not our business to go to war with them because they will not go to war with France, nor yet because they try to bargain with Syéyès instead of beating him from the Rhine and the United Provinces; nor yet is it our business, if we meet the Prussians in Holland, to consider ourselves as fighting with them for the possession of it; but it is our business, our first and most important business, to endeavour to be beforehand with Prussia in the obtaining firm footing in Holland, and in availing ourselves for the House of Orange of all the pains, expense, and risk which belongs to the expedition that we have undertaken for the deliverance of the United Provinces.

“Panin is afraid of the Emperor’s growing quite furious at this low and pitiful Brunswick intrigue, but we must do what we can to keep him quiet, for a Russian war with Prussia would not mend our situation; for myself I cannot promise entirely to keep down all traces of the disgust which they have inspired me with, but I will not let that disgust stand in the way of any real service which can be done here. I am not here for my pleasure, and a little more or less dissatisfaction shall not prevent me from doing any good that may arise, though in the present moment nothing good or bad can be done; we rest upon the diligence of the expedition to run this race with Prussia.”

DUTCH AFFAIRS. Minute of Lord Grenville.

1799, July 23rd.—“Mr. F[agel] will write that V[an] B[raam] should be apprized that the P[rince] of O[range] is decidedly of opinion that he should lose no time in endeavouring to come out, and to join L[ord] D[uncan] in the manner already agreed upon.

“To write to Mr. J[ames] F[agel] that it is extremely desirable to prevent any premature explosion in the Eastern provinces till the force appears off the island of Ameland, which may be by the end of August at the latest. But that everything should be in readiness to break out then. And that Helvoet is the best point for the correspondence to be established.”

J. H[OOKHAM] FRERE to LORD MINTO.

1799, July 23. London.—“I have just received Lord Grenville’s directions for preparing a dispatch upon the subject of the capitulations which have hitherto been granted to the French, and which, upon the same view of the subject, you will, I am sure, join with us in considering as utterly nugatory and insufficient; that most pressing remonstrances have been made on the part of the French Royalists, who are apprehensive of being exposed to the same hard fate as in the first years of the war, when the garrisons of Mayence and Valenciennes were let loose upon the inhabitants of Brittany and La Vendée. It is now understood that the prisoners returning from Italy under capitulation are to be stationed in Brest, and other parts of the interior, for the purpose of keeping down those movements which are hourly expected to break out. It becomes therefore highly important that some system should be adopted which, however ineffectual it may prove in point of restraint upon an enemy so regardless of conventional obligation, may at least have the effect of giving confidence to the well-disposed party in France, by putting them upon the same footing with ourselves, and relieving them from those apprehensions which a severe experience has so strongly impressed upon their minds. Add to this the advantage to be derived from an oblique recognition of the King of France, strong enough to be understood by the well-affected party in France, without giving any hold to Opposition at home. Upon this view of the subject Mr. Wyndham has suggested (in a letter which is now before me) that the conditions of every future capitulation should be not to serve against the allies, nor against any party acting in the name of Louis XVIII. I have ventured therefore to anticipate the regular dispatch which you will probably receive by the next post, considering the extreme importance which at a moment like the present may attach to the events of two or three days; and in the confidence that any step which you may think it right to take in consequence of the unauthorised suggestions which I have taken the liberty to communicate, would be fully and entirely approved of at home.”

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, July 23. Dropmore.—“I have just received your despatch and letter of the 14th instant. I have not time to add anything to the voluminous despatch that I send you, and I trust you will find it sufficiently clear and precise to act upon. We much wish to get the Prussian declaration, and its effect on the present circumstances may be decisive, but we are afraid of being involved blindfold in the Prussian politics as to Cologne, and still more as to the Netherlands. I trust, however, that now that they have once made up their minds to act, you will not find much difficulty in putting the thing on some such footing as we propose.” Copy.

M. FAUCHE BOREL to MONSEIGNEUR [le COMPTE D'ARTOIS].

1799, July 24. Hamburgh.—“Si ma présence sur le Continent n'étoit pas nécessaire dans ce moment pour suivre à la négociation qui doit être connue de votre Seigneurie, je me serois rendu avec empressement auprès d'elle, pour avoir l'honneur de lui donner des détails infiniment intéressants à ce sujet. Mais devant me rendre en dilligence auprès du général Pichégrou et de Monsieur Wickham en Suisse, je me borne à vous faire parvenir le mémoire qui a été mis sous les yeux de s[a] M[ajesté] Impériale des Russes, et comme je ne puis le mettre en chiffre, je ne crois pas être imprudent que de le remettre à Monsieur le chevalier de Crauffurth, qui a bien voulu m'assurer qu'il seroit remis sûrement dans les mains de votre Seigneurie. J'ai dans le temps eu soins de toujours faire parvenir à Monsieur Wickham tout ce qui pouvoit l'intéresser dans cette affaire, que l'on aura, je pense, jugé de quelqu' importance pour que je me persuade qu'il aura été chargé d'y donner ses soins. C'est dans cette persuasion que je me rends en Suissé pour faire arriver le général Pichégru à un nouveau rendez-vous sur le Rhin. On doit se faire l'échange des lettres pattentes du Roi, contre la lettre de Paul, conformément à la copie que précédemment j'ai fais passer à Monsieur Wickham, et qui sera connue de votre Seigneurie, ainsi que le mémoire qui y étoit annexé. Les événemens du 16 ont empêché David de se rendre où le général et moi nous étions rendus, mais aujourd'hui D[avi]d nous mande de nous y rendre en toute hâte, que tout a repris confiance, et que le mouvement n'a rien changé aux dispositions de Paul, mais que nous devons être en mesure pour les fonds, comme il le sera pour tout ce qui a été promis par Paul. En conséquence, pour que tout soit bien entendu, je me suis déterminé à lui envoyer un de mes parents, homme de confiance, afin de pouvoir lui faire connoître plus sûrement notre marche, et convenir du jour où la rencontre se fera. J' ai crû, Monseigneur, qu' il étoit de mon devoir de vous faire parvenir dans cette circonstance intéressante l'état où en est cette négociation, qui je l'espère ne pourra avoir qu'une heureuse issue. J'ose espérer que votre Seigneurie daignera pour ma tranquillité me faire accuser reception de la présente, en me la faisant parvenir par le canal de Monsieur le chevalier de Crauffurth.

"Je ne dois point taire à votre Seigneurie que, pour suivre aux dépenses et aux fraix de voyages nombreux qui ont été nécessaires, j'y ai employé toutes mes ressources personnelles; et que je dois à Monsieur le Chevalier de Crauffurth une somme de 10,500f. dont j'ose prendre la liberté de solliciter le prompt remboursement. Au surplus, je justifierois dans le temps l'emploi de ce dont j'ai disposé, tant mes propres deniers que de la somme ci-dessus.

"Je reçois un petit aperçu sur les derniers événemens qui me parroit être bien fait; j'ose prendre la liberté de le joindre à la présente. Il peut intéresser dans ce moment. Il est d'un homme qui connoit bien la marche des affaires, qui le traitent à Paris, mais qui est entièrement étranger à l'objet de Paul."

Enclosure 1.

[1799, July.]—COPIE DU MÉMOIRE mis sous les yeux de SA MAJESTÉ IMPÉRIALE, et au quel elle a fait répondre officiellement par ses Ministres.

"La négociation entamée depuis plusieurs mois entre Barras et Sa Majesté le Roi de France, ayant été mise dans le plus grand détail sous les yeux de Sa Majesté Impériale et de ses ministres, ainsi que sous ceux du ministre de Sa Majesté Britannique, les démarches faites jusqu'à ce jour ayant été approuvées, le plan adopté, l'importance reconnue, il ne s'agit plus que de réunir tous les moyens qui doivent seconder les desseins du Directeur, et surtout en accélérer l'exécution.

Consent est le terme qu'il veut employer, puisqu'il déclare y avoir été provoqué par David Monnier, qui est l'agent de la monarchie auprès de lui et non celui de la république auprès du Roi.

Tout ceci est répondu dans les lettres patentes.

"Ce Directeur tout-puissant, le plus actif, le plus entreprenant des Cinq, consent à rétablir la monarchie. Il demande, pour y réussir, sûreté et indemnité, ce sont ses propres termes. Sûreté, c'est à dire, l'entier oubli de sa conduite révolutionnaire, l'engagement sacré du Roi d'annuler par son pouvoir souverain toutes recherches à cet égard. Indemnité, c'est à dire, une somme au moins équivalente à celle que pourrait lui valoir deux années qu'il doit probablement passer encore au Directoire, somme qu'il évalue à douze millions livres Tournaises, y compris les deux millions de livres qu'il doit distribuer entre les co-opérateurs. A ces demandes, qui regardent personnellement Barras, il faut joindre :

"1. Une somme nécessaire à subvenir aux fraix du mouvement à faire dans Paris.

"2. Un billet conditionnel pour servir d'appas et de frein tout à la fois à Bottot, le secrétaire de Barras.

"3. Une somme moins importante pour indemniser de ses fraix, et récompenser de ses premiers soins David Monnier, engagé dans ce moment avec Bottot et quelques sous-ordres qu'il a été important de gagner.

"Sa Majesté le Roi de France, en vertu de lettres patentes demandées par Barras lui-même, et accordées par elle, se charge de satisfaire aux deux premières conditions, indemnité et sûreté. Les douze millions y sont promis au Directeur, et Les lettres patentes ont été remises à Fauche Borel, qui les a données au Général Pichégru, chargé de faire l'échange au moment où David se rendra à un poste convenu.

Sa Majesté a envoyé, le 3 Juin, un courier à M. le Comte de Woronzow. Le ministre d'Angleterre en a fait autant, en répondant d'avance de l'assentiment du Gouvernement Britannique.

Il est urgent que l'on satisfasse à cette demande le plutôt possible. Cet article est le seul qui reste à faire.

Sa Majesté l'Empereur a fort approuvé cette disposition.

la parole royale et sacrée de Sa Majesté y est engagée de s'interposer entre lui et tout tribunal quelconque qui voudrait connaître de sa vie passée. Ce qui dépend donc de Sa Majesté Très Chrétienne sera exécuté. Les lettres patentes vont être dressées et scellées à Mittau; elles seront remises à M. de la Maison-Fort; il les portera sur les bords du Rhin à David Monnier; et ce dernier livrera en échange l'acceptation motivée, écrite toute entière de la main du Directeur.

“Le Directeur demande 1,500,000 Tournais à sa disposition au moment de l'échange de sa lettre contre les lettres patentes. Il est donc nécessaire que, le plutôt possible, un crédit de cette valeur se trouve soit à Hambourg, soit dans toute autre place de commerce, et soit placé de façon que les agents de Leurs Majestés qui se rendent à Essen le puissent transporter (en recevant la lettre de Barras) sur une maison de banque de Paris, et le mette à sa disposition. Tout ce qui à cet égard pourra abréger le temps est non seulement essentiel mais indispensable. Sa Majesté l'Empereur, ayant trouvé à propos qu'un billet conditionnel de cent mille écus soit remis à Bottot, secrétaire à Barras, afin de se l'assurer sans retour, il faudra joindre cette somme au crédit que l'on formera dans Paris, avec cette différence, cependant ; c'est que l'on ne pourra en disposer que le mouvement fait, et 24 heures après que l'étendard de la royauté sera levé dans Paris.

- Il existe des moyens pour cela qui ont déjà été indiqués par David Monnier ; moyens très communs, et que l'on pratique journellement dans un pays où tout se marchande, se vend, et ne s'obtient qu'aux moyens de pareils billets au porteur. L'agent qui remettra ce billet se charge de prendre toutes les précautions possibles à cet égard.

Sa Majesté a approuvé que cette somme soit remise à David.

David a un état dont il a suspendu les fonctions depuis qu'il s'occupe de cette négociation ; il y a huit mois qu'il s'en occupe sans relâche.

“La somme que réclame David Monnier, par ses lettres arrivées le 13 et 15 de ce mois de Mai à St. Pétersbourg, est d'environ onze cents louis. Elle est indispensable pour bien disposer les entours du Directeur ; il en a contracté l'obligation sous peine de n'être plus crû ni écouté. Si l'on veut bien y ajouter la juste indemnité à accorder à l'homme le plus habile, le plus intelligent, le plus dévoué, à celui qui a couru seule les plus grands dangers pour entamer la négociation avec Barras, qui a fait, au milieu de deux hivers, deux voyages très pénibles, et qui sort des portes du tombeau, venant d'avoir une maladie qu'il doit à tant de courses, et surtout à tant d'inquiétudes, on ne trouvera plus que juste de la porter à 1,500 ou 2,000 louis ; et on chargera de les lui payer celui qui fera l'échange des lettres patentes avec la lettre de Barras.

“Telles sont les sommes contre lesquelles deux grandes puissances peuvent jouer la paix de l'Europe, le bonheur du monde, et le sang et les subsides que peuvent coûter deux campagnes heureuses. Moins de deux millions pour ce qui regarde l'intérieur, et peut-être une somme pareille destinée non-seulement au voyage du Roi de France à l'armée, mais à payer, pendant les premiers jours seulement, l'armée royaliste destinée au général Pichégrou.

Accordé.

Il est essentiel que cette somme soit effectivement remise à David.

Tout ceci a été exécuté et remis à Fauche Borel.

Le Général Pichégro ainsi que Fauche Borel, qui sera de retour de Londres, se trouveront, s'il est possible, au rendez-vous d'Essen, où il est essentiel que le premier fasse passer à Barras le plan dont il s'occupe pour la suspension de tous les généraux suspects, et la réorganisation de l'armée.

Ceci a été exécuté par M. le Comte de Rostopschin, ministre de Sa Majesté Impériale.

“D'après les ordres de Sa Majesté Impériale, les ministres chargés de traiter avec M. de la Maison-fort voudront bien, le dispensant de toute autre formalité, lui expédier le plutôt possible un passeport pour non seulement partir de St. Pétersbourg, mais pour sortir de Russie soit par mer, soit par terre.

“Les précautions une fois prises pour la somme principale de 1,500,000f. destinée à Barras, pour celle de 300,000f. à payer conditionnellement à Bottot, le surplus sera délivré, soit en crédit, soit en argent comptant, à David Monnier.

“Aussitôt ces dispositions prises, M. de la Maison-fort partira pour Mittau. Il aura l'honneur de porter au Roi la lettre que Sa Majesté l'Empereur lui écrit, il confèrera avec Sa Majesté Très Chrétienne et ses ministres, il recevra les lettres patentes telles que Sa Majesté Impériale les approuve, ainsi que le ministre de Sa Majesté Britannique.

“Sa Majesté l'Empereur ayant daigné accorder quelque confiance à M. de la Maison-fort en lui déclarant qu'il attachait autant d'intérêt que d'importance à cette négociation, il aura l'honneur d'être mis en rapport directe avec Son Excellence M. le Comte de Woronzow, à Londres, et son Excellence M. le Général Korsacow. Les ministres de Sa Majesté Impériale voudront bien prendre les précautions nécessaires à cet égard.

“M. de la Maison-fort ne pouvant probablement (l'échange une fois fait) s'éloigner du théâtre des événements, il est à désirer que l'on veuille bien lui

Cela a été exécuté au nombre de trois.

Si M. Fauche Borel peut faire le voyage, ce sera lui qui probablement se chargera d'une commission qu'il mérite à tant de titres. Si sa santé ou d'autres cas qu'on ne peut prévoir lui empêchaient, M. de la Maisonfort prévient qu'il emploiera avec autant de confiance que de tranquillité M. Hermann, qui a été attaché au Roi, et que l'on a déjà chargé de missions délicates. Après lui M. de Coiffier, son ami. Il répond de l'un et de l'autre de ces deux messieurs comme de lui.

L'Empereur a déclaré à M. de la Maison-fort que s'il priait le Gouvernement Anglais de se charger des trois sommes pour Barras, Bottot, et David, il le chargeait de déclarer à Sa Majesté le Roi de France, qu'il se réservait de fournir à tout ce que serait nécessaire pour son voyage, et son entretien à l'armée, et aux premières sommes nécessaires au Général Pichégrou en rejoignant l'armée Française. Il a ajouté que, pour ce dernier objet, le Général Korsacow avait déjà ses ordres, et prendrait les sommes qu'il faudrait sur sa propre caisse.

remettre sur sa responsabilité un ou plusieurs passeports, s'il est possible, à la charge de n'en disposer que pour des renseignements importants, et des avertissements indispensables.

“Les ministres de Sa Majesté Impériale étant bien prévenus des difficultés qui naissent aux frontières, et du danger qui peut être attaché à un retard, sont priés d'y avoir égard.

“Sa Majesté l'Empereur ayant bien voulu dire à M. de la Maisonfort qu'elle regarderait l'échange des lettres patentes contre celle de Barras comme un gage suffisant, et un signe certain de l'existence du plan de restauration de la monarchie, on expédiera, du lieu même où cette lettre sera remise, un courrier qui apportera ce titre important.

“Le général Korsacow en sera en même temps instruit, ainsi que le Gouvernement Britannique. Aussitôt la communication faite à Sa Majesté Impériale, le Roi de France partira de Mittau sous le plus sévère incognito, et se rendra à l'armée du général Korsacow où il sera reconnu.

“Le général Pichégrou, ainsi qu'il en sera convenu plus particulièrement à Essen, se rendra soit à l'armée même du Général Korsacow, si elle est en présence de l'ennemi, soit, le plus près possible, de l'armée Française que Barras lui destinera; il y sera probablement avec quelques officiers sûrs, dont il aura fait choix, et une caisse militaire suffisante pour porter tout à coup l'abondance là où l'on aura eu le soin d'entretenir la disette.

“Les moyens de Barras étant à lui seule, on se contentera pour entretenir la confiance, et parler à la fois à Londres, à Pétersbourg, à l'armée, de signes publics et officiels, tels que celui qui a été lieu pour Badouville. David Monnier, le général Pichégru, Fauche Borel, et M. de la Maisonfort conviendront à cet égard d'une suite des signes dont le vrai sens sera d'avance communiqué. Tels sont les principaux événements à prévoir, les principales précautions à prendre. On y ajoutera à Essen la rédaction des premières proclamations du Directeur, proclamations qui contiendront, le plus possible, les intentions du Roi, et tout ce qu'il peut avouer, sans cependant élaguer encore tout ce qu'il sera sage de conserver, afin de ne pas effaroucher d'abord toute une nation qui, par une secousse inattendue, retournera avec autant d'étonnement que de joie à la seule constitution qui puisse lui assurer et son repos et son bonheur."

Enclosure 2.

"Les derniers événements, quoique très inopinés, ont dus paroître naturels à ceux qui suivent avec attention le cours de la Révolution; ils ont pu être prévus par ceux surtout qui connoissent le personnel des hommes qui étoient à la tête du Gouvernement.

"Les Conseils étoient opprimés depuis 15 mois, toujours menacés par Merlin et Rewbel d'être renvoyés, et plus directement menacés depuis quelques tems; c'est alors qu'ils ont du chercher au Directoire un appui dans les hommes qui étoient en opposition avec la majorité; leur résolution étoit unanime, le danger étoit commun.

"Barras conservoit trop d'anciens ressentiments contre cette majorité pour ne pas saisir la première occasion de la détruire. Qu'on se rapelle l'ostracisme des nobles contre lequel il fut en opposition avec Merlin; les mécontentemens de Bonaparte qu'il partagea contre Rewbel; l'affaire de la Caisse du compte courant, dans laquelle il se trouva impliqué pour la soustraction d'une somme de 1,800,000f.; son éloignement alors du Directoire, et les menaces qui lui firent ses collègues de le dénoncer, on aura du motifs suffisants pour expliquer pourquoi Barras s'est déterminé à seconder les intentions des Conseils.

"Siéyès, pour qui l'ambassade de Berlin fut presque une disgrâce, comme celle de Stockholm pour La Marque, ne devoit pas conserver beaucoup de bienveillance pour ceux qui l'avoient éloigné du Conseil où on le redoutoit, pour l'envoyer sur un point où il ne pouvait qu'être utile sans devenir trop dangereux.

“Voilà les causes réelles de cette dernière révolution ; les revers des armées, les dilapidations n'en ont été que les prétextes adroitement tirés des circonstances pour la colorer, et la populariser.

“Chaque parti co-opérant avoit son but particulier ; très-certainement Barras vouloit rester Directeur, et Directeur toujours puissant. Siéyès ne pouroit pas avoir d'autres idées. Se défaire d'hommes qui formoient contr'eux une majorité unie, voilà leur but unique.

“Dans les Conseils on étoit divisé sur le but. Les têtes ardentes, les Jacobins éfrénés, vouloient arriver à la révocation de la loi du 22 Floreal. Le renfort que ce parti en auroit reçu, lui auroit bientôt facilité les moyens de poursuivre d'autres projets, telles que la suspension de la constitution, du Directoire, le rétablissement de la terreur et de ses accessoires. Ce parti s'est à peine fait remarquer, comme pour vouloir sonder le terrain, mais ne jugeant pas le moment favorable pour mettre à découvert ses projets, il les a ajournés sans y renoncer.

“C'est dans ce parti qu'il y a le plus de tactique, d'obstination, et d'audace ; il dévorera les autres si on lui en donne le temps ; il finira par se dévorer lui-même.

“L'autorité du Directoire, déjà ébranlée, doit infailliblement succomber ; il est difficile qu'il n'y ait pas parmi ses membres quelque traître au profit du Jacobins, et en leur accordant l'unité d'intention, il est impossible qu'ils aient l'unité d'action contre un parti dont ils ne sont pas également ennemis. Ces cinq hommes sont tous étrangers, les-uns aux autres ; tout oppose à ce qu'il s'établisse entr'eux une harmonie parfaite, dans ce moment surtout où tant de passions agissent autour d'eux.

“ Roger Ducos étoit juge de paix dans son village ; il fut toujours nul, toujours insignifiant dans les crises où il s'est trouvé ; il étoit tout au plus propre à rester l'arbitre de quelques contestations domestiques, ou à venir remplir une place de figurant dans lieu des deux Conseils.

“ Gohier voudra singer Merlin, il le remplacera même à certain égard ; mais il y a encore loin de Gohier à un homme d'état, à un homme surtout tel qu'il le faudroit dans les circonstances pour lier un parti, et le diriger au profit du Gouvernement.

“ Barras, s'il étoit capable d'application, seroit celui de tous qui pourroit se conserver le plus d'influence. Ses profusions, ses rapports avec les militaires, l'accueil qu'il leur a toujours fait, une certaine tendance qu' a l'opinion publique vers lui, quelques traits de générosité, quelques services éclatans, lui donnent beaucoup de partisans. Il ne manque d'ailleurs ni de courage ni d'audace, et est bien là un homme d'exécution dans un parti, mais rien de plus. Les Jacobins lui élèveront un rival, un émule dans Moulin, et ses différences de caractères, d'habitudes, deviendront le principe des divisions qui doivent précipiter la ruine du Directoire.

“ Siéyès est encore plus déplacé là qu'un autre. S'il trouvoit dans le Directoire quatre aides bien fanatiques, bien dévoués, bien serviles, il feroit de la besogne, mais avec l'entourage qu'on lui a donné, il ne fera rien. Il est d'un caractère morose, presque insociable ; il est opiniâtre dans ses idées, incapable cependant de les défendre, pour les faire prévaloir, proposant son avis sans phrases et le retirant de même s'il n'est accueilli avec transport ; ne sachant jamais ce que c'est que de revenir à une opinion qui a échoué, dissimulant l'amour comme la haine. Le petit nombre qu'il entretient dans les Conseils le préconiseront vraiment et se feront ses échos. Ces petits moyens, bons pour mettre en jeu les passions dans une assemblée, ne réussiront jamais à enchaîner les Jacobins impatients d'arriver à leur but, ni à lui donner sur ses collègues l'influence dogmatique qu'il aime à exercer, et sans laquelle il n'est plus dans les affaires qu'un caustique hypocrite, et un censeur enveloppé de dissimulation.

“Les avantages qu’ils ont obtenus depuis quelques jours par cette double tactique sont incalculables. C’étoit pour eux un coup de parti de faire arriver au Corps Législatif le fameux Antonelle; ils ont réussi; voilà le général, le chef de leur armée; il n’étoit pas moins intéressant pour eux d’avoir dans l’administration centrale de Paris leur partisan, et encore sur ce point ils ont réussi au-delà leurs espérances. Raisson, Le Blanc, Pottier, tous trois impliqués dans le procès de Babœuf, tous trois partisans du bonheur commun de la république universelle d’Anakarsis Cloots, viennent d’être nommés administrateurs; et Chanlieu, le Chanlieu si terrible dans la Convention, arrêté par cette même Convention après la chute de Robespierre, est le commissaire près cette administration. Avec une telle organisation les Jacobins ont dans Paris leur armée toute prête, et pour cette fois l’autorité se trouve placée dans les mains de ceux qui doivent la dirriger, la commander. Ils ont arraché au Directoire le droit de faire arriver dans Paris des troupes, ainsi nul moyen de défense pour lui, tandis que ses ennemis ont contre lui la liberté de la presse, les sociétés populaires; ils ont contre lui ses propres divisions, la foiblesse de la majorité du Corps Législatif, et les revers des armées. Avec de tels moyens le succès est infaillible, le Directoire doit succomber, il est même douteux qu’il tente la résistance; il tombera par un dissolution volontaire pour ne pas tomber sous les coups des Jacobins.

“Le Directoire n’avoit qu’une seule ressource pour reprendre la supériorité; il a voulu la mettre à profit, et encore dans cette occasion il a échoué; c’est lorsqu’à la suite de la dissolution de la commission des onze, il a adressé aux Conseils un message sur la situation de la République; à ce message étoit annexé un mémoire rédigé par Threillard qu’on a lu en secret.

“Ce mémoire contenoit quelques vérités hardies sur la situation de la République; les détails les plus affligeants s’y trouvoient sans ménagemens, la chute de la République s'y trouvoit comme prophétisée si les Conseils ne se hâtoient de fournir au Directoire les moyens de toute espèce pour déjouer la Coalition. Les mesures de l'emprunt, la levée en masse y étoient formellement indiquées. C'étoit à la fois un tocsin d'alarme, et la perspective du plus belles espérances si on avoit la bonté de s'en rapporter aux mesures sages et énergiques qu'avoit déjà médité le Directoire, et pour le succès des quelles il avoit besoin de toute la confiance des Conseils.

“La majorité des conseils, toujours facile à s'allarmer, eut probablement tombé dans le piège, et peut-être eut-elle remis au Directoire régénéré le soin de sauver la patrie. C'étoit ce que désiroit le Directoire; il n'avoit pas voulu attacher son nom au mémoire, parcequ'en pareil cas, si la démarche échoue, on sacrifie le ministre qui s'est mis en avant. C'est à quoi il se verra peut-être obligé dans très peu de temps; à la manière dont on attaque de toutes parts le ministre complaisant, il est douteux qu'il puisse se soutenir. Le Directoire, par cet essai, s'est même un peu décoloré aux yeux des Conseils, et en se montrant artificieux pour dissimuler ses vues, il a donné la mesure de sa foiblesse.

“Tel est en ce moment l'état actuel des choses en France. Il faut une crise pour que le Directoire puisse dessiner sa véritable physionomie. Les symptômes de cette crise se multiplient, mais toutes les probabilités du succès sont contre le Directoire. S'il parvient à gagner du temps, ce sera au dépens de son autorité; mais alors il voguera dans une mer d'incertitudes, il marchera à sa chute, il sera un gouvernement foible et sans force, il descendra lentement dans l'abyme que creusent sous ses pas les Jacobins.

“Que deviendra le République au milieu de tout de crises? Cette question exigeroit trop de développement pour la traiter aujourd'hui.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 24. Harley Street.—“Permettez moi de vous faire ressouvenir sur l'expédition du courier à Monsieur Wickham. Vous avez vue ses justes inquiétudes, et de tous les bien-intentionnés de la Suisse qu'il est utile de rassurer. Vous avez de quoi le faire en lui envoyant ce que l'Empereur a écrit au Général Korssakoff, qui, d'ailleurs, serat prêt alors d'entrer dans ce pays-là. Je profiterois de cette occasion pour écrire à ce général de se concerter en tout avec M. Wickham, et d'avoir aussi confiance dans l'Avoyer Steiguer, car on n'aura pas manqué, sans doute, à son passage par les états de la maison d'Autriche d'apporter de gens pour lui donner des fausse notions sur le pays où il vat. Je vous prie aussi d'envoyer à Monsieur Wickham, par la même occasion, les papiers relatifs à la France qui m'ont été envoyé de Petersbourg, et dont vous avez pris copie pour cet efet. C'est aussi au General Korssakoff que ces affaires sont confié, et je lui écrirai qu'il ne fasse rien sans consulter votre digne ministre en Suisse. Au lieu de partir jeudi, je ne partirai que samedi. En attendant, je vous supplie de me faire savoir quand vous expédiez ce courier."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 24. London.—This very moment I received the enclosed letter from the Prince of Orange, which I think it material to communicate to you without loss of time. When you have made use of it, I shall be much obliged to you to let me have a copy of it, or to send back to me the original, as I have neither time nor assistance to procure one myself. If your Lordship would write to me something ostensible in answer to this communication I think it would be very useful.

Enclosure.

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE to H. FAGEL.

1799, July 24. Hampton Court.—Ayant réfléchi sur ce que vous m'avez communiqué hier, je crois de mon devoir de suggérer quelques considérations, que je soumets comme de raison au jugement éclairé du Gouvernement de ce pays, qui, voyant l'ensemble du tableau, peuvent mieux juger que moi qui ne vois que ce qui m'en est communiqué. Je dois observer que si la descente du corps commandé par le General Abercromby réussit, il sera, je crains, impossible d'empêcher une explosion de la part des amis de la bonne cause, et de prévenir que, dans les endroits où les François ne sont pas en force, les garnisons qui s'y trouvent ne soient désarmées, faites prisonniers, et peut-être massacrées. Si ceci pouvoit être soutenu tout de suite par une force majeure, ce mouvement pourroit servir la bonne cause; mais si ceci ne peut être soutenu d'abord, je crains que les François ne reviennent en force dans des endroits qui se seront déclarés, et qu'ils y mettront tout à feu et à sang, déclarant rebelles ceux qui s'insurgeront contre le gouvernement actuel et les François. Je désirerois beaucoup que ceci put être prévenu, mais je n'y verrois d'autre moyen que de différer le départ du corps commandé par le Général Abercrombie jusqu'à ce que les forces destinées à soutenir cette expédition, quant elle auroit réussi à s'emparer de la Brille et Hellevootsluys, pussent être prêtes à mettre à la voile d'ici au moment où ces places seroient prises. Peut-être y a-t-il des raisons majeures que obligent à faire partir plustot le corps commandé par le Général Abercrombie, et de ne pas retarder cette expédition; les ignorant, je ne puis pas dire à ce sujet, et ce que je dis n'est que dans la supposition que l'on peut retarder ce départ sans des inconvénients d'une importance majeure. Je dirai encore deux raisons que me font désirer que ce corps, que peut être considéré comme l'avant-garde du corps qui suivra, ne partit qu'à l'époque où, en supposant un heureux succès des sièges qu'il doit faire, et où les villes se rendroient en moins de huit jours, le corps d'armée put s'embarquer et partir avec le premier vent favorable après l'arrivée de la nouvelle de la prise de ces places ; l'une est que je crains que si, après la prise de la Brille et de Hellevoetsluis, il y ayt une stagnation d'opérations de quelque durée, les amis de la bonne cause se croiront abandonnés et sacrifiés, et que par là leur zèle sera refroidi, et même que cela pourroit en engager une partie à se joindre au parti du Gouvernement actuel et des François ; et l'autre, c'est que souvent dans l'arrière saison les garnisons de ces places sont sujettes aux mêmes maladies que les garnisons de la Zeelande, ou de la Flandre Hollandoise, et qu'il y a des années où ces maladies sont fort meurtrières, surtout pour des troupes qui ne sont point accoutumées à ce climat. La ville de la Brille a toujours été très zélée pour le bon parti. J'espère que l'on l'épargnera autant que possible, et s'il est faisable, qu'elle ne sera pas bombardée, ce que feroit la ruine d'un nombre d'habitans qui ont toujours montré leur zèle pour la bonne cause. Je recommande les habitans de cette ville à la clémence des vainqueurs quant la ville sera prise. En général les habitans du plat pays de l'isle de Voorne et les habitans de Hellevoetsluis ont été aussi bien-intentionnés. J'ai cru de mon devoir de vous suppléer ces remarques, et de vous prier d'en faire l'usage que vous croirez le plus convenable.

LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 24. Jermyn Street.—“I hope your lordship will excuse the delay in returning the enclosed, as well as the rough and imperfect observations on it.”

Enclosure.

Note on combined military operations against France.

“If the general principles on which the present war should be carried on, and terminated, were fixed, it would be less difficult to fix the plan of the operations of the different armies. As affairs now stand, the armies of Switzerland and of Italy have had the most brilliant and solid success. The accession of General Korsakow's corps seems to promise a continuance of it. A large extent of French frontier has been nearly laid open on her weakest side. The temptation to invade her, and to try the real disposition of the bulk of the inhabitants, is great. Should the Archduke withdraw from the present scene of action, the consequences on different points of view might be untoward ; at best, the capture of Mayence could not counterbalance the weakening of the Russians, and it may be suspected that the Austrians in Italy may choose to remain on the defensive. The whole weight of the campaign may thus fall on the Russians, only supported by the Swiss and the Wirtembergers who never were reckoned good soldiers. Austria certainly is in a situation to afford a corps of observation to watch Mayence, and to act between the left of the Archduke's army and the line of demarcation. Should the King of Prussia be induced to take an active part on Lower Rhine and the frontiers of Holland, the attention of the French would be so engaged that the corps of observation before Mayence might be augmented, and the siege of it formed. If the Archduke shall persist in separating from the Russians, and shall undertake the siege of Mayence, and if the King of Prussia shall remain neuter, France, in that event, will be enabled effectually to assist Holland, and the issue of the present campaign may become more doubtful."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, July 25. Dropmore.—"I cannot let this messenger go without a few lines to you, though my official correspondence which passes through Berlin will have exhausted all my speculations. I trust you will still get us the Berlin declaration notwithstanding the difficulties we have been obliged to interpose; and I am confirmed in this hope by a very long conversation which I underwent yesterday with De Luc. If he has rightly reported what Haugwitz has said to him, our plan would exactly coincide with that of Berlin. But I too well know that between Haugwitz's language and the actions of his Court the conformity is not always very exact.

"The Sun will tell you all I could about Lord Keith. It is an anxious interval now till we get some more certain account, but I trust it will be a short one, and I am full of good hope.

"You will see what I have written to Lord Minto. Our whole plan depends on making the Emperor of Russia insist resolutely on keeping the Archduke and his army in Alsace or Franche Comté. I hope I have said enough to Whitworth on this point, but still it may be useful that you should again urge it, as it may strike his imagination more when stated separately, than when involved in all the other things I have to say to him." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MINTO.

1799, July 26. Dropmore.—"My anxiety not to delay this messenger makes me confine this letter to a mere acknowledgment of your private letter of the 9th from Cuxhaven.

"The points you there mention shall be properly attended to, but the most important of them, that of the blockade of the ports, will I trust soon be superseded by the effect of our expedition. I shall wait with much impatience for your first account of Thugut's language, and of the impression which our preparations, and their obvious direction may make on his mind. The imperfect accounts from the fleet, which you will see in the papers, leave us in a state of much anxiety, but of no fear. Any considerable success would be invaluable just now." Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 27. Berlin.—“You will have seen by my public despatch that I have spoken my mind pretty plainly at our conference here. Count Panin is already returned to Carlsbad, and I trust that the humiliating step of a letter from the King of Prussia to the Emperor may prevent the only great evil which this little and disgraceful business could have produced; it has been intimated to me that a similar letter would be sent to me for the King, but I shall not take any step to obtain it, though I will not refuse myself to it if it be offered. Count Haugwiz yesterday dined alone with Baron Kinkel, and made to him a long narrative of this transaction, with every possible appearance of shame and regret. He maintains that he has been himself fair and open in all this business, and that he had not the least suspicion of the King's retracting until two days before Count Panin's arrival here; he says that it was a letter from Sandoz to the King which has produced this unworthy retraction; that when the King announced this, and Haugwiz found himself unable to change this decision, he had represented to the King the disgraceful situation in which he himself was placed, as with respect to Count Panin and to myself, by this change of measures, and the impossibility of his continuing in office under such circumstances; then comes a long description of the King's importunity to him to remain, and his own apprehension that, if he retired, the government would grow to be more French; then again a new fit of shame, and a pressing entreaty to the King to give him two months' leave of absence rather than condemn him to the wretched figure which he was to make here with his treaty and his conference; but then again repeated and earnest solicitations from his master, and his own zeal for la bonne cause prevailed over his personal feelings, and he was at last persuaded to make himself the martyr of his royal master's most unprincely hopes of escaping from the dangers of rupture with France by trusting to the fair promises of the Ambassador Sandoz and the Director Syéès. I have much reason to believe that, with some exaggeration, this is the real state of the business. In truth, Count Haugwiz could not flatter himself that, by the hopes which he gave, he could influence our measures, for I had frequently and frankly told him that I would never advise a moment's reliance in England upon Prussian expectations until the King of Prussia should be at war with France; he could not mean to gain time, for he would better have succeeded in that object by protracting a correspondence with Panin, than by sending hastily for him from Carlsbad, and bringing the matter thus immediately to issue. The truth is then pretty much what he has confessed to Kinkel; video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor.

“Since I wrote to you my last private letter, I am not quite so well satisfied with my remaining here as I then was; I mean upon public grounds, for I do not allow myself to think of any others ; but upon public grounds, I have great doubts both of the propriety and the advantage of my remaining here. The declared object of my mission here was for military concert with Prussia, and that is now completely at an end, nor is it easy for me to stay here without seeming to court more from Berlin than in the present circumstances I would even have the appearance of doing ; another objection to my staying is that it makes a stronger contrast between the conduct of Great Britain and Russia than it is prudent or advantageous to shew, particularly with the quick and captious disposition of the Emperor. Under these circumstances my advice to you would be to let me take a civil leave of the King of Prussia for the present, by declaring that the negotiation with Paris has made the object of my mission here no longer practicable or desirable. If this is approved of, I should still then have it in my power to give you what assistance I could in my communications with the Hereditary Prince of Orange, whose disposition to put confidence in me may perhaps, in the present moment, be an object of some little importance. If in England you so consider it, you would do well, I should apprehend, to give me immediate permission either to accompany the Prince, or to go wherever my presence could make me most useful to your present expedition and to the great objects which it is intended to promote ; but you will observe that, to make this arrangement of any use, it must be speedily done, and I must speedily hear of it. In that case if I can return to you before the winter by Helvoetsluys, I shall not grudge my absence from you, although I shall not upon any account wish to prolong it beyond the first struggle for Holland, if indeed there will be any struggle whatever.

“With respect to your difficulties concerning your future Minister at Berlin, I have already said all that I was obliged to say to you concerning it ; but I cannot help adding that I see so much reason for you to be satisfied with Mr. Garlike’s knowledge of the Court and of the Ministers here, he has so much good sense, prudence, and intelligence, that I cannot help very strongly recommending to you rather to avail yourself entirely of him, than to run the risk of any new appointment which may at such a critical time be inconvenient ; he now acts as chargé d’affaires, and therefore my going and his staying would make no new sensation ; his talents and temper and the estimation in which he is held will doubtless already have recommended him to you, and my own knowledge of him will well enable me to add all which my testimony can add upon his subject.

“The Prince of Orange, when I last saw him, was determined to go on the 29th to Lingen, near Emerick, and if your expedition holds good for the first days of August, he hopes very shortly to find himself again in his native country. I take for granted that you will understand what I have said respecting a more quick and universal effect from your first body of 10,000 men, to depend entirely upon the best information which we can obtain from the country; your military plan will doubtless not be much varied on this account, and Sir Ralph Abercrombie is too good a general to depend upon such uncertain grounds; I conclude, therefore, that he will not and ought not to expose his troops to any unnecessary risk upon this information. My chief object in it is, first, to shew you how entirely our friends despair of restraining the country till your second division arrives; and secondly, to prepare you for the possibility of complete success by your first division, in order to lead you to be ready to strengthen that one attack as soon as possible, if Abercrombie should find the situation of the country promising enough not to lock himself entirely up in Goree; but whatever he may ultimately think wise to do, I am sure you will agree with me in thinking that this new Prussian negotiation is a strong motive for not delaying one hour to make some landing upon the coast, and to be in arms in the United Provinces before the new treaty of amity which is sent to Paris shall have been ratified, and carried into execution. I grudge every moment that I am waiting for a messenger to send this letter, although I expressed the same opinion so strongly in my last that I need not fear that this reflection should escape you.

"I agree entirely in your interpretation of Thugut's views respecting the Netherlands. I share with you likewise in your judgment of the embarrassment which arises from them. If there could have been any doubt after Eden's despatch respecting the intention at Vienna of resuming there the sovereignty of the Low Countries, General Starray's proclamation of the 1st July puts it out of all doubt; and yet I am persuaded they renew their claim at Vienna more for the sake of bringing it to market, than from any real desire or intention of retaking it or of defending it when retaken. My objection to your project of nominal sovereignty is, that it will not secure to the Netherlands the certainty of Austrian protection; if the real sovereignty is not enough valued at Vienna to make this possession eligible to them, I do not see how a nominal sovereignty, with a rent-charge upon the country, could better engage their activity and interest in the defence of the country; besides which it seems to me very doubtful whether, with the nominal sovereignty vested in Austria, the authority of Holland or any other country could effectually be maintained there. I still incline to think that every reasonable plan should be pursued first to engage Austria to feel interested in heartily setting to work for the restoration of the Netherlands to the sovereignty of Austria; and that, not by abandoning the attack on France to retake Mayence, but by agreeing with Great Britain for complete military co-operation in the war, and accepting the guaranty of Great Britain for the Netherlands, as you have proposed. I own I have more difficulty in believing that Austria will do this thoroughly, than I have apprehension from Prussia if it were done; Prussia no doubt would like the scramble for the Netherlands better than their return to Austria, but still I do not teach myself to believe that they would even make a military demonstration upon that subject, still less do I think that they would step out of their neutrality for it; if however (as I much apprehend) Austria will give us no solid security for the protection of the Netherlands, but means to buy by their surrender a supposed right to strip the King of Sardinia or the Elector of Bavaria, or both, then I think you must resist that, by endeavouring to hold back from Austria until she shall consent to consolidate the Low Countries with Holland, an arrangement to which I have no doubt that you may obtain the guaranty of Prussia. As to the immediate object of Vienna to resume the siege of Mayence, I do heartily hope that you will stoutly refuse it; and I cannot help considering that measure as being completely within your reach, by keeping them (from the fear of losing their Russian co-operation in Switzerland) to the execution of the plan which they had accepted; the only fair plea which Austria can have for changing this plan into the siege of Mayence would be that the possession of Mayence is an object to all the states of the Empire who are summoned to pay their contingent, but it is time enough to talk of that when they have furnished their contingents, which certainly as yet they have not done.

“Meanwhile the Prince of Orange is impatient to know your arrangements for furnishing arms and assistance to the insurgents in Flanders, because he wishes to send some Dutch officers into Bois-le-Duc, and I do not like to enter into any new establishments there which may cross in upon the plan of organization which you announce to me. I hope again to see the Prince before his departure, for I cannot quite satisfy myself against the danger of his presence near the frontier contributing prematurely to hasten the explosion in the interior. I mean again to recommend to him to avoid fixing upon any one quarter, and I have earnestly pressed Mr. James Fagel, who accompanies him, to pay the greatest possible attention to guard against this evil, which is, in truth, the only one that can be of fatal prejudice to us. I enclose in this letter the sketch of a proclamation which Mr. Fagel and the Prince have prepared for any moment at which it may be useful; they both insist strongly upon the exception of the five individuals who are named; but they have agreed with me in the necessity of changing the form of that sentence, so as to make the exception bear only upon the names, and not rest upon a description which may give alarm to others.

“I enclose to you my letter to Sir Charles Whitworth, the proclamation of Staray to the Belges, and a short letter to me from Stamford upon your last plan of attack.” 2 Enclosures.

Enclosure 1.

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

1799, July 24. Berlin.—“On the 21st instant I received your letters by Courvoisier, and I forwarded them by him to London from hence on the same day. This morning I have received despatches for you and Captain Popham by Mason, and I am anxious not to lose any time in sending him on to you, which circumstance will prevent me from writing to you as much at length as I should otherwise have done respecting the strange turn which the negotiation here has very suddenly taken. Count Panin, however, will write very much in detail by his own courier, and I have to request very earnestly that you would not speak of the contents of this letter before that of Count Panin shall have reached Petersburg. We had for some time been advancing in our hopes of inducing Prussia to join the concert of measures so happily established between London and Petersburg; the conversation of the public as well as that of the Ministers had latterly very much favoured that expectation; in truth although I have known the extreme reluctance of the King to engage in hostile measures, and although you will have observed that I have never expressed any confidence in our prospects here, I had begun to have good hopes, for I had succeeded in obtaining that Count Haugwitz should draw up the sketch of a treaty for the co-operation of Prussia, in which the King engaged to act as soon as the Russian troops offered by the Emperor should have passed the limits of Franconia; this sketch was shewn to the King of Prussia and was approved by him; upon this fair prospect the Prussian Ministers invited Count Panin to return and to conclude the treaty, and I did not fail to state to him the new and promising expectations which had arisen. Count Panin would have had much less zeal and activity than you know in him if he had refused himself to these invitations, which included in them, as you see, everything short of absolute certainty; he came here and we assembled as we thought to discuss and to complete our treaty; you will easily imagine what was our surprise when, instead of the project of our treaty, we found ourselves informed by the Prussian Ministers that His Prussian Majesty had from new circumstances conceived good hopes of obtaining the evacuation of the United Provinces, and the re-establishment of the Stadtholder, without engaging in hostilities; that his intention therefore was to try to obtain this by negotiation with France before he concluded his engagement with the allied Courts for the deliverance of Holland. The immediate answer of Count Panin and of myself was to disclaim on the part of our Courts all share or interest in a measure so weak and so disgraceful; and, in protesting against this measure, we expressed in the strongest terms our sense of the dissatisfaction and astonishment which this intelligence would produce at London and at Petersburg. In addition to this Count Panin leaves Berlin to-morrow, and has asked an audience of the King before his journey, under the impression that H[is] I[mperial] M[ajesty] may perhaps not allow him to return to Berlin. If I had not some apprehensions of the bad consequences which may arise from the disgust which this will produce at Petersburg, I should see in it nothing but the shame and disgrace which attaches upon the wretched politics of this feeble and irresolute Government; we have nothing to fear from this paltry and timid policy except the sudden resentment which it may produce in the mind of the Emperor; let Prussia do what it may, the deliverance of Holland will be effected by the vigour and activity of H[is] M[ajesty's] and H[is] I[mperial] M[ajesty's] councils. We have never relied upon any advantage in the assistance of Prussia, we shall have nothing to fear either from its neutrality or from its negotiation, we have but to go forward and we shall scarcely perceive the existence of Prussia in this great scene of splendid and active exertion; and I have the satisfaction of having uniformly assured Count Haugwiz that, in our best and worst hopes of Prussia, we continued steadily to pursue the same course for ourselves, whatever might be the ultimate determination of Berlin. This view of the subject will, I hope and trust, be the only one which will prevail at Petersburg; the proper and just reproach to Prussia will be sufficiently made in the success of the combined armies in Holland, while the Ministers here are still hesitating in the timid and fluctuating fancies of the King and of Köcheritz. The only real mischief which could arise would be that of a very serious rupture between Russia and Prussia, which would indeed be to play the game of the enemy and to give them the only possible hope of safety which now seems left to them. I have said rather more on this subject than my haste should have allowed me, because I know the importance of it, and because I know, too, how much assistance your influence can give in shewing this matter in the light in which, you will agree with me that, it ought wisely to be considered. It is the shame and disgrace of Prussia, but let it not be the loss of the allies, and, in new wars, the triumph of the French Directory." Copy.

Enclosure 2.

GENERAL DE STAMFORD to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, July 26. Berlin.—“Plus je médite le plan d'attaque sur la Hollande qui a été arrêté en dernier lieu à Londres, et plus je trouve qu'il écarte une multitude d'inconvéniens inséparables de tout autre projet qu'on voudroit lui substituer. Ce n'est pas qu'il soit tout à fait exempt de difficultés, mais le point de perfection se trouve là où elles sont en moindre quantité. Voici celles que j'y trouve.

“Je suis de l'opinion de ceux qui se persuadent que, dès qu'un corps de troupes étrangères qu'on saura destiné à délivrer le país de ses oppresseurs, se sera montré sur un point quelconque de la Hollande, l'insurrection de la part des habitans, pour accélérer cette délivrance, ne pourra plus être retenue, et qu'elle éclatera, si ce n'est dans toutes les provinces à la fois, du moins dans les contrées les plus voisines de ce point. Voilà donc un événement auquel on devra être préparé; je dirai même, que j'augurerois mal des dispositions tant vantées des habitans, s'il n'avoit pas lieu. Un autre point auquel nous devons également nous attendre, c'est que les insurgés du bon parti éprouveront indubitablement de la part de ceux du mauvais, tant dans les bourgeoisies des villes que dans l'armée, une résistance et une opposition dont on ne sauroit d'avance calculer les effets. Il en naîtra que partout où la lutte ne sera pas en faveur des premiers, ceux-ci demanderont des secours de la part des troupes du débarquement, qu'il sera peut-être aussi dangereux de leur refuser que de leur accorder, puisque par un refus on courra risque de décourager le bon parti, et que, d'un autre côté, le général commandant le débarquement, s'il n'a pas d'abord assez de troupes pour s'avancer dans le païs, trouvera risquant de s'affaiblir par des détachemens, et jugera convenable de se tenir concentré avec ses forces, en attendant qu'il lui en arrive de nouvelles. Il résulte de là que si les machinations de la Cour de Berlin, qui ne sont guères douteuses, exigent qu'on procède aux descentes projetées avec le plus de célérité et de promptitude possibles, il est tout aussi indispensable qu'on laisse écouler le moins de tems possible entre le premier débarquement et les subséquens. Il est un autre point encore que je regarderois, s'il pouvoit être obtenu, comme pouvant essentiellement contribuer au succès de toute l'expédition; c'est celui où la descente dans l'île d'Ameland et la descente principale pourroient être effectuées en même tems, ou du moins, à des époques fort rapprochées l'une de l'autre. Il naitroit de là, à ce que je m'imagine, une diversion très embarrassante pour l'ennemi, qui ne sauroit où porter la majeure partie de ses forces; la descente dans l'île d'Ameland mettroit probablement les armes à la main à tout ce qui est du bon parti dans la Frise et la Groningue; et si l'on peut soupçonner que les Prussiens méditent de jeter des troupes dans ces deux provinces, et dans l'Overyssel et la Gueldre, ce projet tomberoit tout aussitôt, puisque ce seroit entrer en guerre contre les puissances alliées que de vouloir porter des troupes dans un païs où elles seroient entrées les armes à la main. Pardonnez moi ces réflexions, qui, si elles portent sur des objets auxquels il n'est plus tems de rien changer, vous prouveront du moins qu'ils font constamment le sujet de mes méditations. Au reste, plus je considère l'état actuel des choses, et plus je me sens fondé à espérer qu'avec l'assistance du ciel nous triompherons des difficultés qui nous restent à vaincre. Toute entreprise a les siennes; accorder au hazard le moins que l'on peut, mais ne pas tout lui refuser, c'est, je crois, tout ce que la prévoyance humaine peut faire." Copy.

Secret.

1799, July 27. Dropmore.—“ I think it right to send the enclosed for your consideration, and Pitt's, before I answer it, though its arguments have not made the slightest impression on me. If they are good for anything it is only to hasten the sailing of our reinforcements as soon as possible after the first division is landed. And on that point I believe you are both as anxious as I am.

“ The more I think over the subject of the Netherlands the more I am persuaded that the only right suggestion is that which the King made to me on Wednesday, that we should make our force sufficient to be quite certain (at least as much so as the thing will admit) of occupying that whole country ourselves before the winter. It is only in that way that we can put ourselves in a situation to talk to Vienna in the only style which ever succeeds in making them hear reason.

"If we ultimately decide upon giving those provinces back to Austria, it should, I think, only be in consideration of co-operation afforded (not promised) for the attack on France. For, if instead of this we give them into the hands of Austria during the war, suppose at the close of this campaign, we have then put the whole game out of our own hands, and we have no other tie on the Austrians to make them persevere in the war but honour and gratitude, neither of which they rate very high, or the general interests of Europe, which they consider still less.

"Giving them back to Austria we have still very material interests to stipulate for. We were always looked to as the guarantees of the constitution of those provinces, which we put into the hands of the German branch of the house of Austria under an express engagement that those constitutions should be secured to them.

"We were also guarantees of the barrier treaty, by which the defence of the Dutch frontier was protected; the strong places of the Netherlands being to be maintained in a state of defence, and the garrisons being to be composed wholly or in part of Dutch troops.

"All these stipulations the Emperor Joseph, the first Jacobin of his time, violated in the most insolent manner during the American war, and during the state of weakness that followed here after the peace.

"We may forget the insult, but the interests remain the same, and must be provided for either by a renewal of the same engagements, or by some other mode, before we can consider Holland as secure. I collect from De Luc's conversation that Prussia has some idea of extending the Dutch frontier on the side of the Netherlands, without wishing to decide just now on the final settlement of the rest of that country. And this proposal does, for the reasons I have already stated to you, seem to me to be highly advantageous to us.

"I mention all these ideas to you thus early because you see that, if they are just, they lead: (1) to as great an augmentation as can be made of our present force destined to act on that side; and (2) to the certainty that we shall not find ourselves at liberty, without great reinforcements, to detach in the spring any considerable force to the Somme or the Seine.

"Be so good as to return me the Prince's letter. Let me know what you have determined about Lisbon, that I may write accordingly. My opinion remains the same. In the present circumstances I would not leave them one man, British or foreign." Copy.

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 28. Duke Street, Westminster.—"The Prince has sent me to-night his proclamation signed and sealed. I lose no time in sending you a literal translation of the original, which is in Dutch. I have hardly had time to look it over, and I am afraid it is very bad English. However, that is of little importance, if it only conveys to you the sense of the original. I have endeavoured to give to this a Dutch turn, and to employ that sort of stile which I know well will best suit the generality of the people in Holland. The Prince has adopted my ideas, and made but few alterations in the draft I sent him. I am aware that this paper in the English dress I have given it makes but a very indifferent appearance, but the translation is exact; the ideas are faithfully expressed; and as to the original it is that sort of stile to which the people are accustomed, and which will make most impression on their minds.

"The Prince very much wishes to send a copy of this address and of Sir Ralph Abercromby's proclamation to the Hereditary Prince; and it is certainly absolutely necessary that this should be done as soon as possible, in order to prevent that any publication or proclamation should issue from that quarter not entirely conformable to these two. Your Lordship will therefore perhaps think it right to send a messenger to Berlin the day after to-morrow; and if you should approve of this idea, I beg you would have the goodness to let me know it as soon as possible, that I may inform the Prince and Princess, who will take that opportunity to write to their son. The Prince very much objects to give to Count Rhoon the powers he asks for. I have not time to-night to enter farther into this subject. The first time I have the pleasure of seeing your Lordship I hope to be able to do so. If you approve of the Prince's address I shall immediately prepare a fair copy of it, that it may be in readiness to be printed whenever you shall think proper. If the English is to be printed also, it will be absolutely necessary that my translation which was only made for you, should be revised."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 29. London,—I send you an extract of a letter of the Prince of Orange on the subject of M. de Rhoon's letter, and also an extract of a letter from Emerick.

[Enclosure.]

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE to H. FAGEL.

1799, July 27. Hampton Court.—Quant à la lettre de M. de Rhoon je dois dire que je ne puis donner un acte tel que celui qu'il demande. Les circonstances de ce temps-ci et celles de celui où nous étions en 1794, ne se ressemblent en rien. M. de Rhoon n'a jamais été commandant-général de toutes les bourgeoisies armées, bien moins de troupes de l'état; mais il étoit question de lever dans ces temps-là un corps sous le nom de Landzaaten, qui devoient être une espèce de corps de fencibles, qui n'étoient engagés à servir que dans l'intérieur de la République, et ne pouvoient marcher hors du territoire sans leur consentement volontaire; ce corps devoit être payé par des souscriptions volontaires, ne regardoit qu'unique-ment la province d'Hollande, et ne devoit subsister que peu de mois. M. de Rhoon n'a pas été seul chargé de cette besogne, mais j'avois nommé une commission de quelques membres de la Régence et Pensionnaires de villes, avec le général-major Charles Bentinck adjutant de mon fils, pour faire les arrangemens nécessaires pour ce corps; et M. de Rhoon étoit, en effet, le président de cette commission, et n'étant pas bien avec quelques-uns de ces messieurs, je crois qu'il a cessé de se mêler de ce corps quelque temps avant son départ. Ce corps a toujours été fort foible. Je crois que, dans les derniers huit ou quinze jours avant mon départ, on a voulu lever en masse les habitans de la province d'Hollande, et qu'alors M. de Rhoon a eu un acte pareil. Mais il n'a jamais regardé que la seule province d'Hollande, et n'a jamais concerné les autres provinces, et n'a jamais eu aucun effet. Je crois qu'un pareil acte pourroit croiser les mesures que mon fils pourroit prendre, et qu'il ne seroit pas prudent de le donner, et je me propose de l'écrire à M. de Rhoon et de lui dire mes raisons, et je suis assuré qu'il est trop raisonnable pour insister de l'obtenir, puisqu'au lieu de faire du bien il ne pourroit faire que du mal. Le corps qu'il s'agissoit de lever sous la direction de M. de Rhoon étoit indépendant de l'armée et des bourgeoisies, et seulement des volontaires; et, à présent, pareille autorisation seroit le commandement général de la force armée, et, en effet, le faire Lieutenant Capitaine-Général ou Commandant en chef de la force armée. Je crois que l'on ne peut me conseiller de créer un pareil poste, surtout sans stipuler que ce n'est qu'une autorisation provisionnelle et révocable.

Du 28.—Je crois que vous jugerez comme moi qu'il est impossible que je donne à M. de Rhoon pareil acte, et que l'on ne pourroit jamais aller plus loin que de lui donner un acte provisionnel pour organiser des corps de citoyens qui voudroient offrir leurs services dans la province d'Hollande, bornant uniquement son autorisation à cette province. Mais je crois que le mieux seroit de ne pas lui donner un pareil acte, et de lui faire une réponse polie mais déclinatoire.

Enclosure 2.

M. d'IVOY to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, July 17. Emmerick.—“Je suis enfin parvenu à établir une correspondance directe avec le chef des insurgés dans la Campine, ci-joint se trouve son mémoire. On s'occupera de l'organisation d'un comité semblable à celui dont il est question dans le mémoire pour le Luxembourg.

“On désirerait qu'un officier Hollandois peut être nommé, afin de concerter tous les plans et se mettre en relation avec les chefs; en conséquence, nous sommes convenus qu'on admettroit à cet effet que ceux qui seroient munis d'un certificat tel qu'il a été concerté entre nous. Il paroît que le plan sera généralement goûté des insurgés, et il importeroit, en conséquence, d'en donner connoissance aux chefs, toutefois avec des ménagemens. Relativement au plan d'union en question, il importeroit de connaître quelles sont les projets au sujet du pays de Liège, surtout ce qui a rapport au conflit de juridiction avec Maestricht qu'il est essentiel de conserver. Il est de la dernière nécessité qu'on s'attache les jeunes Belges sortis du pays, qu'on les assiste, qu'on les sonde relativement à la maison d'Autriche afin de pouvoir les employer lorsque la révolution sera mure." Extrait.

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 29. Berlin.—“As Bassett will still equally arrive in time for Thursday's packet, if he leaves this place before this evening, I do not grudge the delay of a few hours which will make no difference in his arrival at Yarmouth. Yet I have little to say to you after the unreasonable length of my last letters which I despatched early yesterday morning. I have had no communication with Count Haugwiz, nor do I see that any is likely to arise; and I am the more satisfied of the necessity of my having immediate discretionary leave of absence and return, the more I consider the subject. I have explained to you that I do not want to slip my neck out of the first risk of Dutch difficulties; on the contrary, my first and great object here having been the deliverance of Holland, I do not think my task is completed till that is done, and I consider my return by Helvoetsluys as, what we used to call in arithmetic, the proof of the sum. I can conceive no solid reason why you should wish my residence here in the present state of affairs; if you have any apprehension of inconvenience from Paget's arrival here, that may, as I think, be much better deferred, and the ordinary course may with much greater advantage be carried on with Mr. Garlike's assistance, which I am taught, by what I hear of the one and observe of the other, to consider as much the most desirable arrangement in the present moment. It is likewise possible that you may have a hankering inclination to see me discuss with Berlin whatever is to be discussed in the case of our military occupation of Holland, or of their peaceable negotiation for it; to this I can only say that if it drags on into length, it is out of my contract, and may be done by Garlike, or if it was of early question I might still do it on my road and in my way to Helvoetsluys; and whenever I can embark from thence I feel myself embarking in triumph, though it is the triumph of your alacrity and energy in England, rather than of any which I can boast of at Berlin.

“The Hereditary Prince of Orange has seen Count Haugwiz, after he had obtained his military leave of absence from the King; the Minister told him that they had sent their proposition from hence to Paris on the 23rd instant (the day of our formal conference), and that he expected his answer on the 11th of August, but he spoke as if three weeks more were likely to pass before the Prussian troops could, in any event, march into the country; if this calculation be just and be not thrown out to deceive us, and if you adhere to your first week of August, as I earnestly hope and trust you will, all will succeed to our wish, and Prussia will be obliged to come into our arrangements for Holland instead of proposing theirs to us. Since I last wrote to you, I have found that the two Fagels are not as well satisfied as I have been of the H[ereditary] P[rince] being entirely cured of his Prussomanie; they have certainly more opportunities than I have of judging the Prince's real inclinations, and their opinion naturally leads me in some respect to distrust my own; but still I cannot help repeating that, although I see in him a very laudable ambition of working out the independence as well as the deliverance of his country, I do not see any traces of his wishing for Prussian connection in preference to English, and I cannot blame him for entertaining the desire, however impracticable, of not depending absolutely on either country. Meantime, I cannot suspect him of any shabby management with them here, because he not only enters heartily into all English discussions with me, but he really seeks to direct his conduct by my opinion, and is anxious that I should advise him, even in this moment, to join in person the Goree expedition; a measure which he would not press so much upon me if he really wished to trust rather to Prussian than to British assistance for the re-establishment of his country and his family. I have, however, determined him to take an intermediate course; he sets out to-night and stops one evening at Brunswick in his way to Lingen, where he expects to arrive on the 3rd of August; if his presence there should only increase the fermentation in the provinces of Groningen and Friesland without an actual explosion, that will embarrass the Batavian government, and in some respect divert their efforts and their attention; and he has promised the most extreme caution to prevent any real and declared rising until the English armament shall have landed. At that moment, if the disposition of the country and the new circumstances of the interior should be as favourable as they promise, it is thought that the Prince may, in that case, almost immediately obtain possession either of Deventer Zutphen or Campen, from which latter place he may immediately have the benefit of the good disposition and assistance of the Texel fleet, if at that time they should declare in his favour. There is likewise a project stirring for Coeverden, which, as you will see, is at no great distance from Lingen on the Ems. These are the speculations in the most favourable cases, and these the chances of the Prince being able to penetrate into the country from the German frontier. If, on the contrary, the first effect of the British possession of Helvoetsluys and the Brill has not the general influence which we are taught to expect, if the country does not in the first moment rise, and if the original plan of the first division waiting absolutely in Goree for the arrival of the Russians be still found necessary and expedient, in that case, as three intermediate weeks will intervene, the Prince then wishes to embark at Norderney in an English sloop or frigate and go round immediately to Brill, from whence he thinks he can then more usefully communicate with the country. If you approve of this, you should give discretionary orders for a sloop or small frigate to go for that purpose either to Norderney or to Cuxhaven, and you may correspond immediately with the Prince by Harward, as Lingen is only a day and a half or two days from Cuxhaven. Sir R. Abercrombie should likewise be informed of this mode of his communicating with the H[ereditary] P[rince] of Orange on any subject which may be pressing; from the Brill to Norderney is not more than two days, and from Norderney to Lingen is not so much.

"I do not admire their sketch of the proclamation; but there is a good deal of management necessary for me in the mode and substance of such criticisms; I do not therefore deem it prudent to make any other objection than that relative to amnesty, which it is promised to me shall be amended in a better edition; I cannot help smiling when I am told that it reads much better in good Dutch, and that it has suffered much in the translation; I do not understand Dutch.

"I shall this morning make a large advance to the Prince out of the 13,000*l.* which remains of the 15,000*l.* originally destined to him; for this is precisely the moment and situation in which 5 or 10,000*l.* may be of the most important service to him, and to the success of his exertions. I will blame him when I see him act shabbily or negligently, but in all that I have yet seen, he had conducted himself with great good sense, good temper, activity, and intelligence. I do not much lament the loss of Sir Charles Whitworth's Swedes; if you long to lay out your money in 10,000 more troops, why should you not deal with the Landgrave of Hesse? you will by that means break into one of the strong funds of Prussian neutrality, and I hear so much of his good dispositions that I should think it probable the proposal might succeed.

"I have another overture from the Elector Palatine, but I do not encourage it; he talks of writing to the Emperor of Russia on the subject, and that I do encourage. I cannot believe in the Petersburg speculations of there being any deep plan of intelligence and concert between Prussia and Sweden against Russia; they are much too timid here to entertain any such vigorous notions, and I know that it is a confirmed opinion of Haugwitz that, although a Prussian war with Russia is not to be feared at Berlin in the ordinary comparison of the military power of the two countries, yet, in the present circumstances, their war with Russia would certainly end in the revolutionizing of all the north of Germany; and with this opinion he would never lend himself to such views as the Emperor seems to suspect. I take it that the Swedish proposition arose partly from a desire to partake in the knowledge of the Baltick expedition, and partly in the desire of putting Sweden into the good graces of the Emperor, but that they were not enough in earnest to mean to do the thing unless they had found you so much in earnest as to lose sight of all the rules of arithmetic in the pursuit of it. The only part of the business which I lament is the strong indication it gives of the angry turn of the Emperor's mind, and the unfavourable moment which it will make for his hearing of our notable conference and our Paris negotiation; yet I flatter myself he will only bully and bluster a little, and they will certainly at Berlin have a very Christian forbearance of resentment, and endure much pecking from the Russian eagle before they turn upon it in hostility. Terror is still the order of the day at Berlin.

"The H[ereditary] P[rince] of Orange and Mr. Fagel have just taken leave of me and begin their journey in high spirits; all the accounts which they have just received are of the most promising description. Van Braam thinks it practicable to assure himself of the Texel batteries and hopes to have completed his work within the first week of August; from Grave, Zutphen, and Dorsburg there are very good hopes, and the Prince is told that it is highly probable that he may have Deventer as soon as the English force lands upon the coast of Holland. But the Prince and Fagel have pressed me upon the possibility of my assisting them in the first moment; I have told them that if I see anything which I can do by coming I will come, and I perceive that my instructions have given me latitude enough to allow of my going anywhere that I thought useful. If therefore any striking advantage shall offer by my presence with the Prince, I shall not hesitate to go even without waiting for previous communication from you. I know that you will agree with me in thinking that forms must give way to substance. The Prince is very much bent upon immediately putting a garrison into Nimeguen, as the first military act of his new government. Have you thought of any arrangement for assisting the first expenses? You know that my credit leaves only 5,000*l.* more for the Prince.

"I need not tell you how anxious I am to hear from you.

"2 p.m.—In the instant of sending the messenger I receive your letter, memorandum, and despatch of the 19th. I have no time to answer them, for, if I did, the messenger would lose the packet. You will long ago have seen that my Prussian treaty will not stand in the way of your arrangements. I hope that your news of the combined fleet will not retard your Dutch expedition; for God's sake come on, and once in possession of Holland you may talk as you please to Prussia. I do not suspect Prussia to be so hostile as you do to the recovery of the Netherlands to Austrian government; but we must not even suppose that they will refuse themselves to, much less that they will resist it, if we and Russia propose it. Adieu or I shall be too late. Your Portuguese messenger has come a day after the post. Do not fear Ireland, but take Holland first; and do not fear my dislikes, I will do all the good I can."

LORD LOUGHBOROUGH [Lord Chancellor] to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 29. Tunbridge Wells.—"I have a great respect for Mr. Miller's character to which I am no stranger, and, as I should be very happy in any opportunity of testifying my sense of his merit, I shall certainly allow (as far as in me lies) no promotion to take place to his prejudice.

"It has appeared to me, however, extremely improper to make any addition to the number of King's counsel at present. I have the satisfaction to know that this opinion can be of no prejudice to Mr. Miller, because he undoubtedly stands in the same situation upon his circuit that he would do if he had a silk gown, and perhaps with more advantage, because he owes it to the public opinion alone."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 29. Wimbledon.—"Sir Ralph Abercrombie was here yesterday and expressed to me strongly his wishes that a few Dutch officers, that may now be in this country, be directed to attend him for the purpose of intercourse with the inhabitants; and he likewise thinks some person of rank and confidence, to be recommended by the Prince of Orange, should also attend the expedition on the part of the Prince. He thinks this would be decorous to the Prince of Orange, considering the terms of the proposed proclamation, and the grounds on which the expedition proceeded. Such a person would likewise be an evidence of the mode in which the inhabitants were treated. It does not occur to me that there can be any objection to these propositions."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 29. Wimbledon.—"I could not return you the accompanying papers sooner, as I never saw Mr. Pitt till this forenoon, when he called here on his way to Holwood. The Stadtholder's letter certainly makes no variation on the subject. You may depend upon it there shall be no want of exertion to get all the force collected that we possibly can, but I am afraid you are too sanguine in your ideas of our getting possession of the Netherlands without you take into your calculation the idea of a Prussian co-operation. If that comes forward, I think we may look forward with fair hopes to a conclusion of the campaign as extensive as you suppose; but, without such a co-operation, I cannot help doubting the Dutch coming forward to aid the progress of our arms; and if they do not, the conquest of Holland will be more tedious than we calculate upon, and the late season of the year is certainly against us. It is ridiculous perhaps, when we are looking forward so far, to tell you that we have not yet got a person so skilled in the knowledge of that part of the coast, as to ensure us in a confidence that there is a good landing to be got at the mouth of the Meuse. Sir Ralph is gone to arrange his troops at Barham camp. I have wrote to the Admiralty this morning, or at least caused Huskisson to write a private letter to Nepean to tell the Admiralty that transports and ordnance were all at their destined places, and I saw nothing to induce a belief that the embarkation might not proceed at the time appointed.

"I need not mention to you that all you have stated to me in your memorandum does not interfere with our first and immediate business, which is to send off Sir Ralph with the first division. If, in the beginning of next spring, a competition was to arise from a deficiency of troops for both, whether we should go to the Netherlands, or to the Somme or the Seine, it would be a nice point to decide upon, and would depend upon the circumstances of the moment."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 29. Wimbledon.—"I agree with you that your arrangement of our force would be the best, if the Russians were arrived; but while the wind continues where it is, we have no chance of seeing them, and it would be a cruel thing to waste the whole season upon Groningen and Friesland alone. Your ideas, however, shall be duly weighed, and nothing finally settled without perfect knowledge of the grounds on which we proceed. If the Russians would arrive, that would make everything easy. You recollect that it has been stated, and apparently with some confidence, that if we would land with a good force, not very large, in the Eastern provinces, a body of troops to the amount of 20,000 would be immediately formed. Besides, you will observe that an attack upon the Helder would be a great relief to Groningen and Friesland by the diversion it would make. Indeed making both at the same time would mutually assist both. I have not time to trouble you more at present, having a great deal to do to-day.

"A body of cavalry are actually embarked and ordered to sail."

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, July 30. Dropmore.—"It is not often that I think you less sanguine than myself as to the result of our measures, but I really believe that in this case you do not allow enough for the situation of the country against which, or rather in which, we are about to act.

"It is very right for a military commander about to undertake an important expedition to make his demands upon Government as on the most unfavourable calculation that can by any possibility be made of the resistance he is to meet with. And you have seen that, so far from arguing against this, I have always urged (in conformity also with your opinion) that our first force should be made as imposing [as possible].

"But this point being now settled, I must on the other hand say that Sir Ralph Abercrombie would neither do justice to himself, nor to us, if he were to apply the same mode of military calculation to his operations, as he has to his demands, and were to act in Holland as if he was in a country armed against him, and where he was to encounter all the difficulties which the local circumstances of the country, considered on military principles, and turned to their full advantage by an effective and disciplined army, would unquestionably supply.

“You know that we have, down to this very hour, accurate intelligence of the amount of French force in Holland. You are aware that it does not amount to 6,000 men, and those too dispersed, as they must necessarily be when our armaments threaten every point of attack from Delfzyl to Antwerp, and when their fears of Prussia are even stronger than our hopes.

“The accurate intelligence received last night of the state of Walcheren and of the Eastern provinces affords a strong confirmation of the former accounts as to the weakness of the enemy; and proves also, in a very satisfactory manner, that they have not yet even turned their attention to our intended point of attack.

“With respect to the Batare army, as it is called, there can be no doubt that we must, on the whole, reckon that more with us than against us. I do not say that there will not be found among them some battalions who will act against us, especially if time is allowed to recover the first impression. But I am confident that, in the first moments, that force will be a source of more embarrassment than confidence to the leaders of the French party in that country.

“You will not suppose that, in saying all this, I entertain a doubt that Sir Ralph Abercrombie will push his first successes with the vigour that belongs to an operation that is to partake much more of a counter-revolution than of a conquest. I am confident he will, and difficulties started before the commencement of an enterprise are certainly much better than difficulties which are not found till after it begins. But I beg of you not to let either the one or the other weigh an instant in your mind to prevent our being found in readiness to avail ourselves of the full extent of success to which our present undertaking, if executed with the same vigour of mind with which it has been planned and prepared, must inevitably lead.

“Look at the campaign of 1787; how little time it cost the Duke of Brunswick, with all his doubts, and hesitations, and cautions, and precautions, to march with 25,000 men (no more) from Wesel to Amsterdam; and then let any man tell me what there is in the present circumstances to stop British generals and British soldiers, with the country unanimously in their favour, and with the threatened if not the active co-operation of the whole Prussian army.

“If this were mere speculation of what is likely to happen, it would be a very idle dispute, and would best be settled by the event. If our officers go persuaded that nothing more is required of them than to make what would, on military principles, be considered as a considerable progress in a difficult country, guarding themselves at every step against the danger of a resistance which cannot exist, they may make a blameless campaign, but they will make no counter-revolution. And if we, calculating on this visionary resistance, shall, in like manner, make up our minds to the slow progress of a regular army through such a line of defence, we shall be found unprepared to profit of that success which, on a better principle of action, must attend our army.

"Forgive this dissertation. It is not often necessary to animate you with more hopes than you form, and I may now be wrong. But indeed I do not think your letter speaks of this enterprise in its true light. Make your calculations therefore to preoccupy the Netherlands, and to do so this autumn. If we are disappointed no harm is done; but if it is in our power to do so, and we are not prepared for it, we shall have much to regret.

"I am puzzled what to do about your other letter. No Dutch nobles, or persons of much weight, emigrated out of the provinces at the revolution. We always discouraged their doing so, and it is now well for us that we did, for their influence (though not great) will be much greater in their own districts than in our army. Count Rhoon, the head of the Bentincks, was imprisoned; but he is now at Varel in Oldenburgh, eager to serve, and pressing his services upon me by every post. He has considerable influence in the very places to which we are going. But he is rash, hotheaded, and totally ungovernable. The Prince of Orange has an inveterate dislike and jealousy of him; and he has, on the other hand, pretensions which I do not believe the most unprejudiced and capable man would, in the Stadtholder's place, think it wise to gratify. I have therefore kept him back hitherto; but my intention was, as soon as our expedition had sailed and not before, to invite him over to England, and to send him from hence into Holland. There is no doubt that his vehement ardour and activity may be made of great use there; but I am afraid he will, on the whole, give more trouble than benefit to those who command our forces.

"There is no other emigrant of consideration in Holland. None at all in this country. Great use may, however, be made of the officers of the rassemblement who are, in fact, the only emigrants. But you will recollect that, in the very first conversation at which I was present with Sir Ralph Abercrombie, on my starting that subject he expressed a strong desire that he might not have them with him in the beginning. I have in compliance with that wish kept the business back, and it is now too late to write into Germany, and to have any of them here before the expedition sails; except the engineer who has been written for long since, but we have not yet received the answer.

"Thinking, however, that much advantage will arise from bringing forward early a Dutch army under those officers, I will immediately write to Berlin, for it cannot be done nearer, and that will take ten days going and as much returning, to desire that the Hereditary Prince of Orange, who has the direction of this whole business, will send over here officers for two or three regiments to begin with, taking them from those who have most weight in the provinces we look to in the first instance. But this leads to a larger question, in which the Hereditary Prince has applied for our direction. It is this; what are we disposed to in this respect in point of expense? Such an army cannot be raised, armed, maintained, or fed, without great expense. As far as the two or three regiments go, of which I have already spoken, I suppose the consideration of expense will not be thought material, and I will not delay writing to-day for the sake of any consultation; having (I confess) rather reluctantly postponed it hitherto, in compliance with the opinion I have referred to.

“But the large question requires a comparison of means and demands which must be more fully considered. On that therefore I will, if I see Pitt and you to-morrow, converse with you more fully; or, if we should not meet at St. James’s, I could come to you at Wimbledon in the evening, supposing that to suit you.” Copy.

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 30. Downing Street.—“Mr. Hammond has just now given me your letter of this morning, of the contents of which I hope to inform the Prince of Orange to-morrow morning, as his Serene Highness comes to town, and I am to see him after I have seen your Lordship. I am quite of your opinion that it will be impossible for the Prince of Orange to appoint any person of the description alluded to in Mr. Dundas’s letter to accompany Sir Ralph Abercromby, as there is at present no person in this country (at least to my knowledge) who answers that description. Sontag will do extremely well as far as that goes, and afterwards Comte Rhoon, and, I hope, the Hereditary Prince will do still better. I should think that the Hereditary Prince’s powers will be sufficient to enable him to do what your Lordship desires Mr. Grenville to suggest to him. I am only afraid that the employing even Batave officers will be subject to insuperable difficulties, as I am quite sure that none of those who are attached to the House of Orange would serve with any of the Bataves under any shape whatsoever. But I hope to converse on this subject with you to-morrow morning.

“I hope you have received my first letter of Sunday last with a translation of the Prince’s intended proclamation.”

Postscript. “The Princess has already written to the Hereditary Prince to represent to him the necessity of his coming without delay nearer to the frontier; so that I hope Mr. Grenville’s representations on that subject will soon be followed by his Serene Highness’s departure.”

SIR JAMES CRAUFURD to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 30. Hamburg.—“The name of the gentleman formerly a member of the Council of State in Holland, whom I speak of in my dispatch of this date, is Calkoen. His family and fortune being still in Holland, one cannot wonder that he should be most exceedingly anxious that his name should not be mentioned, and that he should not be suspected as communicating with the enemies of the Republic. He, accordingly, made it a positive condition with me that I should not name him even to His Majesty’s ministers. I, of course, would not withhold his name from your Lordship, but I have avoided inserting it in the official dispatch.

"Some persons, I believe, have prejudices against him, but none can deny that he is a man of integrity, and respectability, and capacity, and well acquainted with his own country. I have known him before. He is lately come hither from Holland for the express purpose of conversing with me on the present state of affairs.

"Your Lordship, I hope, will pardon the zeal which induces me to mention to you a person at Vienna who might be made very useful to the British interests, and respecting whom it is perhaps ridiculous to suppose that your Lordship is not fully informed. But as I have reason to believe that others did not think it worth while to make the necessary attempt to gain him, perhaps they may never have mentioned him to you. The person I mean is Monsieur Pelin, formerly secretary to Mirabeau, the man with whom M. de Thugut lives in greater intimacy than with any person whatever.

"He is a man whom I certainly would not trust, but I am sure that great use might be made of him; and I have every reason to believe that he would not refuse a handsome remuneration for his services. He is much employed by M. de Thugut, and his abilities are of the first cast. I should have ventured sooner to mention him to your Lordship had I been informed, which I was not till very lately, that the means which were held out as likely to gain him had been rather slighted."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, July 30. Dropmore.—"You will have seen by my last letter that De Luc had inflicted upon me all his information, from which I collected nothing but encouragement, instead of hearing from him of any new difficulties. The truth, however, is that he is so occupied with the individual importance of De Luc and so overwhelmed with the confidence he thinks Haugwitz reposes in him, that very little reliance can be placed on what he says, though he is full of zeal and good principle.

"The military opinions of the Duke of Brunswick begin to be too ridiculous even for farce, and happily our own exertions have enabled us no longer to look upon them as very serious tragedy.

"You will see that, at two days distance of time, and many hundred miles distance of space, we were writing to each other the same doubts as to the ultimate utility of this famous Prussian co-operation which for eight months together has occupied so much of our time and thoughts. Still, however, I wish we may obtain it, provided we do not buy it too dear; but I should now think any sacrifice of political interests, and any considerable sacrifice of that dignity which belongs to treating on equal terms and on fair grounds, would be too high a price; the mere money I should not regard, because in that light I am sure that the application of a million in this way would be strict economy.

"I do not now think we shall have a Prussian declaration to assist our expedition, and I am confident, contrary to what seems to be your opinion, that we shall not want Prussian aid to enable us to hold Holland; nay, that we shall do better without it. But I still wish to purchase both the declaration and the assistance, in order that the Prussians by occupying the Meuse may enable us to occupy the Netherlands, and having those eleven points in our favour, then to talk with our good allies as to the ultimate arrangement to be made respecting those provinces in the safety of which we have, after all, more concern than all the Powers of Germany together.

"I am less struck with the picture you draw of Haugwitz and his master because, since I have known anything of foreign affairs, I have never known any other state of things at Berlin. Sometimes the King was right and the Minister wrong, sometimes both wrong together, but never both right at the same time. And though I have no doubt that much of what you collect of the King's timidity, indolence, and irresolution is true, yet I am also persuaded that Haugwitz avails himself of these in his negotiations, just as we did of our opposition in Parliament and sense of the nation, whenever we are pressed for anything we do not like to agree to.

"I imagine that his idea of extending his monthly payments beyond December is only this: that he wants to claim the same sum for winter quarters that we could have given for summer operations, and possibly that he thinks this plan may enable him to protract this negotiation on its present footing for some months longer; whereas now, if he does not act till September, he of course loses one month of subsidy, and of eating our bread and forage, instead of consuming his own, or plundering the north of Germany of it.

"Now to this protraction I should have no very great objection, because it pretty nearly supplies the defensive line which I want, were it not for a consideration personal to yourself. It is this. We are now looking to a counter revolution in Holland; we have in that case the same difficulties to overcome which we did not overcome but yielded to in 1787 and 1788. Lord Malmesbury was then much more occupied with his own honours, than with the permanence of the system he had re-established. You know in what hands the direction of foreign affairs here was then placed. Everything was left to take its course, and a worse course things could not have taken. So far from improving the advantages which that revolution had afforded him, the Prince of Orange was found in every respect weaker and more unprovided in 1794 than he had been in 1786.

"This we must now prevent, for you will not think so ill of me as to believe that I should like to leave it to my successor to say of me what I have just said of the Duke of Leeds. I had for this purpose long cherished the hope that you would indeed, as you propose, return from Berlin through Helvoetsluys, but not without making a longer stay in Holland than you reckoned upon. The functions of British Ambassador there at such a period would not be unworthy even of your talents, nor could your desire of doing real and permanent service easily find more ample gratification elsewhere.

"Latterly, however, seeing the good you are doing at Berlin, and influenced by one consideration only, that of a superior personal knowledge of the individuals which Lord Malmesbury has, and which you have never been in the way of acquiring, I had, notwithstanding my objections to his conduct after the last revolution, looked to sending him there pretty soon after Abercromby's sailing, trusting that though he had done nothing or next to nothing of himself, yet he would well and actively execute the instructions he might receive. He is, however, now so ill as to put this wholly out of the question, for, even if he should so far recover as to be able to bear the voyage, we want there the energy of such a mind as yours, not the languor of a valetudinarian.

"I come back therefore to my original idea, and I come back to it with much more satisfaction than the other project ever afforded me. You must prepare yourself therefore to receive a proposal in form that, as soon as any appearance of Stadtholderian government shall have been re-established at the Hague or elsewhere, you should proceed there to take upon you the character and functions of Ambassador Extraordinary, charged with the whole political direction of that shapeless mass which we must, now or never, reduce into a form of efficient and permanent utility to ourselves, instead of leaving it, as it has been for a century, a dead weight on our exertions whenever it has not been turned against us.

"I have attentively considered, as it is my duty, the means of doing this. It would be too long to detail them now, and I shall have occasions enough of explaining them, as I trust, to his Majesty's ambassador at the Hague, because I am confident the proposal is one that you cannot decline, and I hope it is one you would not wish to decline.

"Its effect on your Berlin discussions might be useful, because it would enable you to bring them (if it was then useful to do so) to a definitive issue; and if you should see it in that light, there would perhaps be no harm in yourself hinting to Haugwitz, as I have already done to De Luc, that your stay at Berlin could not be prolonged indefinitely, that you had undertaken the mission only as an extraordinary one, and that it has already far exceeded the limits of time and discussion that you had in view when you had first undertaken it."

H. FAGEL to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, July 31.—"M. Haugwitz ayant communiqué de la manière la plus inattendue au Comte de Panin et à Mr. Grenville que Sa Majesté Prussienne, en conséquence d'avis reçus, s'étoit déterminée à entrer en négociation avec le gouvernement François, pour obtenir l'évacuation de la Hollande par les troupes Françaises, les deux ministres témoignèrent au Comte de Haugwitz, dans les termes les plus énergiques, leur extrême surprise de cette communication, et lui déclarèrent en même tems qu'elle mettoit un terme à leurs négociations avec le Cabinet de Berlin, et obligeoit leurs Cours respectives à poursuivre de concert, et à l'exclusion de la Prusse, les mesures précédemment arrêtées entre elles relativement à la Hollande.

“ Dans cette conjoncture je suis chargé de la part de Lord Grenville de déclarer à s'altesse sérénissime Monseigneur le Prince d'Orange, que le gouvernement de ce pays, n'entendant point préjuger de la décision qu'il conviendra à s'altesse sérénissime de prendre sur cet important objet, souhaiteront cependant de savoir si Monseigneur le Prince d'Orange seroit disposé à accéder à la négociation que le Cabinet de Berlin a entamé avec le Directoire, et si s'altesse sérénissime consentirait au rétablissement de sa maison tel qu'il pourra lui être proposé à la suite de la négociation. Dans le cas où s'altesse sérénissime (ne jugeant point de son intérêt de s'en remettre à la négociation susdite) préférât de seconder les mesures que Sa Majesté Britannique, de concert avec ses allies, est occupé à prendre pour effectuer son rétablissement et celui de son illustre maison, il y a deux points sur lesquels milord Grenville m'a prié d'inviter s'altese sérénissime à prendre une détermination.

1. “ Il paroît indispensable que l'expédition projetée dans ce pays, et qui va faire voile dans peu de jours, soit accompagnée d'une personne de marque nommée par s'altesse sérénissime, ayant sa confiance, et munie d'une autorisation de sa part, et qui puisse attester aux habitans des Provinces-Unies que l'expédition en question se fait du seu et avec l'agrément et assentissement de Monseigneur le Prince d'Orange; et qui puisse être témoin d'après cela de la manière dont les troupes Britanniques agiront vis à vis des habitans des Provinces-Unies.

2. “ On souhaite que s'altesse sérénissime veuille bien donner une déclaration formelle qu'au cas où elle sera rétablie dans ses hautes dignités, moyennant la puissante intervention de Sa Majesté Britannique et de ses alliés, s'altese sérénissime emploiera toute son influence pour que la république des Provinces-Unies, ainsi rétablie, prenne partie en commun avec la Grande Bretagne (conformément au traité d'alliance qui unissoit les deux états avant la révolution de 1795) à la guerre contre la France; vû que Sa Majesté Britannique, après les efforts qu'elle aura fait pour le rétablissement de la République, ne sauroit en aucune manière consentir qu'à la suite de ce rétablissement, la République rentre à l'égard de la France dans un état de neutralité, dont les suites pour la Grande Bretagne et ses alliés seroient pires que celle de l'état de la guerre actuelle entre ce pays-ci et la Hollande.” Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, July 31. Holwood.—“ I received your letter, together with the despatch from Mr. Grenville, here last night on my way to Kent. The enclosures in that despatch are the most accurate information with regard to the places they refer to than any other I have seen, and therefore I have thought it right to send the perusal of them, and likewise your letter to me, to Sir Ralph Abercrombie. He is at Barham camp with his troops. I will see him to-morrow or next day, and will then return the papers to you. I have kept back one of them, and return it to you, as it has nothing to do with the points on which it is proper to inform him.

“Upon the subject of your letter and the observations you offer to me on the subject of our expedition, I subscribe very willingly to all you state; but I confess I am not without considerable anxiety on a measure where so much is at stake. I am noways afraid of the military part of the subject, nor do I entertain any apprehensions of our officers acting up to our expectations, so far as depends on the utmost exertions that can be made. My anxiety rests on another point. Unless the Dutch co-operate with us cordially and actively, I do not believe it possible to do as much by the mere force of arms during this campaign, beginning at so late a season, as we flatter ourselves; and if there is anything in which I may perhaps think you more sanguine than me, it is in the confidence you have on that point. I cannot forget the American war, where we were so miserably disappointed in the promised and expected co-operation. Even in this war, with all the disgust entertained both in France and Holland against their oppressors, how little exertion have they made to relieve themselves. And in our present project you must recollect that, whatever the dispositions of the country may be, the power of the country is in the hands of those truly hostile to us; and who, so far as they can, will meet us in landing and everywhere else with all the resistance in their power. Perhaps any shade of difference [that] may be between us on this view of the question, may be accounted for by the superior knowledge you have upon it. You are in the daily habit of receiving the intelligence, and of combining it, and drawing your conclusions from it. I am therefore very much disposed to think that your ideas are more just than mine; and you may rest assured that I am decided to act upon your ideas (in which Mr. Pitt perfectly concurs) rather than upon any doubts of my own. Upon this ground it is my intention to give a final instruction to Sir Ralph Abercrombie before he sails; encouraging him, even if it should be contrary to mere military ideas, to act upon the reasoning of your letter; looking upon himself as going not to conquer a country, but to aid the counter-revolution ready to burst out in it. I think it fair to give him additional instruction founded upon that principle, because, if he should be led to dash more than military rules and tactics would warrant, he may do it upon my responsibility rather than his own.

“I shall not give them an hour’s quiet when I get down till they sail. I have heard surmises of some delays being hinted at the War Office, but be what they may, I will resist them. The enclosed letter from Huskisson will show you what I refer to. I am afraid from Mr. Morland’s letter to me, to which he refers, we shall soon have the French prisoners thrown on our hands.”

BARON DE THUGUT to COUNT DE COBENTZL, at St. Petersburgh.

1799, July 31. Vienna.—“Monsieur le Comte de Razoumowsky a fait connaître ici, d'ordre de sa Cour, que Monsieur Whitworth avait fait à Pétersbourg des offices dans le but d'obtenir que le corps auxiliaire que Sa Majesté Impériale de toutes les Russies avait bien voulu nous accorder en vertu du traité de l'alliance, et qui jusqu'ici a été employé en Italie, fut joint à l'armée Russe destinée à agir par la Suisse; et que Monsieur le Maréchal de Souvoroff, mis à la tête de la totalité de ces forces Russes, put conduire lui-même l'importante expédition qui, après l'expulsion totale de l'ennemi de la Suisse, devait frapper les grands coups dans l'intérieur de la France; Monsieur le Comte de Razoumowsky ajouta, que son auguste maître approuvait la proposition de l'Angleterre, et verrait avec plaisir que Sa Majesté y accédât de son côté.

“Ayant rendu compte à l'Empereur des ouvertures de Monsieur le Comte de Razoumowsky, Sa Majesté m'ordonna de déclarer à cet ambassadeur, que quoique nous ne méconnaissions nullement l'appui précieux et le secours efficace que nous avions trouvés dans la bravoure du corps auxiliaire Russe pour nos progrès en Italie, et quoique nous sentions pleinement la part décisive que nous devons dans nos succès à la valeur signalée et aux grands talents militaires de Monsieur le Maréchal de Souvoroff Rymniksky, Sa Majesté n'hésitait cependant nullement d'adhérer à l'arrangement proposé par l'Angleterre, et agréé par l'Empereur Paul premier; cette résolution de Sa Majesté étant fondée sur sa déférence pour l'avis et les desirs de son allié également, et sur la considération de l'influence majeure que pourrait avoir sur tout le sort de la guerre l'expédition par la Suisse, dont il est, par conséquent, de l'intérêt commun de faciliter et d'assurer la réussite par l'avantage si essentiel d'une masse de forces, composée de troupes de la même nation, sous le commandement d'un chef aussi célèbre que l'est Monsieur le Maréchal de Souvoroff. Comme nous espérons que la prise de Mantoue va très prochainement consolider notre situation militaire en Italie, il ne dépendra alors que de Monsieur le Maréchal de Souvoroff, ainsi que Sa Majesté le lui fera connaître, de placer immédiatement le corps auxiliaire sur les frontières du Valais, en y faisant relever un corps Autrichien d'une force à peu près égale, porté actuellement en observation de ce côté-là sous le Général Haddick. Au moyen de ce révirement très aisé, le corps auxiliaire se trouvera tout posté en Suisse, et pourra attendre dans cette position l'arrivée du gros de l'armée Russe en Suisse du côté de Schaffhouse, sous la conduite de Monsieur le Général de Korsakoff, pour entrer sans délai en pleine communication avec lui, et s'y joindre, ou coopérer en telle autre manière que Monsieur le Maréchal le jugera nécessaire.

différents objets. Sa Majesté va de son côté fixer la nouvelle répartition dans nos troupes, et les projets d'opérations que l'extrême difficulté des subsistances en Suabe à l'arrivée du corps d'armée Russe et, d'une autre part, l'entreprise nouvellement résolue entre les Cours de Petersbourg et de Londres d'une expédition contre la Hollande, vont rendre nécessaires de notre côté ; et dont, aussitôt après les dernières déterminations prises par Sa Majesté, vous serez informé." Copy.

W. PITT to LORD GRENNILLE.

1799, August 1. Teston.--"The conduct of the Court of Berlin is worthy of it, and ought not to surprise us. But it leads to so much new consideration, that Dundas and I most anxiously wish to see you. I must earnestly beg you, if possible, to be at Walmer in the course of to-morrow or Saturday, as there is not a minute to be lost in our final decision, which we shall be unwilling to make without you. You will be sure of a bed. Our generals would at all events have been for waiting, at least for the Russians."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private and confidential.

1799, August 1. Zurich.--"When you shall have read my despatches, you will certainly agree with me that I came here for my sins. All the rest I could have managed with tolerable ease, but this dispute between Craufurd and Hotzé has placed me in a situation from which, I am persuaded, I shall not escape without making enemies of both.

"There is nothing that I have said in Craufurd's favour in my public despatches that is not perfectly true ; but his manners are sometimes very offensive to the Swiss, and quite intolerable to the Austrian staff-officers, who are used themselves to treat a colonel in their own army as an English officer would not behave to a sergeant.

"Plunkett justifies Hotzé's first note only on the ground that it was written to a colonel ; and that the language it contained was such as the general used every day to colonels under his orders.

"Whatever decision your Lordship shall take, I trust you will feel the absolute necessity of not leaving these two men together in any situation where the one shall not be entirely subordinate to the other.

"If Craufurd is continued as commissary, Hotzé must not have the command ; but if Hotzé had the command on his own terms, he told me himself that nothing would give him greater pleasure than that Craufurd should serve under him, provided his Majesty would give him local rank. Plunkett also told me that the Arch-Duke would, with pleasure, give Craufurd a command, having a very high opinion of his military talents in the field, provided he had the rank of major-general, and a commission from the King to serve in the Swiss army. The Arch-Duke told me himself he thought Craufurd's talents were quite misemployed in buying shoes and firelocks for an army, instead of leading a division into the field.

"I have not ventured to say anything on the subject in my public dispatch, but, if Craufurd be left here in any situation whatever, I would strongly recommend that he should have local rank; and, if General Hotzé have the command on his own terms, then Craufurd must be nothing but a major-general, and you must send out another commissary. I consider this last point as of absolute necessity. I have formed my judgement from seeing the two men together; and your Lordship may rely upon it that there are no human means of making them settle an account where there shall be any difference between them, either about the sum total or any of the items.

"It is quite impossible for me to give your Lordship anything like a notion of the scene of disorder and confusion I found on my arrival. All that I can say is that, had I not arrived when I did, this explosion would long since have taken place; and, had I not been present when it happened, it must have had very unpleasant consequences; Craufurd having considered the general's note as a personal affront, and being determined to treat it as such without my interference. He even told the Arch-Duke that, though he had been over-ruled in his opinion, yet that he must ever consider Hotzés conduct as personal.

"From all that has happened your Lordship will, I trust, see the necessity of sending the person, whoever he may be, that you destine for my successor, to remain here a month or two with me before my return, in a private character.

"With respect to this country, I think I can answer for forming all the old governments, and sending a deputation from each to the Diet; but there they must be delivered, bound hand and foot, into the power of the foreign Minister whose master shall have the greatest influence at that moment in the affairs of the Continent. They cannot have any will of their own, and, if they had any, they have no force wherewith to support it. So that the great Powers of Europe, if they are unanimous, may make of those states whatever they please, almost without opposition. His Majesty's influence is at this moment very great and, I trust, will soon be still greater among the people of the country; but, I am truly sorry to say, this country is no longer to be reckoned among the nations of Europe, and must necessarily belong to the strongest.

"Your Lordship may take for granted what I have here laid down. What consequences are to follow this state of things, and what plans or what system may be formed upon it is what I cannot pretend to say; nor do I believe as yet that the Court of Vienna has formed any determinate system for this country. But it seems most material that his Majesty's Government should have early information of the fact, and that your Lordship's attention should be directed to it, as I am persuaded that, in some shape or other, this country (that is the number of square miles and acres of which this country is composed) will be made to play an important part in any scheme of general pacification.

"I shall make this the subject of a public despatch immediately; but my time has been so wholly taken up by this confounded dispute between our two military men that, since my return from the little Cantons, I have not known where to turn myself.

"As I cannot bring my ciphers so near the enemy, and as my despatches must generally contain matters of delicacy, if not of importance, I wish your Lordship would consider whether I ought not to have a couple of messengers constantly on this station, whom I might send to Cuxhaven, and no further.

"I have had real difficulty in procuring one to convey these despatches.

"I expect Pichégu every hour. I have seen d'André and made all the arrangements necessary for carrying on the correspondence. De Précý is ill and cannot join me, but I have entered into correspondence with him, and expect soon to have a good communication with Lyons."

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 1. London.—"Je reçois à l'instant votre billet, et quoique certainement Lord Mulgrave n'ait pas besoin de recommandation, je lui donnerai un mot pour l'Archiduc qui pourra peut-être lui être de quelq'utilité.

"Les lettres que j'ai reçu hier portent toutes l'impreinte de la meilleure volonté dans nos troupes et notre Cabinet. Vous savez, de vous à moi, que je ne parle pas facilement ainsi. Mon père me témoigne son étonnement de ce que je n'avois point encore mandé le départ de M. Eden, tandis que ce ministre le disoit déjà depuis quinze jours à ses amis. Mon bon père en conclut que vous avez moins de confiance en moi. J'aime à me flatter qu'il se trompe. J'en serois désolé, parceque je ne l'ai pas mérité, et parceque je vous suis tendrement attaché. Permettez-moi, néanmoins, de vous prier encore de me mander toujours avec bonté tout ce qui pourra vous déplaire en moi, et si j'ai jamais le malheur de vous déplaire moi-même. Autant je suis heureux d'être ici, me croyant aimé et estimé de ceux que j'aime et vénère, vous pardessus tout, autant serois-je malheureux si jamais ces sentimens, qui font mon bonheur et ont fait ma consolation les deux dernières années, venoient à changer.

"Je ne suis pas assez indiscret pour vous rien demander sur tout ce qui se prépare, et que mon métier est de deviner. J'aime à croire que si Lord Grenville l'avait confié à quelqu'ami hors du ministère, cet ami eut été moi, et qu'il me connoît assez pour être convaincu que le dire à Starhemberg, s'il l'eut voulu, n'est point été le dire au ministre de la cour de Vienne. La seule grâce que je vous demande c'est de m'en dire autant que vous en ferez confier à Vienne. Vous jugez bien que si on alloit y appercevoir que j'en sais moins que vous ne voulez qu'on en cache chez nous, on en inféreroit ou que je vous suis suspect, ou que je suis un imbécille. Assurément mon dévouement à la bonne cause, et par conséquent à vous, et ma conduite ne l'eut point mérité. Agréez mes hommages les plus vrais et les plus tendres."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 1. Stowe.—"I am vastly hurt at finding the combined fleet safe out of the Mediterranean; where I fear (from a very detailed account sent to me) that the wretched state of poor Lord St. Vincent's imbecility, and the natural incapacity of his successor, have lost the greatest opportunity that ever presented itself. Perhaps you do not know all the details; but they are shocking. I fear that one painful result of all this is the necessity of locking up some of your regulars in Ireland, who ought to be on board and more usefully employed.

"I enclose to you a paper which the Bishop of St. Pol gave me in consequence of the letter I wrote to him at your desire, and that of Mr. Pitt. The names marked with a cross are known to him, and ought to be sent to France as soon as possible; the others may be equally useful, but are not personally known to him, though they are known to his priests at Portchester, from whom he received the lists under the most solemn assurances of their exactness. But these lists are obtained with the greatest difficulty, as every obstruction is still thrown in their way by the keepers of the prisons; so that, if you expect any number of these names, orders must be given that those priests who have the Bishop's certificate for visiting the sick, may be permitted to enter the prisons and to see the prisoners alone."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 1. Berlin.—"I have been obliged to discuss a little more largely than you may think either prudent or necessary for me the extensive subject of your dispatch, because, although I might have rested entirely upon that change of circumstances which annuls here my share of the execution of your last orders, I did not think a single word or two a sufficient answer to the many important considerations which you had brought forward to me. With respect to Berlin, the foundation of your hopes rested upon extending the effects of a Prussian co-operation by a position of a defensive description enough to satisfy them, and of a nature sufficiently menacing to Mayence, to set you free from thence; but the last new tergiversation (to take my friend Thugut's word) has absolutely cut across all present hope here, and does not leave much in future; for if the real interest which they take here in Holland will not lead them even to hostile demonstration for that great point, I think it manifest that they are determined not to engage in war. I see by your private letter that you have some remorse in arresting me in the full march of my prosperous treaty. I do assure you that I have no parental partiality to it; the unlicked shape in which you saw it was most entirely the precious work of Haugwiz, and sensible as I was of the value of Prussian declaration at this moment, I was anxious first to see what the King would consent to, and afterwards to discuss what we might bring him to consent to; but in Sandoz's letter the King and his little confidential circle have seen again their precious neutrality; and the King was not ashamed to recall his consent, nor had Haugwiz enough of the spirit of a man to refuse himself to the disgrace which his Prussian Majesty has heaped upon him. I think you cannot but agree with me in the impossibility of our making a new proposition to them now, other than the proposition which Abercrombie is, I hope, on this day carrying with ten thousand British troops to Goree.

"You will be surprised to see me recur again to the idea of my being obliged to go suddenly to the frontier without waiting for previous advice from England; the truth is that the Hereditary Prince of Orange so strongly pressed me on this subject, and stated so earnestly his wish that if I were really wanted I would come to him, that I did not choose to shelter myself from any risk which it may be useful that I should incur; and I am, upon similar occasions, more disposed to pursue the spirit of my instructions than the letter or the forms of them. If therefore I see that I can be useful in giving to him the person and countenance of an English minister, I shall go without scruple or hesitation; desiring you only to recollect that my contract expires with the deliverance of Holland, and that as soon as the intercourse between Helvoetsluys and Harwich is re-established, I shall claim my fair right of putting an end to my exile, and being among the first passengers of the renewed intercourse with England. When I recollect that I am writing on the very day which you announced for the commencement of this enterprise you will easily believe that my spirits run high, and that I tread with exultation even upon Prussian ground. A momentary fear once shot across me that your doubts, your ignorance, or your information respecting the combined fleet might lead you to suspend the expedition which I am now looking for on tip-toe, but I will not think so ill of your spirit and resolution at home to believe that you will give up to the apprehensions of the moment a sure and important conquest which grows more valuable in proportion to the increased danger of the combined fleet; and surely, as a mere naval measure of defence, you can take none which will be of more effect than the conquest of Holland, by which you give yourself at one stroke the free use of all the fleet that blocks the Texel and all that is within it. But I do you wrong to press this subject, or to suspect that the British Cabinet will hesitate to take possession of Holland because the Lisbon paper announces the sailing of the combined fleet from Carthagenæ; and we, too, have we not a fleet?

“You will observe that I have not discussed the military part of your plan, because, as I have said already, I consider the Berlin share of that plan as being completely out of discussion, and as I do not believe in any Prussian co-operation for obtaining the deliverance of Holland, still less do I believe in any when that object shall have been obtained. I should, however, still be inclined to think that you would do well to continue your former plan of the Russian attack, and to continue to keep Austria rather to the support of that attack than to their new project of the siege of Mayence. Whatever be the issue of the Prussian negotiation at Paris, there still will be a real assistance to the allies upon the Lower Rhine without any formal treaty or convention for that purpose. If Prussia has demanded the left bank of the Rhine, or rather the evacuation of it, in the case of that cession you will have nothing to fear on the side of Mayence or Ehrenbreitstein; if, as is more likely, France refuses that evacuation, then Prussia will still have enough to fear for themselves on that side, and their measures of defence, combined with Hesse and Saxony, will still be a powerful check upon French attack on that side. Still, therefore, I should conceive that in every case you will continue your Russian attack; although it is subject to the remark that you over-calculated the force of Korsakow in calling it 40,000 men, that part of your Swiss levies will probably be obliged to remain in that country, and that the army of Massena is, I believe, daily augmenting in larger proportions than that of the Archduke; but if these considerations hang upon the project of incursion towards Lyons, they are additional motives against breaking the combined force by the detached operation of the Austrian siege of Mayence.

“The point against which this cursed Prussian tergiversation tells most is that of the destined command of the Duke of York, because, without Prussian demonstration at least in this quarter, although you may succeed in assisting the insurrection in Flanders, you will scarcely be strong enough to pursue that effort to the good effect which you propose. In truth I very much suspect that you will find another difficulty, perhaps, in the desire which the United Provinces may have to obtain a momentary tranquility by adopting the inactive neutrality of Prussia; and it cannot escape your observation that the partisans of Prussia will speak powerfully for their system in Holland. If their system brings peace, while ours demands from them a continuation of the dangers and expense of war, there are few Dutchmen, I fear, who would long hesitate in this comparative calculation; however promising the prospect of war might be shewn to them to be, and however insecure and insufficient the nominal peace proposed by Prussia, yet, after the long and vehement agitation of that country, there would be found in all parties within it a strong and passionate inclination for cessation from war. Against this inclination you will struggle, and probably have a difficult struggle, but it may be one that will lessen your means of efficient attack from this side. The Hereditary Prince of Orange is gone through Brunswick to Lingen, where he will be on the 3rd instant."

Enclosure.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

1799, July 29. Berlin.—"Your letters and dispatches by Bassett arrived here yesterday and are on their road to London. I was sorry to perceive in them some disposition to irritation against the Court of Berlin, because that disposition alarms me for the impression which is likely to be made upon the Emperor's mind by the unexpected narrative of the project of treaty, of the conference with the ministers of the allied Courts, ending in a negotiation with Paris.

"I am sure that it is unnecessary for me to remark upon the extreme mischief which would arise from any serious hostility between the two countries of Russia and Prussia in this important moment; and, if I take the liberty of recurring to the same topic, I do so only to express, with my sense of the importance of it, my confidence in the measures which you will take to prevent the fatal consequences which are to be feared from any open rupture. The true punishment of the doubtful and timid politics of Prussia will doubtless be best found in the state of insignificance which it will exhibit under the shock of these great events. The triumph of the allied arms will be the best lesson to Prussian neutralists.

"I am happy to see how well Captain Popham's authority has seconded your zeal and ability at Petersburg.

"The Prince of Orange leaves Berlin this evening in order to approach nearer to the Dutch frontier so as to enable himself to profit of the circumstances as they arise; we shall not, as I trust, be distressed by the loss of our Swedish auxiliaries; I do not suspect either them or Prussia of any very profound or vigorous political arrangements.

"I have no news from England except a belief that the combined fleets are in Carthagera, and there is a report, not confirmed, of their having sailed on the 30th ultimo."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 2. Downing Street.—"Je vous écris ces peu de lignes de votre bureau où je suis venu pour m'informer s'il y a des nouvelles du Vice-Amiral Michell. En attendant j'ai reçu ces deux lettres de Mr. Wickham que je vous envoie. Je vois que les choses vont mal en Suisse, mais je ne comprend pas les détails que Wickham n'avait pas le tems de m'expliquer. Je vous supplie donc de me dire quelle était l'entreprise de l'Archiduc, et pourquoi a-t-il échoué.

"Je suis persuadé que ce brave Prince est dans la dépendance absolue de Thugut, et celui-ci veut décidément ruiner la bonne cause. C'est lui qui pendant quatre mois a forcé l'Archiduc de ne pas pousser en avant, ce qui a empêché la ruine absolue de l'armée de Massena, la délivrance de la Suisse, et qui a donné le tems au général Français de recevoir des secours immenses. C'est pourtant dans cet état des choses que Thugut veut que les Autrichiens quittent la Suisse, pour que les Russes soient exterminés. Vous aurez beau vous plaindre à Vienne. C'est inutile, c'est à Petersbourg qu'il faut voir toute la perfidie de Thugut, et si on prouve cette vérité à Paul, il est capable, avec sa chaleur dans les bons principes, d'exiger le renvoi de Thugut. Je vous conjure d'ordonner à my lord Minto, à Wickham, et à Ramsey, d'informer de tout le Chevalier Whitewort, afin que, sans perte de tems, celui-ci puisse agir chez nous. Faites moi le plaisir de me renvoyer les deux incluses, et d'avoir la bonté de m'expliquer ce qui c'est passé dans l'attaque échoué de l'Archiduc."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 2. Teston.—"I am very happy to be able to answer your letter shortly and satisfactorily. All military difficulties are completely overruled, and every step will be instantly taken for the immediate embarkation of the troops, which we hope will take place in the course of Sunday or Monday. There seems every reason to hope that a further force of from eight to eleven thousand men will be assembled at Barham by the 12th of this month, and ready to sail by the first opportunity after that day. The decision being finally taken, I have no doubt it will be acted upon with alacrity, and that we shall now hear no more of difficulties. I had a good deal of conversation in the field yesterday with the Prince of Orange, whose sentiments are exactly what one could wish. I hope you will have settled with him the form of a Declaration in his name, expressing his concurrence in our enterprise, and disclaiming all other plans for his restoration. You will probably agree with me that Abercromby ought to be furnished with such an instrument to be published as soon as he lands, in addition to our own manifesto.

"Does not the present state of things remove all question as to the language to be held at Vienna on the subject of the Netherlands? I am sure we need have no tenderness now about Prussia, who can henceforth be managed only through their fears; and on them, by the help of Russia, we may operate to any extent. We ought, therefore, as it seems to me, to offer to Vienna distinctly the guarantee of the Netherlands at the peace, provided till that time they continue to act in military concert with us and Russia in pushing into France; and I should be inclined also, on the same condition, and provided they also furnish an additional army either to relieve ours in the Netherlands next spring, or act elsewhere, as circumstances may require, to hold out to them the prospect of the subsidy we had before destined to Prussia. The place of the Swedes whom we have lost will, I hope, be much better supplied by an additional division of Russians, which I am glad to find you have applied for. I see you have fixed on an officer for the Netherlands, but, as the business advances, more than one will probably be wanted. O'Connell, who served in the Irish brigade, is, from what I have heard of him, a person likely to undertake such a commission, and to be very useful; but you may easily learn more about him. Windham has also mentioned to me a Captain Jarningham [Jerningham], son of Sir W. Jarningham, and who has himself been in the Austrian service; and a Colonel O'Mahony, who was in the Irish brigade in the French service, who may both, as he thinks, be useful in subordinate capacities. I imagine, however, that no more can be done at present with respect to these or any others than to hold them in readiness; as it would hardly be safe to send them into the country till everything is ripe for general insurrection, and till we can have a force at hand to support it."

Postscript. "I suppose our good ally Paul will want no prompting to assemble, as he certainly ought to do, a threatening army on the Prussian frontier. It may perhaps be more necessary to warn him against an intemperate and precipitate use of it.

"Our military congress is just breaking up, and I am proceeding by sea from Rochester to Walmer, where I shall arrive to-night or early to-morrow morning, and mean to stay till the 12th or 13th, if you think I can decently excuse myself to Monsieur. The question seems merely one of ceremony, as his seeing you will certainly answer every purpose, and you can speak in my name as fully as in your own."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 2. Stowe.—"I received a letter this morning from the Baron de Rolle informing me, by your desire, that the Count D'Artois will be here on Wednesday next, and that he goes to Dropmore on the 9th. This will of course derange your ideas of coming to Stowe or Wotton until he has left you, but I hope and trust that you will remember to redeem your promise, particularly if your expedition sails as soon as we military men understand that it is to move. I am delighted to find in my Hamburg paper the days fixed for the move of the Anglo-Russes to Constance and Schaffhausen, as I fear that the Switzer will not put his confidence in the Austrians, whom he may suppose very capable of retaining some cautionary towns after the French are driven out of them; and I trust I shall be equally delighted in hearing of Captain Popham's Russians and Swedes, though no wind can be more foul for their possible destination than that which is now drowning us from the south-west."

LORD MULGRAVE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 2. Harley Street.—"If I had been aware of your going out of town I should have wished to have seen you, after a very long conversation I had with Starhemberg this morning.

He appeared to me very zealous in the cause, and as open as his situation would admit of; through which I thought I could perceive some strong Austrian objects, particularly a jealousy of the Russians, and an eagerness about the Low Countries, the circumstances and detail of which are too long for writing. Two points, however, appeared to me of importance, and worth mentioning to you; the first was an earnestness that he seemed to feel for my going to Vienna at all events, as if no active and combined efforts could be relied upon unless I should prevail upon Thugut to enter into the plan of concentrated efforts; a principle which he personally seemed to have entirely and cordially adopted. Another point he touched upon as essential, namely, that the two powers should be bound not to make peace but in conjunction and by agreement. To this, as a principle, I had no difficulty of acceding; as I consider it to be the groundwork and foundation of sincere alliance and hearty co-operation. The second important point to which he alluded, or rather urged, was that I should, in case of necessity, have the power of advancing a few thousand pounds to enable the Austrians to act. On this point I told him I had no authority, nor had it ever entered into my contemplation; but I added that, although this was merely the conversation of old friends, and perfectly extra-official between us, I would certainly mention to you what he had said on that head, and take your directions. Upon reading over my instructions this afternoon it occurred to me that, upon the Austrian system of adopting measures which should not hazard nor weaken their army, they would be likely to urge the operations towards Mentz from the very force of our argument against them, on the ground of their not being likely to draw any proportion of the French army to that quarter. This, of course, will be the influencing, and not the ostensible ground of their argument. Whether the application of money to the other line of operation would be likely to turn the balance in its favour or not, you must judge; but an additional instruction will be necessary to give me that power if Mr. Wickham has it not already; and I shall be very happy to see the disposal of money in any other hands than mine. Amongst other things he let out a wish that the disposal and direction of the Russian force should be in the hands of the Court of Vienna, but, as our conversation was private and confidential and not official, I passed that over without seeming to attend to it; as an expression of my sense of the absurdity of the King's subsidiary troops being at the disposal of any power but his Majesty might, by being reported, have interfered with my endeavours to conciliate the two commanders, and guide the operations to the objects which the King has in view. Stahremberg urged very much his opinion of the advantage of employing the Prince de Ligne in the Low Countries, from his popularity there and from his talents; and said he thought I might influence such an appointment at Vienna. I said I had a high opinion of the Prince de Ligne from my acquaintance with him; but that I should think I went very much out of the line of my employment, and should incur the disapprobation of M. Thugut, if I were to begin my acquaintance with pointing out to him the officers he should recommend to the Emperor to employ.

"I think, however, that next year when the King's forces shall be employed elsewhere, the Prince de Ligne would be the most likely person to keep the Brabançons together, and to hold that country against the French. I think Stahremberg candid and zealous in the right way, notwithstanding the points of Austrian policy which he lets out; and I should have been well pleased to have conversed at large with you upon the subject; but I have written a dispatch from London, rather than give you any avoidable trouble. The discretion left to me I shall exercise to the best of my judgment, but I fear nothing will be concluded and resolved without my going to Vienna. The term of Thugut being 'le vrai général' which escaped from Stahremberg, and his earnestness for my going there convinces me of it. This conversation was entirely on the score of old friendship, and therefore must not be officially considered, or brought into discussion with Stahremberg. I was on that account, perhaps, more guarded than I should have been with a mere minister. He was anxious to know whether I should have authority to inform the Arch-Duke of the object of the depending expedition from this country. I told him I had not yet received my instructions, but that I had no scruple of saying I could not propose a plan of operations to the Arch-Duke without entering upon the objects of this expedition. This, I think, is the substance of our conversation. He gave me every information I required about the Arch-Duke, and pointed out the conduct he thought most likely for me to gain his friendship, and obtain an influence over his conduct; and was very urgent that, if I found any little diffidence or jealousy of me in the Arch-Duke, I should rather write about it to him (Stahremberg) that he might do it away, than make a complaint to the Ministers here which might lead to asperity or contention.

"I shall see the Duke of York at eleven to-morrow. I have not yet received the cypher and the papers mentioned in my instructions; if they come to-morrow, I do not see any obstacle to my setting off on Sunday, unless any of the subjects opened in this letter should induce you to desire to see me again."

SIR C. WHITWORTH to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 3. St. Petersburg.—"The messenger Hunter arrived on Wednesday the 31st ultimo with your Lordship's despatches of the 15th, and in order to remove from your Lordship's mind as soon as possible any doubt of the Emperor's consent to adopt the alterations which it has been judged necessary to make in the original plan of operations, I lose not a moment in conveying to your Lordship his Imperial Majesty's entire acquiescence in everything which is now proposed; and orders are actually sent after the first division, should it have left Revel, and it was ready to sail on Friday last, to proceed immediately to Yarmouth Roads, from thence to be employed in any manner which may then be judged expedient.

“The second division will follow to the same place of rendezvous as soon as the English transports already arrived shall be filled, without waiting for those who, for want of vessels, may be detained at Revel till fresh transports shall reach that port from England; so that about 8,000 men may be expected to follow the first division in the course of a week, and soon after the whole body of Russians will be on its way to the place of its destination.

“There exists not the smallest difficulty here respecting the nomination of his Royal Highness the Duke of York to the command of this army; it was always understood and stipulated in the treaty that the senior officer should command the whole; and his Royal Highness was particularly alluded to in this arrangement. The same may be said of the officer commanding the first division, who, being only Major-General, will be of course commanded by Sir Ralph Abercrombie. For the rest, I can only repeat, what I have had the honour so frequently to state to your Lordship, that all plans proposed or adopted by his Imperial Majesty are acknowledged to be subject to such alterations as his Majesty may think expedient, or as the nature of existing circumstances may require. I trust that this will set your Lordship perfectly at ease with respect to this Court. The Emperor has expressed a wish that Captain Popham should be authorised by his Majesty, and by the Commander in Chief, to correspond with me for his Imperial Majesty’s information; and for that purpose that he should keep me fully informed, and as expeditiously as possible, of all circumstances during the progress of the campaign which may be interesting to his Imperial Majesty, and which he may be supposed anxious to learn correctly, and without delay. His Majesty’s sanction to such a correspondence would be very agreeable to the Emperor, if your Lordship should see no inconvenience in it.

“I beg leave to refer your Lordship for every farther particular to my co-operator, whose activity and intelligence cannot be sufficiently commended. I enclose to your Lordship the proposition of his Swedish Majesty, such as it has been communicated by that Court to the Russian Ministers, and by them to me, accompanied by the enclosed letters from Count Rastopsin. Your Lordship will perceive that the ground of the negotiation is entirely changed; from what motives, or with what views, I cannot pretend to determine. The question is now no longer whether His Majesty will consent to take into his pay 8,000 Swedes, for the express purpose of employing them against Holland in the present expedition, as was originally held out; but whether his Majesty is disposed to make any sacrifice for the purpose of gaining the accession of Sweden to the cause, and to subsidise that number of men, to be employed in the first instance in Pomerania, as a demonstration which the Emperor thinks will have the most beneficial effect upon the Courts of Berlin and Denmark. This being a perfectly new consideration, his Majesty will best judge how far it may affect the general cause; it remains for me only to observe that it is a measure which his Imperial Majesty has much at heart, so much so, that I have scarcely ventured to raise any strong objection, although many present themselves to my mind and will doubtless suggest themselves to your Lordship. I have, however, pointed out to Count Rastopsin not only the reluctance which his Majesty would feel, but also the difficulties which would be encountered, before so large a sum could be appropriated for an object totally unconnected with that towards which our present exertions are directed, and one which promises less solid advantages to the cause; particularly as the demand for preparation money so much exceeds the proportion paid to his Imperial Majesty on the same account. In answer to this I was assured that the original demand would be insisted upon if his Swedish Majesty's troops could be in readiness to join those of his Majesty and of the Emperor against Holland; and that as all hopes of their co-operation are given up, the measure now proposed is the only one that remains to bring forward the Swedes at all, and that it is referred to his Majesty's consideration how far that object is desirable at the expense at which it must be purchased. I beg leave therefore to submit this proposal in the shape in which it is now brought forward, candidly acknowledging that I see no other advantage to arise from it but that of acquiescing in the wishes of a faithful and zealous ally.

"Your Lordship will observe that the whole transaction is to be negotiated between the Courts of St. Petersburg and Stockholm, his Majesty appearing no farther in it than as covering the engagements which his Imperial Majesty may contract. It is needless for me to animadvert on this reluctance on the part of his Swedish Majesty to negotiate directly with his Majesty; it is, however, impossible not to lament that, at a moment when it is so highly important that all personal considerations should give way to the public good, such rancour should exist to impede its attainment as is manifested in the conduct of the Court of Stockholm. It has even appeared in the presence of the Russian Ministers whilst we were discussing the business for which we were assembled; the Swedish Minister continually adverting to the subject of the confiscated convoy, in terms too of more rancour than might have been expected on such an occasion. I did not deviate in the smallest degree from the language which I have uniformly held;—the arguments we have to urge are unanswerable, and they remain, of course, unanswered." Copy.

Enclosure.

BARON DE STEDDING, Ambassador from Sweden, to COUNT DE RASTOPSIN.

1799, July 20. St. Petersburg.—"Le roi fera passer en Poméranie sur ses propres bâtiments, et dans le plus court espace de temps qu'il sera possible, 8,500 hommes; y compris 700 hommes de cavalerie, et les canonniers nécessaires pour le service des pièces de campagne.

“Le roi étant décidé de faire les derniers efforts pour contribuer au succès des vues de sa Majesté Impériale, renonce à toute indemnisation des fraix déjà faits, tant pour l’engagement des hommes, que pour leur équipement, armement, et cetera; et se borne à demander, pour rendre ce corps mobile et le transporter en Poméranie, 125 mille livres sterlings payables à l’échange des ratifications.

“Les subsides que l’Angleterre s’est engagée de payer à Sa Majesté Impériale pour les 17 mille hommes destinés à l’expédition de la Hollande, qui sont de 44 mille livres sterlings par mois, sont acceptées par le roi pour les 8,500 hommes; ce qui fait 22 mille livres sterlings par mois, sauf à s’arranger pour l’article des fourages. Le paiement de ces subsides se fera toujours d’avance de trois mois en trois mois, et Sa Majesté le roi de Suède souhaiterait d’avoir une bonne maison de commerce désignée à Hambourg, sur laquelle elle pourrait tirer à l’époque des échéances.

SIR C. WHITWORTH TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 3. St. Petersburg.—“In addition to what I have said in my preceding despatch on the subject of the Swedish proposition, it is necessary, in order if possible to render this transaction less exceptionable, to mention that his Imperial Majesty has assured me in a conversation which I have had with him since it was written, that it is his intention, in any engagement which he may contract with his Swedish Majesty, to have it plainly understood that the corps to be assembled in Pomerania shall be at his Majesty’s disposal as soon as it shall be seen what effect such a demonstration will have upon the Court of Berlin; and march from thence towards Holland or the Low Countries as may be judged most beneficial, provided the Court of Berlin can be induced by any means to acquiesce in such a measure. This I had from his Imperial Majesty himself, and it is obvious that he mentioned it in order to render this measure, to which he attaches the greatest importance, more palatable to his Majesty.

“His Imperial Majesty, at the same time, informed me, upon condition that I should mention it only to your Lordship, that the conduct of the Court of Vienna appeared to him so unaccountable, and so liable to suspicion, that he had by way of precaution already taken every measure for bringing together the whole body of Russian troops, should he find a disposition (which he had some reason to apprehend) in that Court to abandon him and the cause together. I cannot but think this alarm infinitely exaggerated; it is however sufficient to have excited the Emperor’s uneasiness to an extraordinary degree. In such an event the corps in Italy, including that of General Rebindar, amounting at the least to 25,000 men, would be joined immediately to that of General Korsakoff and to that of the Prince de Condé, and the whole, forming an army of 70, or 80,000 men under the command of Marshal Suwarrow, would continue the war in the sole name of the Emperor of Russia without any concert with, or assistance whatever from, the House of Austria. Your Lordship will not suppose from this that such an order of things, which might indeed be considered as a real misfortune, is likely to take place; it is meant only that your Lordship should understand that his Imperial Majesty is prepared for every contingency; and it is determined, let what will be the ultimate decision of the Court of Vienna, to prosecute the war which he has so zealously begun, upon his own account.

"This his Imperial Majesty has done me the honour to impart to me himself this evening at the ball at Peterhoff, on my positive promise to communicate the matter to no one but your Lordship.

"Should the jealousy now conceived against the Court of Vienna be productive of such consequences, it is possible that the execution of his Majesty's views of carrying the war into the interior of France may be considerably facilitated. Some ideas are entertained by the Emperor, on what ground I know not, that this important object, from which such beneficial effects may be fairly expected, does not meet the approbation of the Austrian Cabinet; and that the employing their army either in the siege of Mentz or some other equally tedious operation would be preferred; at all events it most certainly would, according to the notions entertained here, prefer penetrating into the Low Countries with the hope of recovering its former possessions, and thus furnish one more instance of the constant policy of that Court in sacrificing on every occasion the public good to its own interests. Without entering into any minute detail on a subject which is not yet become a matter of discussion, I think I can venture to say that the restoring the Low Countries to the House of Austria would be made to depend on the extent of possessions which it might arrogate to itself in Italy; and should their ideas of aggrandisement, as there is but too much reason to presume, be very extensive on that side, that then it would be deemed good policy to assign a part at last of the Low Countries to the House of Orange. I mention this however entirely as a notion on which I cannot yet speak positively. I can only in general state that the possession of Brabant will depend, as far as this Court has any influence in the decision, on the degree of extension which the Court of Vienna may give to its views in other quarters; and that the disposal of that country in favour of the Stadtholder (in the reinstating of whom in the full extent of his authority, his Imperial Majesty's views coincide perfectly with those of his Majesty), would willingly be acceded to upon a principle of its being necessary to strengthen that Government by extending its territory, and to assign it a strong barrier on the side of Flanders.

“His Imperial Majesty, upon Captain Popham’s taking leave of him yesterday, suggested the possibility of the Court of Copenhagen’s being tempted to resist the passage of his troops through the Sound, and ordered Captain Popham to tell him what he conceived would be necessary to do in such an occurrence. His reply was that such an event could be considered in no other point of view than as a declaration of war, and consequently that it would be expedient to retaliate immediately. The Emperor closed with his idea, and has entrusted Captain Popham with eventual orders to that effect, to be communicated by him to Admiral Hannikoff and General Hermann, should it be found necessary to come to extremities. There cannot exist the smallest possibility of such a determination on the part of Denmark, but it is certainly as well to be prepared at all events; and it may be considered as a mark of confidence in his Imperial Majesty towards Captain Popham, and of that zeal for the cause which leads him to anticipate and to overcome every difficulty.

“Your Lordship will observe in the Swedish proposition that it was intended to include his Swedish Majesty’s contingent to the Empire in the 8,500 men to be sent into Pomerania. This point was however immediately given up.

“I propose setting out for Revel the day after to-morrow, at the Emperor’s particular request, to be present at the embarkation of the second division, and I shall return to Petersburg in the course of seven or eight days. Whatever orders I may receive in the meantime will be forwarded to me there.”

Copy.

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 3. Walmer Castle.—“My letter of yesterday will have shewn you that neither your first or second remonstrance were necessary; and, on arriving here this morning, we find things in great forwardness, and the remaining transports expected, so as I trust to ensure the embarkations beginning on Tuesday, and being completed by Thursday. I do not wonder if, under all the circumstances, counting by minutes you think this tardy; but I really believe there never was more exertion, nor ever any expedition so nearly punctual to its time. It will be some relief to you to see that the language of the Jacobins respecting Holland will not tend to smooth the way for the Prussian negotiation at Paris. I think you may now venture to look at the Downs, which are at this moment as beautiful to the eye as to the imagination, being crowded with transports on which the sun is shining, as if they had already ensured our success.”

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MULGRAVE.

Private.

1799, August 3. Dropmore.—“I have just received your letter. I was perhaps to blame in not having mentioned to you, before you saw Starhemberg, that all conversation with him was à pure perte, except as far as goes to mere civility. Thugut hates his father, and is jealous of him, and keeps him in utter ignorance of all that is done, doing, or to be done : and if one succeeded in interesting him in any of the objects we have in view, his recommendation of it would be much more likely to do harm than good. He will, therefore, have learnt much more in the conversation than he knew before ; and, I am sorry to say, I am by no means convinced of his disposition to make a good use of what he learns, even if he had the power to do so.

“The question of your going to Vienna is a very delicate one, and his judgment is by no means to be trusted upon it. When it was proposed to us to send an officer in your situation, Thugut mentioned that we should send him either to Vienna or to the Archduke’s headquarters. He would obviously have preferred the former, and we had strong reasons to prefer the latter, and therefore took him at his word without further discussion. We have an interest in thwarting that system of directing military operations from Vienna, because it has never been employed but to our disadvantage ; and we were very desirous of engaging, as a party in our measures, the person who is to execute them. We have, besides, a much more advantageous situation with respect to Russia, by treating on this subject at the army, than by discussing it at Vienna. Korsakow is in a manner placed under our orders by those which he has received from Petersburg, and this gives us two voices out of those in the concert. At Vienna the Russian Minister would feel himself quite independent of us, and the present Russian Minister there is completely in Thugut’s hands.

“My wish is, therefore, very strongly that you may not find it necessary to go to Vienna, and I am inclined to think you will not ; but I thought it right not to confine your discretion too much in that respect, because cases may undoubtedly arise that would require it : but you must always remember that by doing so you will incur great risk of disobliging the Arch-Duke : and that the private interests of the latter lead to his pushing this campaign actively, while all Thugut’s jealousy inclines him the other way.

“The question of not making peace but by common consent has been bandied about in all the correspondence between London and Vienna till there is no more to be said upon it. The great objection to such stipulations is that they do bind us because we perform our treaties, and that they do not bind Austria, who broke its engagements with us on this very subject at Campo Fornio, at Leoben, and at Rastadt, or rather at Seltz.

“It belongs however to a more extensive concert than there is yet a prospect of. We may combine our military operations, without having combined our political system ; and perhaps, after all that has passed, the former is the best course to be pursued for attaining the latter ; but if we delay the one till we get the other, Thugut has at once attained his object, if that be delay and inactivity. If, therefore, anything is said to you by the Arch-Duke on that point, I am sure you should put it by as belonging to Lord Minto's mission at Vienna, and by no means to the discussion of a military concert for this campaign.

"The idea of a power of advancing money to them could have been mentioned by Starhemberg only to pump. He knows that it is out of the question. The short fact on that subject is, that he signed a treaty with me here, on the faith of which we advanced them money; after which they refused, and still refuse to ratify his treaty, though they took the money. Fifty dirty tricks have been tried to make us acquiesce in this state of things, and give them more money. We have always refused, and point de ratification point d' argent has been dinned into his ears and Thugut's, till we are tired of repeating it.

"This determination cannot, however, on any account, or by any pretence or subterfuge, be departed from or eluded, and he knows that as well as I do. No power therefore is given to Wickham in this respect. So far from it that, even when authority was given to Craufurd to expend money in raising Swiss troops, he was directed to do so on an express statement that those troops were not to be under the Austrian orders or command, otherwise than as the King might put them so for the moment.

"You certainly judged quite right in not giving him any reason to think that we would interfere in recommending to the Court of Vienna to employ a general of his choice. His only object in this, which he has tried very often before, is to find out whereabouts we are with respect to the Netherlands; and he will certainly write something or other to his Court as a discovery which he has made through you of our intentions in that respect. But as we do not yet quite see our own way through that difficulty, it will not be easy for him to foretell what path we shall follow.

"I wish I could agree with you in thinking him candid. I have known him too long, and have had too much dealing with him to think so: and I rather regret I did not put you more on your guard against him; though I do not see that any harm can arise from what has passed, provided one was sure that he would faithfully report it. But let me intreat you on no account to think of writing anything to him from the army but mere compliment.

"I trust you will receive the cyphers and enclosures to-day, and I am not aware of anything that can make it necessary that we should meet again; though, if you wish it, I am at your orders at half an hour's notice.

"You may easily conceive how delighted I am at this beginning of the Indian war, and at the infinite honour which Mornington must acquire from his able and decisive conduct, which has placed us in such a commanding situation in India."

Postscript. "I am not quite sure that I have enough explained above what I mean as to the Netherlands. It is this. Austria has no right even to enquire, much less to learn what our ultimate designs may be as to her recovering the Netherlands, unless that discussion is included in the extensive consideration of measures and objects for the prosecution and ultimate termination of the war, into which Lord Minto is, by the instructions to him which you have seen, fully empowered to enter.

"Till then it would, perhaps, be premature even to form our own determination on this point; but it would certainly be very much so to let them know it.

"Even if we had resolved (and such I incline to think will ultimately be our resolution) that it is best for us to replace Austria in the possession of those countries, there will be points of much difficulty to arrange with that government as to the mode of its possessing them. We conquered them, and defended them (that is England and Holland did) with our arms and money. We gave them to the German branch of the House of Austria, who had a doubtful title, and no means of enforcing it but by our aid. We gave them on certain conditions, all of which Austria has broken. We were guarantees of the constitutions of those provinces, and had a strong interest, commercial and political, in maintaining them. Austria violated those constitutions and by so doing lost the provinces, and ceded them to France by a definitive treaty of peace, which she had no power to do, without our express consent. We were guarantees of the Barrier treaty, on which the defence of Holland rested; Austria dismantled the barrier, expelled the Dutch troops, and thereby lost Holland to us.

"The mischiefs must, in any case, be guarded against in future. How this may best be done must depend on events which are still uncertain, but it plainly will not be done by replacing Austria in the state in which she stood in 1794, disengaged by her breach of treaty from those engagements which we had required for our safety when we gave the country to her.

"Recent events, and particularly the conduct of Prussia, may make it proper to enter into earlier and fuller explanations on these points than I thought likely four days ago; but, till they are fully explained, we must be cautious not to commit this country either way upon them; and you will see how very cautiously your instructions on this point have, for that reason, been worded." Copy.

LORD MINTO to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 3. Vienna.—"I must begin by wishing your Lordship joy of the surrender of Mantua, with the particulars of which Lord Henley will acquaint you.

"I arrived here on the first instant, and have met with the kindest and most cordial reception from Lord Henley, who affords me every assistance which our common duty can require, or which private friendship can suggest. He presented me to Baron Thugut yesterday, and I delivered copies of my credentials, as is usually done on such occasions. This visit being merely formal, nothing passed which it is necessary to relate; and, indeed, as I cannot present my letters of credence to the Emperor and Empress till Tuesday the 6th, I feel it to be more becoming that I should defer till that is done the commencement of my official correspondence, which it is the less necessary to begin to-day as Lord Henley's dispatch by this messenger will bring the affairs of this Court down to the latest date. I have however thought it necessary, by Lord Henley's desire, to acquaint Lord Mulgrave with the resolution expressed by Baron Thugut not to authorize the Archduke to concert with his Lordship the future operations of the campaign, and with his proposal that Lord Mulgrave should come to Vienna for that purpose. Lord Mulgrave will naturally judge whether it is expedient, or agreeable to the instructions which he bears, to comply with this proposal. A very well-founded diffidence in my own views on military questions, added to the high opinion I entertain of Lord Mulgrave's talents and judgment, would render his assistance on that great branch of the affairs of the present period most acceptable to me, and I shall take the liberty of expressing this sentiment to him. At the same time I should think it likely that he should wait for instructions before he came to Vienna, and I mention this conjecture that your Lordship may take the steps you think proper for expediting those instructions."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 4. Downing Street.—"J'ai reçu votre billet écrit hier, avec les incluses, c'est-à-dire les deux billets que Mr. Wickham m'a envoyé, et la lettre de Kalitcheff, ainssi que celle que Mr. Wickham vous a adressé sur la misérable affaire de l'Archiduc sur l'Aar.

"Je remi cette dernière à Mr. Hamond, en vous remerciant de cette communication.

"J'ai vue celle que vous avez eu la bonté d'écrire à ma prière à Mr. Walpole à Lisbonne en faveur de B——— Mattiz, et j'ai bien reconu toute votre bonté pour moi.

"Il est inutile d'envoyer un cutter, à ce qu'il me semble, car, si c'est pour trouver nos transports à Elsseneur, il ne les trouvera plus là. Ils doivent être déjà entre le Categat et la cote d'Angleterre. Les croiseurs de votre flotte devraient être muni d'ordres de l'Amiral Duncan au notre Amiral Whitchagoff, pour qu'il aille au Texel, et le premier qui le rencontrera lui signifiera ces ordres, qu'il suivra tout de suite.

"Si vous vouliez envoyer votre courrier à Petersbourg par ce cutter, je vous supplie de considérer que nous avons eu constamment des vents de ouest depuis près de six semaines. Ils doivent donc changer, et dès qu'ils se mettent à l'est, ce cutter sera plus d'un mois en route, tandis qu'un courrier ne met que quatorze jours entre Cuxhaven et Petersbourg. Je vous réitère ma prière de défférer l'expédition de votre courier jusqu'après demain, vendredi. J'ai besoin d'écrire à fond à Rastopchin sur les intrigues et l'ambition de l'Autriche.

"Kotchoubei, qui comprend bien les affaires, n'est plus probablement en place; sans crédit malgré ses grands talents et sa probité, il étoit résolu de quitter sa place les premiers jours du moi passé. C'est un malheur d'autant plus grand qu'il voyoit come vous et moi les perfidies Autrichiennes, et avoit l'habilité de les déjouer; mais Rastopchin, quoiqu'il connoit et n'aime pas la politique tortueuse de Thugut, il est trop naïf et ne comprend pas assés les affaires. Il faut donc lui expliquer tout et en grand détail. J'étois venu ici pour lire votre lettre à mylord Minto, mais le Duc d'Yorck m'est fait chercher pour que j'aïlle chez lui. Je viendrai ici demain, et Mr. Hamond me lira ce que vous avez permis qu'il me lise.

"Je ne demande pas mieux, et c'est avec un bien grand plaisir que je viendrai à Dropmore avec ma fille, Mademoiselle Jardine, et mon fils, si cela vous conviens samedi, et nous y resterons jusqu'à lundi matin, car ma fille doit aller mardi aux bains de mere."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 4. Berlin.—"You will easily have seen that in the present state of things your side of the water is more interesting than mine; if there is any truth in the assurances of Haugwiz respecting both the shape and progress of their negociation, we have no great reason to fear that Sandoz will move faster than Abercrombie, and I see that our Prussian Minister would give me to understand that the business will not find much activity or success by the assistance given to it at Berlin. I am daily more and more convinced that my present residence here does much more harm than good in the moment; I scarcely believe that anything can be done with our Prussian politicians under the strange mis-shapen shadow of government which prevails here; but if there is any chance of amending their conduct and measures, it is by fear only that this change can be made, a fear arising from their seeing themselves reduced to the solitary position in Europe which they have so industriously carved out for themselves; a fear that the allied Courts will at last abandon the vain effort of active connection with them, an unquiet fear of the dissatisfaction at Petersburg, but more than all a fear that Great Britain will not give itself to a concert of general arrangement with them, now that they shall have suffered Holland to have been re-established without them.

"Their present only confidence arises from a strong persuasion that, however the United Provinces be recovered from France, Great Britain must still come to Prussia for security and solidity to its re-establishment; and that sentiment is as strongly planted in the mind of Haugwiz as any which can take root there. Now, however true it may be that we do want, or rather that we should prefer to any other, the assistance of Prussia for the security of Holland, it is not perhaps true that we want that assistance more than Prussia herself wants to give it, because without doubt, their frontier is more immediately concerned than ours in securing against France the independence of Holland; if this is so there is no reason why we should be governed by a view of our interest to court them, pay them, or solicit them to do what is felt by them to be as much their own interest as ours. The little and crooked hope of Haugwiz is that we shall eagerly act upon the direct principle of our own interest, and that whatever be the blame which we are intitled to reproach to Prussia, he still thinks that we shall want them so much as to make it necessary for us to come to them cap in hand, although he is almost ready to acknowledge that we should serve them right if we rather came with a good oaken stick in hand; he is however confident that, in spite of all their bad behaviour, present and future, we must come and beg of them to help us to keep Holland. It is for that he now considers me as waiting here, and I do not think it is of little importance to shake this confidence of his, and to shew them that there is a real danger of their being left completely in the lurch by us; at least I feel sure that it is your business to give them enough of this alarm to set the balance even before your general discussions begin. Without this, we shall be placed in the disadvantageous situation of having to court and to crouch to Austria in order to engage them to keep their own Netherlands; and to be in a similar state of dependence upon Prussia, in order to obtain from them that security for Holland which is still more necessary to them, if possible, than to us. I own that I am myself so strongly impressed with this view of the subject, that I should have been tempted to avail myself of the opportunity which their Paris negotiations gave me of asking to accompany Panin in his audience of cong   to the King, and in some respects this would have been useful by very much increasing their fears here. I was restrained from doing so, partly because I thought it would have too much the appearance of sudden ill humour, partly because it would have given to France the appearance of full and undisturbed possession of Prussia, and partly because it was not then easy to determine whether I might not better assist your Orange expedition by remaining here than by moving to any other place.

“This last, which was the main reason, no longer subsists; the Hereditary-Prince of Orange is gone, and I trust will in a few days be on his road to the Hague; and of course his departure from hence has removed the only material point of communication which I could assist. If any wish of his, or any reasonable expectation of advantage to the common cause should seem to demand me with him for a very short time, I could in that shape perhaps give a temporary assistance there before I took my new road back by Helv  tsluys; my absence in that case would here do good for the reasons which I have stated; my presence can do no good, as every reasonable person would now, I think, acknowledge.

"It is only after having satisfied myself completely of the good public grounds on which I should desire to return from Berlin that I allow myself to add any of private and personal consideration; you will, however, confess that I have fairly gone through the business which I had undertaken, and that I have worn to a thread the Berlin negotiation for co-operation against France.

"I think nothing more can be done here now to obtain that object, and you know how distinctly I contracted not to engage in any durable residence, and therefore how unwillingly I should see any new business proposed to me here, now that the business which I had to do is fairly worn through. I am not, as you see, quibbling about words, for I fairly acknowledge that I considered the deliverance of Holland as the object which I had to seek at Berlin; and, one way or other, by your help more than by mine, that will have been accomplished. Whatever remains to do towards the first accomplishment of that great object, I am still ready to do if I can give any assistance to it; but I trust that you will understand me well concerning it, and feel with me that no point of duty or obligation on public grounds can demand from me more than to give myself to such risk or such trouble as really belongs to the first act of the Deliverance of Holland; to that I will freely and heartily give, in every possible shape, the best assistance that I can, if there seems any shape in which I can be useful; but that once done, I must fairly say that I think I have worked my passage back to England, and to you, and must send my sommation to you not to engage me in any new discussions in Prussia or in Holland. My limit here is providentially marked, for the master of the house in which I write comes into it on the 1st of September, and no human consideration could induce me to look out for another when I have outlived this. I have written, as you see, in the same sense with you to Lord Minto and to Whitworth; it is by Stamford that I hope to learn something of the Landgrave of Hesse Cassell, at his return here from Brunswick. Eh viva Abercrombie."

Postscript. "I add one line of postscript to tell you that I am just now informed of Haugwiz having said to the Austrian Chargé d' Affaires here that, as he observed the Court of Vienna was looking for a more sure frontier, and as Mr. Pitt had announced the intention of some indemnities for England, he should think Prussia would likewise require a more sufficient frontier against France. If they have this object, the next thing to know is whether they will negotiate it with France, or state it to us as the condition of their defence of Holland; but I cannot yet believe they will venture to stand out about the Netherlands, if Great Britain and Russia pronounce themselves decidedly upon that subject. Mantua has offered to surrender upon terms which are sent to Vienna, but will probably be refused, because they think it cannot long hold out. A person just arrived from Prague assures positively that the Russian corps does not exceed 33,000 men, and that they cannot be at Schaffhausen before the 20th instant."

LORD MULGRAVE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 4. Harley Street.—“I cannot regret having had the conversation with Starhemberg, as it has been the occasion of my receiving your letter, which came last night after I was in bed; and the more especially as I cannot, upon my best recollection, recall anything said by me that could be perverted to any purpose whatever at Vienna. You are already acquainted with the substance of the few answers given by me; the conversation was mostly on his part. I told him that I had not received my instructions, and was only generally acquainted with the object of my mission; namely to concert measures when I should arrive on the spot. You might be very well assured that I should enter into no confidential correspondence with him, but under your directions; and I mentioned his proposal to you (not knowing your opinion of him, or his situation with respect to his own Court,) upon the possibility of your being able to make use of him to clear away difficulties that might not be proper matter of official representation. However, in the light in which you have discovered him to me, that is out of the question. One of my reasons for thinking him candid and even indiscreet was his having stated fully to me the circumstances of the pecuniary transaction you allude to, with the highest praises of Pitt’s bold and liberal conduct on that occasion, and, at the same time, with expressions such as you would have used of the failure on the part of Thugut, after having authorised him (Starhemberg) in repeated letters to sign. His attempt to pump out upon these grounds whether money would be advanced after having discussed the subject with you, appears rather weak; as I could only do what I did, assure him that I would mention to you what he had proposed.

“I am particularly happy to have my mission confined as much as possible to military concert, and that with the Arch-Duke. I have no stomach for the journey to Vienna, because the objects of the different operations proposed by the King and by that Court are so obvious, according to my conception of them, that I do not think they can be disguised by any military arguments; and the adoption of one or the other will depend in a great measure upon the extent of the influence which his Majesty and his allies have over the conduct of the Court of Vienna. Lest I should have misconceived the real state of the case, I will explain my apprehension of it, which I did not think necessary before, conceiving that I had only to state to you the best military arguments I could collect for the adoption of the King’s plan of operations, and such as I should propose to make use of to the Arch-Duke. The result of the adoption of one or other of the proposed plans, I conceive to be as follows.

“If the Arch-Duke agrees to support the attack upon Lyons by besieging Huningue, Belfort, and Besançon, he employs his army to the great object of the common cause, and Austria rests satisfied with her Italian acquisitions by this campaign ; Great Britain, by the operation of the Duke of York's army, holding in her hands and at her disposal Holland and the Low Countries ; the French remaining in possession of both banks of the Rhine from Brisach, with the power of again invading Germany, in the event of the operation on the frontiers of Franche Comté being unsuccessful ; this, in the supposition that Prussia does not come forward. In case a Prussian army should march for the reduction of Mayence and Elhrinbreitstien (Holland and the Low Countries being disposed of as above) the northern part of Germany would remain in the possession and under the protection of Prussia, and Austria would thereby see the Low Countries and a great part of the Empire in the hands of the powers of which she appears to be equally jealous. On the other hand, should the last proposal of Thugut, that the Arch-Duke should march against Mayence, be adopted, it is equally obvious to me that His Royal Highness would afford no assistance thereby either to the Russians under Suwarrow, or to the Duke of York ; but would possess himself (without risk to his own army, or any opposition but that of the garrison) of that fortress ; and perhaps of Luxembourg also ; and by approaching the Low Countries might have an opportunity of stirring up Austrian partisans in that country to demand the restoration of the Emperor to his territories there, in the same manner as the Kings of Naples and Sardinia have been restored to their dominions. If this should succeed, the operations of the Duke of York's army in the Low Countries will have been purely Austrian ; whilst the Russian forces in his Majesty's pay will have been only employed to cover the Arch-Duke's operations, by keeping the French in check upon the southern frontiers, and at the same time to guard and secure the acquisition of the Austrians in Italy. Whether the measure of endeavouring to get the Emperor proclaimed in the Low Countries is one that could be undertaken with a prospect of success ; whether it would be so plausible, under all the existing circumstances, as to make it difficult to resist or elude the execution of it, are political questions which I have no business to discuss ; but they are so involved in the negotiation of military operations that it is impossible entirely to omit the mention of them, whilst I am stating to you the objects which occur to me as likely to influence a resistance on each side to the measures proposed by the other. Considering, as I do, the balance of advantage and the weight of influence at the close of the campaign to depend so considerably (if not entirely) upon the adoption of one or other of the measures to be discussed at the Arch-Duke's head-quarters, I should very reluctantly agree to the march of the Arch-Duke's army to Mayence after the deliverance of Switzerland, as the Russians would thereby be, of necessity, put on the defensive. The weakness of the Arch-Duke's army will not, in fact, be an obstacle, nor, even in argument, a prevailing objection to that measure, for the reasons already mentioned.

"I state all these circumstances thus urgently to you that you may be aware of the difficulties I am likely to meet with if the Arch-Duke should not have the power to determine, and act at once upon consultations to be held at his head-quarters. I am informed by Starhemberg (for what purpose if not sincerely I cannot guess) that, 'excepting his courage, and his coup d'œil militaire, I am not likely to think the talents of the Arch-Duke equal to his reputation, but that by endeavouring to gain his friendship and goodwill, he will be easily disposed to concur with me in the measures that may be proposed, if he has authority to act'; and then followed his proposal of going to Vienna. I have recurred again to Starhemberg from a wish to put you in possession, as much as possible, of everything that passed; as you appear by your letter to be under some uneasiness lest any mischief should arise from that conversation. I hope, however, that you will find that no harm has been done, and that I have not compromised either you or myself, as yet at least.

"I shall, of course, take Mr. Wickham's opinion of the Archduke's character, and be guided by that, till I have an opportunity of forming my own. If the Archduke should say that he has no authority to act upon the result of our consultation, but must write to Vienna, do you wish I should go thither in case the Archduke should concur with me in the plan of operations I am directed to propose? You have already instructed me to endeavour to procure an order from Vienna for the execution of it, in case I should find the Archduke disposed rather to adopt the plan of marching against Mayence.

"I have not yet received the cipher or my passport; I do not know whether it will be necessary to name Captain Foster in it as my aide-de-camp, or whether la suite will be sufficient for him. Not any of the other papers mentioned in my instructions are sent to me; I only wait for them to set off.

"I felt much gratified, though not at all surprised, at the wise and vigorous measures of Mornington's government; I trust and hope they will lead to our entire relief from the turbulence and dangerous power of Tippoo in India. Mornington has shown great kindness to a person in India with whom I am nearly connected; I beg you will have the goodness to send him my thanks which I enclose, when you have an opportunity of sending letters to him. I write in great haste that I may receive your answer to-night or early to-morrow morning, particularly on the point of my journey to Vienna."

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 5. Dropmore.—"I send you a list I have received from the Bishop of St. Pol of royalists in the prisons, whom he wishes us to send to France. As we shall probably have to maintain them now if they remain where they are, I conceive there would be no objection to release them provided means could be found of being certain of sending them back to France. If you see no reason to be of a different opinion, and will send the necessary orders to Huskisson, I will instruct Frere to settle with him and Woodford the means of doing this." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MULGRAVE.

1799, August 5. Dropmore.—“I found your letter here last night on my return from Windsor. I think your view of the result of the two different plans a very just one, and it certainly leads to our urging in the strongest manner the adoption of that which we have proposed. The best argument to be used for that purpose seems to me to be the evident insufficiency of Thugut's plan to the main object, to which every rational man must look for the termination of the war, and the security of Europe. The Austrians themselves must feel that whatever may be the terms on which they must conclude a peace with the Directory, that peace can only be an armed truce; and that Europe can never be really restored to tranquility but by the restoration of monarchy in France. Now the operation against Mayence has no tendency to produce that restoration, whereas the success of that against Lyons affords the best hope for it.

“But it may, I think, be questioned whether the operation against Mayence be one which, in the present state of the Austrian army, it would be safe to undertake. If it be (as I fear it is) certain that, without a very powerful co-operation to the southward, the Russians cannot advance into France after the Archduke is withdrawn to Mayence, the Directory will, after a certain time, find themselves at their ease on that subject; and would, in that case, either move directly to the attack of the besieging army, or would, more probably, make so powerful an attack across the Upper Rhine as would oblige the Archduke to divide his force in such a manner as to render it weak in every point, and by no means equal to the siege of such a place as Mayence. And the result would be, what we have so often seen in the course of this war from divided operations, that neither would succeed.

“Certainly a great deal of this difficulty will be removed if we can come to a satisfactory understanding with Vienna about the Netherlands, which seems every hour to grow more and more probable.

“When you are at headquarters you will, of course, learn from Lord Minto what impression the representations he has already made on this subject have produced; and your going to Vienna must be in some degree regulated by that. If the Archduke is himself adverse to our plan, there remains nothing but to push it at Vienna by every possible exertion; but, if he accedes to it, or professes indifference, or ignorance of the views of his Court, and Thugut hesitates or refuses, the question of delicacy arises. I should, in that case, incline to think that more may be done by your remaining with the armies to urge it there, and trusting to Lord Minto's exertions to press it at Vienna, than by your going to assist in this task at Vienna, leaving it to the chance of some intrigue to spring up in your absence at the army.

“This is, however, a point on which it is really impossible to speak with precision beforehand. Supposing the Archduke strongly impressed with the plan and eager for it, he may urge your journey to Vienna in a way very difficult for you to resist. Other motives, which it would be too long to enumerate, may lead to the same decision. Lord Minto who, I believe, would speak quite candidly on such a point, may himself desire it of you; and, on the whole, I have no doubt of your making a right decision upon it according to the circumstances of the moment; though I wish you to bear in your mind the reasons which I have mentioned to you for my wishing that the course of the business may be found such as to admit of the arranging it at headquarters, rather than at Vienna.

“I hope there will be no more delay in your having your papers. I have written again about it, but if there is any fresh difficulty, have the goodness to see Frere, whom I have directed to do everything that is necessary.” Copy.

THE HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, August 5. Lingén.—“Conformément à ce que je vous ai marqué dans ma dernière, je suis parti de Berlin le 29 du mois passé, pour me rendre à Lingén, où je suis arrivé avant hier au soir. À mon passage à Brunswic, où j’ai passé quelques momens avec le Duc, j’ai eu occasion de me convaincre que la tournure que les négociations avec les Cours de Petersbourg et de Londres avoient prise l’avoient profondément affligé, et qu’il étoit pénétré de tout ce que cette conduite renfermoit de peu honorable pour la monarchie Prussienne. Ce que le duc m’a dit à ce sujet m’a persuadé entièrement qu’il n’a eu aucune part directe à la détermination du Roi, et qu’il regrette vivement de voir ce monarque adopter un système qui ne peut qu’affaiblir la gloire et l’influence dont la Prusse est en droit de jouir. Les informations qu’on m’a données à mon arrivée ici relativement à l’intérieur de la République continuent à peindre les dispositions des habitans comme très bonnes, et n’indiquent pas que le Gouvernement fasse de grands efforts pour opposer de la résistance aux troubles qui pourront éclater à l’approche d’une force ennemie. Il y a eu dans la nuit du premier au second de ce mois quelques mouvemens dans la province du Groningue, mais de peu de conséquence, et qui n’ont point eu de suite. Je n’ai point encore reçu de nouvelles de M. Van de Spiegel, mais à mon arrivée ici, l’on m’a assuré qu’il avoit été atteint, il y a 3 ou 4 semaines, d’une attaque d’apoplexie; j’ai tout lieu de croire cependant que c’est un faux bruit, personne n’ayant rien appris d’ultérieur à son sujet.

“J’ai trouvé ici M. de Suyderas; M. de Rhoon, et son frère M. Charles Bentinck, y sont arrivés hier; ces messieurs repartent probablement demain pour Varel.”

MEMOIRE SUR L'INSURRECTION DU BRABANT.

“On a pour la Campère un chef établi à Lommel, dans la mairie de Bois le Duc, appelé Klerke, qui dit pouvoir disposer de 4,000 hommes, et, avec le tems, de beaucoup d'avantage. Il y a l'espoir assuré de sa part d'avoir 7,000 fusils à raison de 6 florins d'Hollande par pièce, autant de poudre qu'il voudra à raison de 30 sols d'Hollande la livre, une imprimerie à raison de 1,000 florins.

“On demande pour chaque recrue 1 couronne de Brabant; pour paye du fantassin 1 escalin de Brabant, pour le cavalier 1½ escalin de Brabant par jour; les bas officiers payés comme en Hollande.

“M. Martens s'engage d'insurger le Brabant. Les Brabançons, Flamands, ne se lèveront en masse que quand ils se verront soutenus par des troupes étrangères, dont le nombre soit respectable, et qui apportent du canon, des obus, des munitions, 40,000 fusils.

“On a près de Bruges un camp de 6,000 Francois; sur la côte de Flandre, y compris ce camp, 8 à 9,000 hommes, pour la plupart conscrits.

“A Lille 700 hommes, à Bergen-op-Zoom 150. D'après les renseignements, on donnera un plan pour surprendre cette ville dès qu'on aura des détails plus circonstanciés et avérés.

“On a établi une correspondance avec ceux de Flandre, au moyen de quoi on sera instruit exactement de l'état des choses dans cette partie-là, et des forces Françaises sur la côte.

“On s'est dit assuré des villes de Louvain, Malines, et Bruxelles; dans Malines il n'y a que 6 ou 7 pièces de canon.

“On a envoyé le long de la côte de Flandre, depuis Bruges jusques dans Lille, un arpenteur, ancien militaire qui a travaillé aux cartes de ferrari; et qui donnera un rapport détaillé de tout ce qu'il y aura d'intéressant.

“On manque de pain dans le Belgique, mais on pourra en acheter dans le Lang Straat. On ne doit pas se fier à la ville de Gand.

“Le Gouvernement provisoire de ce pays, durant l'insurrection, devrait consister dans le magistrat des villes sans le commandant militaire. Mais tout ce qu'on fera provisionnellement. Le point de Blankenberg est le plus favorable à une descente pour les Anglois; on a en Angleterre un pilote très habile—on se fait fort d'en fournir un autre, si la flotte Angloise de débarquement avait besoin.

“On ne peut pas se flatter d'obtenir des succès dans l'entreprise d'insurger ce pays efficacement sans une somme d'argent proportionnée aux besoins. On croit qu'il faudrait pour commencer 400,000 à 500,000 florins pour la Campère et le Brabant. On demande dans ce cas un homme chargé du poste de commissaire ordonnateur, ceux qui se chargeront de la partie militaire ne pouvant pas prendre cette comptabilité sur eux.

“ Il sera très nécessaire de donner aux troupes qui doivent soutenir l'insurrection du Brabant, les ordres les plus rigoureux pour observer une bonne discipline et respecter les propriétés.

“ Il sera nécessaire pour contenir la populace d'Anvers d'y envoyer un régiment d'infanterie et un détachement de cavalerie capables d'y maintenir la tranquillité. Objet qui ne peut être rempli que par un commandant sage et ferme; et qui agisse de concert avec les membres les plus marquants de l'ancien magistrat; on devra s'emparer tout de suite de la citadelle.

“ Il faudra commencer par y rétablir le culte public dans toute sa splendeur, comme dans toute la Belgique; en observant la précaution de faire consacrer le local et la cérémonie, et sans rien négliger sur ce point très important. Il faut pour l'insurrection un chef militaire pleinement autorisé, sans quoi les chefs partiels ne pouvaient pas agir de concert.”

Nota bene 1. “ On sent la nécessité absolue de garder un secret religieux sur le nom des personnes ci-dessus nommées, qui seraient perdus si on les soupçonnoit seulement.

Nota bene 2. “ On est convenu depuis quelques semaines avec les chefs des insurgés, qu'ils ne donneront aucune ouverture de leurs affaires qu'à ceux qui seront muni de la marque convenue avec M. d'Yvoy.

Nota bene 3. “ Les Francois envoient vers la Flandres tous les prisonniers relâchés sur la parole de ne plus servir, et faits en Italie.”

WILLIAM HUSKISSON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 5. Downing Street.—“ Mr. Huskisson will have the honour of forwarding to your Lordship to-morrow the additional instructions to Sir Ralph Abercromby founded on Mr. Dundas's letter, and also those to Colonel Malcolm, both of which have been signed by Mr. Dundas, and are now delivered to the respective parties. Colonel Malcolm proceeds to-morrow to Yarmouth, on his way to Emerick. With respect to Rottier Mr. H[uskisson] has this day sent him down to Walmer with a letter explaining his connection with Starhemberg, and cautioning Mr. Dundas accordingly. Sir Ralph will get what information he can from him, and either take him with him or not as he may think proper.

“ Mr. Rottier is not apprised of Colonel Malcolm's mission.”

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 6. Canterbury.—“ At the same time you receive this, you will get a letter from me to Huskisson conveying to you information of the precise state in which we now stand regarding our expedition. The battery of Goree secured, of which no doubts are entertained, and the Dutch ships removed from a situation to annoy or rather prevent the landing at the only practicable place, I entertain no apprehensions of our ultimate success; but unless these preliminary points are secured, with every disposition I have to be sanguine, I cannot bring myself to be confident. As, after all, unsurmountable difficulties may arise to prevent success, I don't think it right that Sir Ralph Abercrombie should sail without provisional instructions founded upon that supposition; and it appears to me that Walcheren and Ameland ought to be the most immediate objects, and the Texel the next. Let me, however, hear from you upon this subject; and unless you will come yourself, I wish you would commit all your ideas to Huskisson, who would bring them down to Mr. Pitt and me, and we would do, after consideration of the whole, what we think best."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, August 6. Dropmore.—"If it had not been for the two lines of postscript which I wrote you by the last mail, I imagine you would have been as much disappointed and mortified at receiving my letter of that date, as I was when I wrote it.

"As it is, everything is going on, I am assured, with activity and dispatch, and the embarkation is to begin to-day. It will not, I trust, be deranged by the account received yesterday by the Triton of the combined fleet (40 sail of line) having sailed from Cadiz the 20th, while Lord Keith was still, as we fear, staring about him off Mahon. His conduct seems perfectly unaccountable, but whether he has done right or wrong the mischief is done.

"I suppose Ireland to be the object—probably Brest in the first instance—or perhaps they will only go to Rochefort to release the Spanish ships there, or to take on board the 4 or 5,000 troops. Still, without a more considerable force in troops, they can do us no essential mischief, though, to be sure, they will alarm and distress us a little before our tardy fleet can arrive from the southward.

"I trust however that this will not alter one iota of our measures for the expedition. The Admiralty are, as I understand, collecting a fleet in Torbay; and if it should be necessary for that purpose to weaken Lord Duncan I should not think that much harm was done, for I have no fear of the Dutch fleet at such a moment. The execution of V[an] B[raam]'s promises would be invaluable just now, but I do not think they can be much relied on.

"I believe you are too candid towards your friend Haugwitz when you suppose the proposal to have been made to them through Sandoz. I am confident it originated at Berlin, and our accounts of language held by the Elector of Bavaria after his conference seem to prove it to be so.

"I take it for granted that you will see in this circumstance ground enough for not immediately signing a treaty on the footing which was before in question, supposing that Haugwitz should, as is by no means improbable, have alarmed himself or his master with the fear of Russian hostility, and should have come back on the 24th to cry peccavi. It seems quite necessary to make them feel their own isolement a little, though certainly without the smallest idea on our part of breaking with them, or using anything like hostile conduct or menaces. But as the main argument which our adversaries at Berlin have always used against us is the certainty that, let Prussia use us ever so ill, our money will always be at her disposal whenever she will take it, there seems much advantage in proving to them the contrary, now that we are strong enough to do so."

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 6. Berlin.—"It is unnecessary for me to pursue that part of your letter of 30th ultimo which I have just received, in which you speak of our Prussian negotiation, because you will already have known that it has vanished into idle air; and with respect to the Berlin hopes of concert with us for the future preservation of Holland, although I certainly think that Prussia can furnish to us the most effectual assistance upon this point, yet you will see in all that I have lately written how strongly I am impressed with a sense of the necessity of setting them at defiance upon this subject, in order to bring them down to a more just sense of their own isolated situation, and to shew to them that, if we treat with them about Holland, it must be as upon a point as near to their interests as our own, and not as for a grace and favour which we are to purchase by new objects of advantage to them. My former letters will likewise, in great degree, furnish already to you my notions respecting your new wish to see me linger somewhat longer on my return home, and give myself to somewhat more than a mere passage from Berlin to Helvoetsluys. All that can fairly belong to the great object of the deliverance of Holland, I think myself bound by duty not to shrink from, and even without direct authority to do so, you will see that I had already determined to act upon that principle; do not therefore imagine that I can hesitate to do anything which can fairly be considered as a part of this great and important object, nor even that I desire the grace of making any ostentatious sacrifice of my own ease and comfort in doing so. I should be ashamed to think that I did not better know my duty than to express any doubt as to performing any such service which could be asked or expected from me. On the other hand, as I cannot feel any public obligation upon me beyond the purpose of this urgent and important object, when that is accomplished, I must fairly say that no motive can induce me to give myself to the situation of being English Minister at the Hague, or at any other place in any of the four quarters of the globe. While we are fighting this battle which to the whole European world sets all at stake, I am ready to carry either a conference or a musket whenever I can with best effect fire either of them off; but as it is impossible for anybody personally to dislike this diplomatic duty so much as I do, I never can feel any obligation to pursue it beyond the pressure of this critical period.

"You know me too well to suspect that in this language I am courting solicitation from government which, God knows, there is so little motive for me to seek or them to give; but I speak fairly and plainly in order that you may be sure not to mistake me, and that you may know that whenever an English ambassador can sit down peaceably at the Hague, I am not that man. Dixi."

"It seems to me that some effect will be likely to be produced here by my going away, because it will shake Haugwiz's confidence in my waiting to treat with him; yet till Abercrombie opens a way from Goree, or Holland itself opens me a way, I do not well see my road there; perhaps, however, it may be found, and when it is I will not miss it."

LORD MULGRAVE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 6. Harley Street.—"I have just received your letter. At twelve o'clock last night Mr. Frere sent me letters for the Archduke, Marshal Suwarrow, and General Korsakow, the fair copy of my instructions, and a parcel of messenger's certificates; but I have not yet got the cipher, or the copy of the dispatch by which his Majesty's officers residing with the armies are placed under my orders, or my passport. I will call upon Mr. Frere this morning, and if I can procure those papers I shall set off in the evening.

"In your letter of the 3rd instant you refer me to Lord Minto's instructions. As I only read them over once, previous to any discussion of the detail of my mission, I have no distinct idea whatever of their contents; if they should be in any respect essential for my guidance, it will be necessary that you shall send a copy after me; if not, I shall confine myself strictly within the limits of my instructions."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE:

August 6. London.—"Mr. Hammond delivered to me this morning in your Lordship's name a paper respecting the conduct of your generals in Holland, which appears to me to be perfectly wise and just. I should wish to know whether you would have any objection to my communicating it to the Prince and Princess. I don't see any myself, but I would not let it go out of my hands without your consent, and shall not show it till I hear from you.

"M. de Heerdt has just now left me, and sets off to-morrow morning early. He is much pleased with his commission, and will do, I think, extremely well.

"I send you a bulletin from Emerick. I wrote to M. d'Yvoy respecting Colonel Malcolm's mission as you had desired me."

Postscript. "I hope you have been satisfied with the Prince of Orange's visit.

"Since writing this Mr. Hammond has informed me of your intention with respect to the brouillon of the despatch to Sir Ralph Abercromby. I shall therefore wait to communicate it to the Prince till I receive it in its complete state. I thought I might as well send this note to your Lordship as destroy it."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 7. London.—“I am very much pleased with the idea of sending to the Hague the sort of summons contained in the paper which Mr. Hammond shewed me this morning by your desire. It can do no harm and will in all probability do much good. It strikes me that the hint M. d'Yvoy gives on that subject agrees with a passage in a letter from one of my brothers, of which I communicated an extract to you a few days ago. As to the terms of the message I have no remark whatever to make. M. de Heerdt is, I suppose, by this time with Sir R. Abercromby.”

Postscript. “I see by the French papers that the rulers in Holland begin to grow evidently uneasy.”

The EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 7. Downing Street.—“The account of Duke Hamilton's death having reached London, I beg leave to remind your Lordship of the application I have had the honour of making to succeed to the green ribbon which is vacated by this event. The very kind manner in which you attended to this wish, when I mentioned it to you, encourages me to hope for your protection and good offices on the present occasion. And I flatter myself that you will be of opinion that, if I had the good fortune of receiving this mark of distinction at this time, it would be a very suitable decoration in the ceremonious representations which I am to make on entering upon my present embassy.

“Lord Spencer will not allow the Phæton to sail till further accounts arrive of the grand fleets. And this delay will afford time for his Majesty's decision in regard to this ribbon, in case your Lordship would have the goodness of recommending me now for the vacancy.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 7. Berlin.—“I cannot forward to you the important communication from Dresden of the surrender of Mantua, without congratulating you most heartily upon it. With Turin, Alexandria and Mantua, the success in Italy has acquired a consistency which in that quarter sets at defiance all future chances for this campaign, and, I hope, for more than this campaign. It is very probable that you may have a Vienna courier specially charged with this news, but I like to provide against all accidents, and therefore, at all events, I hurry on from Berlin by estafette what I have just received by estafette from Dresden.

“By the same channel you will find it confirmed that on the 11th at Madrid nothing was known except an Alicant letter which announced the sailing of the combined fleets from Carthage, but does not give much alarm of their having passed the Straights.

"I have received a letter from Mr. Darell to desire application to be made to the Prussian Government for permission to purchase oats from East Friesland, the exportation of which is now forbidden; I have sent for answer that immediate application will be made by Mr. Garlike, and the result will be communicated to Mr. Darell. Mr. B. Watson would do well to buy his oats under the Imperial protection which I have already hinted to you; for there he would be sure of the assistance which is to be solicited here.

"We have wind and rain and storms, but we have Alexandria and Mantua."

LORD GRENVILLE TO LORD MULGRAVE.

1799, August 7. Downing Street.—"His Majesty having been pleased to charge your Lordship with a special mission for the purpose of concerting the military operations to be carried on for the further prosecution of the war against the common enemy, I have the honour to enclose to your Lordship letters for his Royal Highness the Archduke Charles, for Marshal Suwarrow, and for General Korsakof, in which the object of your mission is described, and those generals are apprized that full credit is to be given to whatever you shall say or conclude on his Majesty's part.

"Your Lordship will in the first instance proceed to the headquarters of his Royal Highness the Archduke. As your Lordship's mission has been determined upon in consequence of a proposal from the Austrian Government, and has been notified at Vienna, it is hoped that you will find his Royal Highness sufficiently instructed and empowered to enter with you into the discussion of matters to be arranged; and even if that should not be the case, it will still be proper that you should express a desire to enter upon this discussion, provisionally, with the person who is to be charged with so principal a share in the execution of whatever may be settled, either there or at Vienna. The knowledge which both Mr. Wickham and Lieutenant-Colonel Craufurd possess of the character of the different persons in his Royal Highness's confidence, will be of great use to you on this occasion.

"The subsidized Russian force of 45,000 men in his Majesty's pay is by this time probably arrived on the Swiss frontier, or in its neighbourhood. The dispositions which the Emperor of Russia has manifested for the common cause, and the instructions with which he has charged General Korsakoff are such as leave little doubt that this officer will be found perfectly ready to co-operate with your Lordship in everything which may promote his Majesty's views for the success of the war.

"It is, however, now agreed between his Majesty and the two Imperial Courts that, when the French shall have been expelled from Italy, an event which the recent successes there seem to place at no great distance, the whole of the Russian troops should be placed under the command of Field Marshal Suwarrow.

"It must therefore be left to your Lordship's discretion to judge whether the execution of his Majesty's commands will best be promoted by your remaining at the Archduke's headquarters, and corresponding from thence with his Majesty's officers stationed with the other armies who are, as your Lordship will observe by the enclosed copy of a dispatch to each of them, placed under your Lordship's orders, or whether you should occasionally repair to the headquarters of those armies, or even to Vienna. In that case Lord Minto will present you to M. de Thugut, as charged by his Majesty with the discussion and arrangement of the business in question. He will, I am certain, heartily co-operate in everything which can contribute to its success, and he will be instructed, with that view, to communicate to your Lordship unreservedly the state of the political negotiations in which his Majesty may at that time be engaged at Vienna.

"In your way to the Archduke's headquarters your Lordship will pass through Berlin, where Mr. Grenville will, in like manner, be instructed to communicate with you.

"As the object of your Lordship's mission is to concert the future military operations in the direction of which his Majesty is so much concerned from his having at his disposal, by virtue of the treaty of subsidy, the whole of the Russian force now under General Korsakow, it may be proper that I should begin the instructions which his Majesty has commanded to be given for the regulation of your Lordship's conduct in that discussion, by an enumeration of the force which, as it is supposed, may now be applicable to those operations.

"The Archduke's army, including Bellegarde's, which however has always been detached from it, and is now in Italy, was at the opening of the campaign stated at 100,000 men.

"The Italian army did not probably much exceed 60 or 70,000, exclusive of Rosenberg's corps of Russians which were called 22,000.

"Rhebinder's corps of Russians, which is on its march to Italy, is called 12,000, but by the last accounts from Vienna and Petersburg it appears that this corps is to march to Naples. It is not therefore to be reckoned upon in this enumeration, though some use may possibly hereafter be made of it, particularly by embarking it on board the British fleet if any operation should be directed against the south of France.

"Korsakow's corps, now on its march to Switzerland, is called 45,000 men, and Colonel Ramsay, who has seen a part of these troops, expresses himself highly satisfied with their quality and composition. His account, however, and those received from different quarters, give room to expect a considerable deficiency in these numbers, but proper instructions will be given to Sir Charles Whitworth and Colonel Ramsay to ascertain this point with precision.

"Colonel Craufurd had not, by the last account, made any considerable progress in the levy of Swiss troops. His instructions would go to raising 20,000 men, and as there is now great reason to hope that the Court of Vienna will be induced to adopt a proper line of policy respecting the internal settlement of that country, and especially as that point will now, in great degree, be left to be arranged by the Russian army, and in conformity to Mr. Wickham's suggestions, it may not be difficult to raise as many as 10 or 15,000 men; though even then a fresh embarrassment will arise as to their being induced to serve out of their own country.

"A body of 6,000 Wirtemberg troops has been offered to the King, and there is little doubt that the conditions of service which the King has required will be complied with by the Duke.

"It is also positively stated by the last accounts that the Elector of Bavaria is to join his troops to the Austrian or Russian army; but this article is still too uncertain to be reckoned upon with confidence.

"Without taking this into account, it seems safe to consider—

1. "The Austrian army in Italy at 50,000 men, capable of being augmented by Piedmontese and other Italian troops to nearly twice that amount, if it were necessary to incur that expense.

2. "The Russian force, exclusive of Rhebinder's corps, if all united, and if reinforced by the Swiss and Wirtembergers, at 70,000 men. (Thus: Korsakow, 40,000; Rosenberg, 15,000; Wirtemberg, 5,000; Swiss, 10,000=70,000).

3. "The Archduke's army at 60,000 men; this calculation appears, however, to be put rather too high. In his conversations with Mr. Wickham, the Archduke assured that gentleman that Massena had at least 20,000 more infantry than he had; and Mr. Wickham does not put Massena's at more than from 50 to 60,000 men; probably therefore the Archduke's superiority in cavalry, and even the reinforcements of 13,000 men which he has since received under General Haddick, will not carry his army up to 60,000 men; and he may still have to incur the risks of at least one battle before the enemy is driven out of Switzerland.

"The British force, which his Majesty has been pleased to direct to be now assembled, amounts to 12,000 men; to this will be added a second division of infantry probably of equal force, and a body of cavalry of 6,000 men; or even more will be sent as occasion shall require. The Emperor of Russia has engaged himself to furnish 18,000 men for the same object, of which number 10,000 were to embark at Revel on the 26th of July.

"This force may be confidently taken as sufficient to ensure the recovery of Holland, provided that the French are so occupied in other quarters as to prevent their marching a very large army to the support of the present government in the United Provinces. His Majesty's expectations of success in this enterprise do not, therefore, depend on the co-operation of Prussia, though he has at different periods had reason to expect it.

"The dispositions and conduct of the Court of Berlin must still, however, be considered as very doubtful, and this circumstance offers the greatest difficulty that is to be encountered in the arrangement of any plan of military operations on the Continent.

“A disposition had been expressed at Berlin to negotiate with his Majesty for a subsidy, in consideration of which the King of Prussia was to have engaged in immediate operations for the deliverance of Holland; and although the accomplishment of this object seemed to be in a great degree secured by the extensive preparations which I have described above, yet the advantage appeared so great of placing Prussia in a line of open hostility against France that his Majesty had resolved to encourage that negotiation, and to authorize its conclusion on the grounds above stated, provided that satisfactory explanations could have been obtained respecting the subsequent employment of the troops so subsidized, after the first object, that of the deliverance of Holland, had been accomplished.

“Some of the conditions, however, which were demanded by the Prussian Government in the course of these discussions, appeared to be either in themselves impracticable, or at least to lead to such delay as might defeat the main object in question; and the whole spirit of the negotiation was such, on the part of that Court, as to inspire no very confident expectation of active and zealous co-operation; though such a state of things might perhaps have been obtained as would have justified the expense to be incurred on the part of this country.

“This negotiation, however, has recently been broken off by an intimation on the part of the Prussian Minister of an intended negotiation between his Prussian Majesty and the French Directory, for the peaceable evacuation of Holland.

“By Mr. Grenville’s despatch of the 23rd ultimo, it is still left in some degree doubtful whether this measure would be persisted in at Berlin; but, at all events, the communication already made must greatly diminish even that degree of confidence which could before be placed in the intentions of that Court.

“On your arrival at Berlin, you will learn from Mr. Grenville what may then be the actual state of these discussions; they may ultimately much affect the success of the operations to be pursued in other quarters, and in that respect are very important to the conduct and progress of your Lordship’s mission.

“It had not, however, been in his Majesty’s contemplation that, after the deliverance of Holland, and perhaps of the country between the Meuse and the Lower Rhine, any offensive operations should be allotted to the Prussian army. His Majesty’s idea had been that, when these points had been accomplished, his own forces and the auxiliary Russians serving with them should endeavour to occupy the Netherlands; while the Prussian troops, supported either by a further body of Russians, agreeably to the demand of the Court of Berlin, or by a body of Hessian and Saxon troops, to be supported at the expense of the countries so recovered and defended, should occupy a defensive position from Mayence to the Dutch frontier, and should block, or, if necessary, besiege Ehrenbreitstein and Mayence.

“The want of this link in the line of defence may be productive of considerable embarrassment to the projected plan of operations; especially as the Court of Vienna appears to take so strong an interest in this point that M. Thugut has already expressed to his Majesty's minister at Vienna a desire that, after the arrival of General Korsakow's army on the Swiss frontier, that of the Archduke should be drawn off to undertake the siege of Mayence, and to penetrate next year into the Netherlands.

"This difficulty does not, however, vary the plan which his Majesty is pleased to direct that your Lordship should, in the first instance, propose to the Archduke.

"The main object of that plan is that the Russian army under Marshal Suwarrow, aided by the Swiss and Wirtemberg troops, should, after the recovery of Switzerland, penetrate to Lyons, so as to occupy that city in force, and to take a proper military position in the adjacent provinces before the winter, in order that the standard of the French monarchy may be erected there under the Comte D'Artois, and that the experiment may be fairly tried whether the dispositions of the country are such as to make it safe for the allies to attempt in the spring to penetrate further into the country, and even to undertake operations in the direction of the capital itself. And although the main army might, after so fatiguing a campaign, be allowed to take up its winter quarters at Lyons, or on such line as should be chosen for the purpose, yet that a sufficient body should be kept in activity to support any exertions of the Royalists in the neighbouring provinces.

"This plan you will consider as the principal object to which your attention is to be directed; and all the other points which are adverted to in this letter, are to be regarded as secondary and subordinate to it, and liable to be varied as may best conduce to its attainment.

"It is obvious, on the first view of the statement of the allied force, that this enterprise cannot be undertaken by Marshal Suwarrow alone with the force supposed to be placed under his command, and without co-operation from the other armies. If, therefore, the principal object above stated should be approved at Vienna, as it has already in great degree at Petersburg, the mode of such co-operation from one or both those armies will immediately become the subject of your discussions with the persons with whom you have to treat.

"In the arrangement of this point, his Majesty is pleased to leave it to your Lordship's discretion to agree in his Majesty's name to any plan which shall appear to you to be reasonably well-adapted to the circumstances of the case, even though it were not the best which might be formed; and which Marshal Suwarrow shall himself judge sufficient for the protection and support of the advancing army to be placed under his orders; without which it cannot be expected that he should undertake such an enterprise. Your Lordship's utmost exertions and address must therefore be employed in facilitating the discussion of this subject, and in bringing forward to consideration, as distinctly and as accurately as possible, the various questions on which it must depend; and particularly in softening the jealousies and animosities which have already manifested themselves between the Russian and Austrian troops, and which, it is to be feared, may affect the mutual communications of their commanders.

“ The consideration of this last circumstance makes it extremely desirable that the Russian and Austrian troops should be employed in distinct armies, separated from each other, though acting on a well-combined plan of mutual support.

“ The operation which was first proposed by M. Thugut, as proper in this view to be allotted to the Archduke’s army, was that of the sieges of Huningue and Belfort, and it is much to be regretted that any other idea has since been preferred at Vienna.

“ The proposal of the siege of Mayence cannot in any manner be considered as a substitute for it; the success of that operation could afford no direct assistance to the progress of an army in Franche Comté or Dauphiny; and it is highly improbable that the Directory, neglecting the immediate danger of an army advancing upon Lyons, would detach any considerable portion of their force to the relief of Mayence. The siege of that place would not, therefore, assist the main operation either as an immediate support, or as a diversion. And it is evident that, in the present comparative state of force, the enterprise against Lyons must be relinquished as too hazardous to be undertaken, if the Archduke’s army should be drawn off to Mayence, and unless very great assistance be in that case afforded by the Italian army.

“ If the negotiation with Prussia shall still succeed, notwithstanding the unfortunate appearances of the present moment, it will be easy for your Lordship to prove unanswerably that the defence of the part of Germany adjoining to Mayence will be so completely provided for by those arrangements as to supersede the necessity for the march of an Austrian army to that quarter; and the course of that negotiation seems as well calculated as the nature of the situation will allow, to obviate any jealousy of Prussian interference in the affairs of the Netherlands. The intention being, as I have already stated, that no more should be required of the Prussians than to take a position from Mayence to Cleves, and to provide either by their own force, or with the aid of Russian or Saxon or Hessian troops, for the defence of that line and for the blockade or sieges of Mayence or Ehrenbreitstein.

“ It is true that even this disposition may create jealousy on the part of the Austrians, especially if the course of events should lead to any enterprise of his Majesty’s troops on the side of the Netherlands; should this be the case any such uneasiness can be obviated only by expressions of the most earnest desire on his Majesty’s part to come to a full understanding with the Court of Vienna on this and on every other point of discussion as to the present state of Europe; and by proving to that Court that the deliverance of the Netherlands cannot be accomplished by any effort of the Austrian troops in the course of the present year, and that the interests of Austria are as much concerned as those of his Majesty in the speedy expulsion of the French from those provinces.

"If the negotiation with the Court of Berlin shall have totally failed, your Lordship's endeavours must still be used to induce the Austrians to disregard the danger of any French incursion into Germany on the side of Mayence, and to pursue by active co-operation with the Russian army, that plan of operations which seems to afford the best hope of a speedy and decisive success; such as would ensure to the allies the conclusion of a peace on terms honourable to themselves, and productive of permanent security to Europe.

"The best line of such co-operation, as far as relates to the Archduke's army, appears, as I have already stated, to be that of Huningue and Belfort; the reduction of which places might also be reasonably expected to be followed by that of Besançon, if the season of the year shall not be too far advanced to allow time for it.

"But I have already apprized your Lordship that, in a case where so many different proposals may be made which can not even be foreseen, much less decided upon in all their details at this distance, his Majesty leaves to your Lordship a discretion as to the best steps which can be taken in concert for executing the main enterprize, that of the reduction and occupation of Lyons, and of such part of the adjoining provinces as may be necessary for a military position during the winter.

"With respect to the co-operation to the southward, this may be considered under two different points of view; first, in the case of a positive and final refusal of the Austrians to afford any active co-operation on the right flank of the Russians; and secondly, in the event of the adoption of his Majesty's proposal respecting the Archduke's army, or of any other plan which may, either fully, or at least in some reasonable degree, provide for the same object.

"In the first case a much greater degree of co-operation to the south must be required, in order to enable the Russians themselves to undertake such operations as might be necessary to cover the right flank of the advancing army. Rosenberg's corps, which is now in Italy, would therefore probably in that case be employed to more advantage if, being still under the orders of Marshal Suwarrow, it were, however, not joined to his main army, but were kept on his left flank; supposing that the main army itself could, in that event, be strengthened by Swiss and German troops; and, in this manner, the operations to the southward, instead of being confined to the sieges of Briançon and Fort Barraux, might be so far extended as that a part of the main attack on Lyons itself should be directed from Chamberry and Grenoble.

"In the second case, that of a sufficient co-operation to the northward, the occupation of the two places above-mentioned may be sufficient for the object which is in view, unless it should be found that the subsistence of the advancing army would be better secured by dividing the attack; a measure which it would otherwise appear very desirable to avoid if possible.

"These ideas relate to the supposition of the different cases in which the operation against Lyons shall be judged practicable, and they seem to include all the different modes in which that plan can be pursued.

"Another case may, however, arise in which, from the total failure of all co-operation to the northward, and on a full consideration of the means of acting to the southward, it shall be judged that the enterprize of Lyons is one which can not be undertaken this year, with a reasonable prospect of success.

"Your Lordship will perceive from what I have already stated that this is a decision which his Majesty would very much regret, though he is aware that it may, under some circumstances, become indispensably necessary. In that event it would probably be less urgent to agree to the other ideas which might be brought forward, and your Lordship would, in all probability, have an opportunity of transmitting to me the detail of any such plans for his Majesty's final decision. It would, however, be desirable that, in this event, the attention of those with whom you treat should be drawn to the means of taking up such positions on the frontiers as would most conduce to open a communication during the winter with the provinces of France which I have already mentioned, and with Provence; and as would facilitate the undertaking the operation against Lyons in the spring.

"Your Lordship will keep me constantly informed of the course and progress of the negotiations in which you are engaged, and you will occasionally correspond with his Majesty's ministers at Berlin, Vienna, and Petersburg; for which purpose your Lordship is furnished with the cipher H. from the Office, which must however, on account of the peculiar circumstances of a military mission, be sparingly used; and which you are never to expose to the danger of falling into the enemy's hands, but to destroy it on any occasion of danger.

"Your Lordship will on all occasions communicate fully and unreservedly with Mr. Wickham, his Majesty's minister in Switzerland, on everything that relates to the business in which you are engaged. The long attention he has given to the subject, and his knowledge of the dispositions both of the Austrians and the Swiss will, I am persuaded, render his suggestions highly useful to you; and, in the event of the occupation of Lyons, and of any forward movement in France, it is probable that his Majesty will avail himself of his services in that country, and will direct him to assist the Count D'Artois with such suggestions and advice as it may be desirable to offer in his Majesty's name."

W. GARTHSHORE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 8. Manchester Square.—"I have the honour of informing your Lordship that I arrived in town this morning, after a very tedious voyage from Cruxhaven. I have delivered to Mr. Hammond the dispatch from Mr. Hailes, which he will probably forward to your Lordship by this post. I should have had the honour of delivering it myself, but that I understood your Lordship was not at Dropmore. I feel a very sanguine hope that your Lordship will not disapprove of the resolution I took—very much with the advice of Mr. Hailes—to return home. Little, or rather nothing, was to be done at Stockholm, and I thought it much better to return at once to England, to represent to you the real state of things, and to receive your Lordship's instructions, if you thought it necessary that any other should be given.

"I firmly believe that nothing can influence the King of Sweden to have any direct communication with England, upon terms short of the restitution of the convoy; and your Lordship is fully aware that his opinion is not likely to be influenced in any way by those who are about him. I shall not now detain you upon this subject, but shall be happy to endeavour to give you any information in my power, when I have the honour of seeing you.

"I have only to repeat the hope that you will have the goodness to attribute my return to the real cause, the idea that it might do more good than my remaining at Stockholm possibly could do."

THE HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, August 8. Lingen.—"Les informations suivantes sont les dernières qu'on a obtenues sur les préparatifs que se font dans la République. Le général Brune, chargé du commandement général des troupes tant Francoises que Bataves, a fait une tournée sur les frontières du Braband pour y examiner les moyens de défense. Il a fait des dispositions à Grave, et fait mettre cette place en état de défense par un ingénieur Francois, qui y dirige les travaux. De Grave il s'est rendu à Bois le Duc, qui sera ravitaillé pour trois mois, et où on a déjà commencé à former des inondations qui s'avancent déjà de très près de la ville. Il doit passer ensuite dans les provinces d'Overyssel, de Groningue, et de Frise. Cette nomination donne beaucoup de mécontentement à Daendels, qui s'oppose fortement à l'envoi des Bataves au Rhin, et veut les garder dans l'intérieur. Les nouveaux ouvrages aux quels on travaille au Grebbe sont exécutés d'après les plans du général du Moulin; c'est l'ingénieur Van der Plaat qui est chargé de la direction de tous les ouvrages depuis le département du Wael jusqu'au Zuyder Zee; cet officier sert par nécessité, on le dit aujourd'hui fort bien disposé. A Doesburg les Francois travaillent à des ouvrages contre l'avis des ingénieurs Bataves, qui les regardent comme inutiles et fort dispendieux. Les batimens Francois qui étoient à Flessingue, ont mis à la voile pour Nieuport et Dunquerque, et le vaisseau armé Wálcheren est parti pour Brouwershaven. Il est question (dit-on) de mettre Bergen op Zoom en état de siège, et il est déjà arrivé 3 batimens chargés de munitions. Au Viene-brug les ordres ont été envoyés de la Haye de suspendre les ouvrages qui y avoient été commencés.

“ Il paroît, non obstant ces informations, que le Gouvernement Batave ne se prépare pas à opposer une grande résistance en cas d'attaque. Il est très probable même qu'on tachera d'entrer en accommodement afin d'obtenir une bonne capitulation. En attendant, on est fort allarmé dans tout le pays des bruits qui se répandent de tous côtés d'une prochaine invasion ennemie ; c'est ce qui a donné lieu à la résolution prise de charger Brune de la défense générale, de mettre en exécution, et de prendre des mesures de précaution dans l'intérieur.

“ Mon arrivée dans ces quartiers n'a jusqu'ici donné lieu à aucun désordre dans l'intérieur. Dans la nuit du premier au second de ce mois il y a ici des mouvemens dans l'oldampt dans la province de Groningue, occasionnés par les réquisitions. Les paysans se sont armés, et se sont avancés contre les troupes envoyées de la ville de Groningue pour les soumettre. Il y a eu à cette occasion quelques hassards de tués et de pris, mais la chose n'a point eu de suite, et a fort heureusement été apaisée à temps, de sorte que la tranquillité est parfaitement rétablie. Francois Fagel est venu à Emmerick voir Yvoy. Il a fait parvenir la lettre à Van Braam par le beau-frère de celui-ci, n'ayant pas voulu la lui remettre en personne de crainte de le compromettre. Il a rapporté à Fagel, que Van Braam ne faisant rien sans Cappelle, qui étoit absent, il ne pouvoit prendre aucune détermination définitive ; que la sortie du Texel étoit sujette à des difficultés, mais que, d'ailleurs, les batteries situées au Helder ne généroient guères, et cela en partie parcequ'il suppose que si de terre on voit appareiller les vaisseaux, personne ne doutera que ce ne soit en conséquence d'un ordre du Gouvernement. Van Braam n'est pas sûr si tous les officiers de sa flotte se préteront à exécuter son project. Waldeck est le seul capitaine au quel il comptait en parler ; du moment où Cappelle seroit de retour, celui-ci répond entièrement de son vaisseau. Van Braam lui-même n'est pas aimé de son équipage, ce qu'il attribue à son premier officier qui est mauvais. Le billet ci-joint, écrit de sa propre main, prouve qu'il désire que l'on ne mette point de précipitation dans la chose, et qu'on le laisse maître de choisir le moment favorable. Comme il est question de quinze jours dans ce billet, et qu'il est d'une date assez vielle, il est probable qu'on ne tardera pas à apprendre que le project a été exécuté.

“ Yvoy et Tuyl sont venu ici avant hiér ; d'après les informations qu'ils donnent il paroît que l'émigration dans la Belgique augmente journellement, et que les Francois mettent tout en oeuvre pour d'arrêter ; ils prennent à cet effet toutes les précautions imaginables, en mettant des entraves au passages du Rhin et de la Meuse. Des lettres particulières de Vienne, écrites par des personnes de marque, et adressées à des individus dans le Brabant, annoncent positivement que l'Empereur renonce à la Belgique ; une seule dit que cette renonciation s'est faite en faveur de l'Archduc Joseph qui épouse une princesse Russe. Les principaux membres des États de Brabant sont fort portés pour une réunion; on s'occupe dans ce moment à sonder quelques individus prépondérans en Flandres et dans le Limbourg, mais en général on peut assurer que la majorité dans toutes les classes la désire.

“Le chef des Belges compte sur l'assistance de 20,000 hommes qui pourroient se lever en masse dans la campine; on a eu soin de lui faire dire de ne rien presser et de ne pas trop s'avancer. En attendant, il désire vivement que l'état d'incertitude dans le quel on se trouve, relativement au moyens qu'on auroit de les soutenir, puisse bientôt cesser. Effectivement une diversion bien dirigée dans les Pays-bas produiroit dans ce moment le plus grand effèt; et je désire vivement que l'on se décide bientôt à ce sujet en Angleterre, parceque à la longue il sera impossible de les contenter avec de simples promesses de secours. Dans l'intervalle j'ai autorisé Yvoy, avec le consentement de M. Grenville, d'accorder des sommes partielles et modiques pour l'achat de fusils et d'autres armes. Je vous envoie ci-jointe la copie du mémoire de Tuyll auquel je me réfère. Il est retourné à Emmerick avec Yvoy, où ils doivent avoir dans quelques jours d'ici une nouvelle conférence avec le chef en question, du résultat de la quelle j'attends un rapport qui sera envoyé sur le champ en Angleterre, et qui donnera, j'espère, des renseignemens tout-à-fait circonstanciés.

“M. de Rhoon, son frère Charles, et M. M. Van der Haar et Humalda sont venus ici hiér pour faire un rapport de ce qui avoit été fait dans les provinces de Groningue et de Frise. Ils garantissent un succès complet au moment de l'explosion. Ces Messieurs ont commencé par faire des difficultés sur l'article de la proclamation relatif à l'amnestie, et surtout aux exceptions qu'on désiroit y faire d'Irhoven, Van Dam, Blaauw, et des quatre personnes qui ont signés le traité d'alliance avec la République Francoise, alleguant que, pour n'en rester qu'à la province de Frise seule, il y avoit d'autres individus tout aussi coupables, qui échapperoient de cette manière; que ce seroit un moyen infailible d'exciter des vengeances personnelles, et que les exceptions étant bornées aux personnes susdites, cela pourroit occasionner un mécontentement général. Après de longues discussions je suis enfin convenu avec eux (et je crois effectivement que c'est la meilleure manière de réunir toutes les opinions sur cet objet qui est d'une nature fort delicate) que la proclamation se borneroit à declarer que je tacherais d'obtenir une amnestie générale, en excluant toutefois ceux qui ne coopéreroient point et mettroient des entraves au rétablissement du Gouvernement légitime. Cette tournure que Humalda avoit proposée, ayant été goûtée par Van der Haar et ces autres messieurs, je m'y suis tenu. Il paroît que Rhoon n'a jusqu'ici presque rien fait relativement à l'organisation de la province d'Hollande, et que ses correspondances dans la plus part des villes y sont fort bornées. Il m'a entretenu fort au long de son projet d'être placé à la tete des bourgeoisies, et de ceux des habitans qui seroient enclins à prendre les armes, et de son désir d'avoir une direction générale; il voudroit à cet effet obtenir une autorisation de ma part que je n'ai pas jugé devoir lui donner telle qu'il la souhaitoit. Van der Haar désireroit une direction semblable dans les provinces de Groningue et de Frise, en se réservant la faculté de substituer dans la première de ces provinces le Drossard Guichard. J'ai répondu que, provisionnellement, je ne pouvois rien fixer après les lettres que j'ai reçues hier d'Angleterre, mais que je ne m'opposerais point à un tel plan pour autant que ceux qui auroient une pareille direction agissent de concert et sous les ordres des officiers commandans, et que je voulois me réserver la faculté de nommer d'autres personnes dans le même but.

"Yvoy a eu une entrevue avec Van Straalen du Noordhollande. Celui-ci lui a communiqué ses idées au sujet des premiers changemens à faire au moment de la révolution. Son plan tend à ce que le gouvernement, auquel on confieroit l'administration générale, fut composé d'un conseil de pas moins de 15, et pas au-delà de 21 personnes, choisies d'entre celles qui jouissoient de la confiance et de la considération publique; que ce conseil, tiré des personnes les plus accréditées des différentes provinces, devroit être nommé sous le titre de Landraad; et qu'on placeroit à la tête de cette assemblée le Prince Stadhouder ou le Prince Héréditaire en son nom; qu'il seroit nécessaire que les Puissances donnent sous leur nom une proclamation en langue Hollandoise dans la quelle il est ordonné à toutes les autorités de rester en place, jusqu'à nouvelle disposition d'un Landraad, au quel, provisoirement, sera déférée l'autorité souveraine, et cela jusqu'au moment où la tranquillité sera rétablie, et la constitution affermi sur la base de l'union, et purgée des abus; que le temps et les circonstances y avoient amenés; que ce conseil invita le Prince Héréditaire à se placer à sa tête, et qu'on donneroit ensuite une proclamation plus détaillée. Les personnes désignées par Van Straalen dans la province d'Hollande pour siéger dans cette assemblée sont, entr'autres, Boetzelaar de Kyfhock, Marseveen, Calkoen, Rojer, Van Staveren; on voudroit en exclure Rhoon, Van de Spiegel, et Repelaar pour éviter le soupçon que ceux-ci ne soient animés par des vengeances personnelles. J'ai fait proposer un entrevue à Van Straalen, de même qu'au conseiller Brantson, et je me flatte qu'elle pourra avoir lieu dans quelques jours. J'espère également pouvoir m'aboucher dans peu avec Mollerus, et lui en ai fait faire l'invitation, et j'attends sa réponse d'un jour à l'autre. Comme il est très probable qu'au moment où on entrera dans le pays, toutes les caisses publiques seront vuides, il est essentiel que je suis informé jusqu'à quel point le gouvernement Britannique sera porté à faire les avances, qui seront absolument nécessaire pour remettre la machine en train, et sur tout pour organiser l'armée, dont on aura dans les premiers moments un besoin urgent. Ainsi je souhaite ardemment recevoir, le plustot possible, les informations nécessaires sur cet objet."

The VICE-CHANCELLOR OF RUSSIA to COUNT DE RASTOPTCHIN (CHANCELLOR).

1799, August 8. St. Petersburg.—Ayant invité chez moi l'ambassadeur de l'Empereur des Romains, je lui ai communiqué la traduction que votre Excellence m'a envoyée de la lettre du Feld-Maréchal Comte de Souvoroff Rymniksky à sa majesté l'Empereur, et j'y ai joint la copie de l'ordre au Comte de Razoumowsky de la communiquer à l'Empereur et Roi dans une audience expresse, en lui déclarant qu'on envoie l'ordre au Feld Maréchal, s'il trouve les mêmes difficultés qu'auparavant, de rassembler toutes les troupes Russes, et d'agir avec elles séparément et par lui-même.

“ J'ai observé au Comte Cobenzl que quand je lui avais dit, il y a quelque tems, que le Comte Souvoroff n'avait envoyé aucune plainte ici, je lui avais dit la vérité, et que le Maréchal s'est conduit d'une manière vraiment digne de sa grandeur d'arme [ame]; qu'étant rempli du zèle le plus ardent pour la cause commune, et désirant éviter tous détails désagréables entre les deux Cours, il a sacrifié, pour aussi dire, sa gloire en gardant le silence autant que possible, tandis qu'on savait ici, par les lettres des officiers et autrement, tous les désagréments que ce Maréchal a subis; l'envie, pour ne pas dire la haine, que portent plusieurs généraux envers les notres, et qui, par le mauvais exemple, gagnait l'armée même; que lui, l'ambassadeur, peut bien se représenter que chaque nation doit avoir son ambition et sentir sa dignité; que la Russie a été peut-être blâmée de ce côté-là, mais je ne sais pas si c'est avec raison ou non, mais s'il survient quelque doute là-dessus, il avouera au moins d'autre côté, en parcourant l'histoire, qu'elle a certainement de quoi être fière, et que par là il peut juger, sans parler de la Cour, combien le public même doit être indigné de ces partialités vraiment inconcevables, et surtout pour ce qui regarde le chef que le public respect avec raison audessus de tout; que l'ambassadeur doit être trop bien informé de tout pour ignorer cela, aussi bien que l'étonnement qu'on exprime dans toutes les maisons où l'on entre de ce que dans les papiers publiés par la Cour de Vienne il n'est jamais question, ou bien on ne fait que très peu de mention, des troupes Russes qui étaient partout en avant, comme pour plaire à l'Empereur des Romains, et qui se sont battues d'une manière qui leur est particulière, et perdaient toujours un grand nombre d'hommes. Qu'il doit savoir si son souverain a montré, de quelque manière que ce soit, sa bienveillance envers quelques uns des chefs Russes, dont plusieurs sont couverts d'honorables blessures; qu'il peut juger par là que l'impression que cela fait n'est pas telle comme l'Empereur la désirait; que je dis tout cela de mon propre chef, ayant pour objet le bien des affaires; qu'il connaît les principes et les idées de sa Majesté Impériale, qui sont étrangers à toutes ruses, et sont fondés sur la seule droiture; qu'il faut se conduire envers nous avec bonne foi; comptant sur elle de la part de nos alliés, nous n'avons mis aucunes bornes ni à notre confiance envers eux, ni à l'emploi de tous nos moyens pour les servir; mais aussitôt qu'on n'y répond pas, l'ambassadeur jugera lui-même si on doit l'attendre de notre part. Qu'en m'expliquant ainsi avec lui, je fais peut-être une imprudence, et je donne à sa Cour de grands avantages; car à des finesses on doit répondre par des finesses; mais que je lui répète qu'elles ne sont nullement compatibles avec la dignité d'une grande Puissance, et avec le caractère de sa Majesté Impériale. Je lui dis, qu'étant sur ce point, je me permettrai encore quelques observations, en l'assurant qu'elles sont absolument les miennes. Pourquoi, par exemple, n'a-t-on pas soufflé le mot, ni ici ni à Vienne, sur l'arrivée dans cette dernière capitale de deux couriers Espagnols de Paris à l'ambassadeur Catholique, qui ont donné lieu à différentes conjectures, et nommément que la Cour de Vienne est entré par le moyen de celle de Madrid dans quelques relations secrettes.

"Le Comte Cobenzl répondit à cette dernière observation, qu'autant qu'il s'en souvenait il n'avait informé, et qu'on ne pouvait avoir le moindre soupçon de leur sincérité, eux qui nous communiquent, pour ainsi dire, tous leurs archives; que les couriers Espagnols avaient été envoyés avec quelques propositions pour le rétablissement de la bonne harmonie, mais qu'on ne s'y était pas prêté, et que les couriers avaient été renvoyés.

"Pour ce qui regarde mes autres observations, l'ambassadeur fut effrayé des mesures prescrites au Comte Souveroff. Il chercha tous les moyens possibles pour réfuter les plaintes faites contre sa Cour, ou contre les généraux des armées, en me répondant à chaque point; sur quoi je trouvais de mon côté des objections en les prenant de la manière de penser du Maréchal, et de sa conduite fondée sur sa reconnaissance pour la manière dont on l'avait reçu à Vienne, et sur son zèle pour la cause comune. Le Comte Cobenzl parla de l'ordre de Marie Thérèse, et dit que son souverain n'a demandé la permission d'en décorer les officiers Russes que pour montrer au monde entier sa reconnaissance; et que si on ne l'a pas encor donné à personne, c'était uniquement parcequ'à peine aura-t-on déjà reçu à Vienne son rapport sur ce point-là. Il m'a prié de la manière la plus forte de représenter à Sa Majesté Impériale, et de la conjurer sur ce que souffriraient les affaires s'il y avait quelque mésintelligence entre les deux Cours Impériales; en s'offrant de s'engager de la manière la plus formelle que tout mésentendue sera examiné avec la plus grande attention, et qu'on nous fera pleine satisfaction. Il s'est étendu sur les avantages du plan proposé par sa Cour, et approuvé par l'Empereur, pour ce qui regarde l'emploi de nos troupes en Suisse, et sur le désir qu'avait son souverain de coopérer avec nous, et de nous aider dans toutes nos mesures.

"Après tout ceci, et beaucoup d'autres protestations et raisonnemens de toute espèce, qui ont duré une heure et demie (et qui prendraient trop de tems pour les mettre sur papier à présent que je me hâte d'envoyer ceci à Votre Excellence pour en faire le rapport à l'Empereur) l'ambassadeur me dit qu'il enverra certainement un courrier à Vienne demain ou mercredi matin; et m'a remis deux copies de dépêches que j'envois ci-joint à votre Excellence, en me priant de nouveau de l'informer si l'Empereur continue à approuver les opérations par la Suisse dans l'intérieur de la France, et s'inquiétant beaucoup de peur que l'amitié entre les deux Cours ne soit altérée. Par les discours du Comte Cobenzl, et par les traits de son visage, on voyait son extrême consternation, et sa grande inquiétude."

Translation.

“ L’envie que l’on me porte comme à un étranger ; les intrigues, la conduit équivoque des chefs subalternes qui s’adressent directement au Conseil Aulique, parceque c’étoit lui qui dirigeait autrefois les opérations militaires ; l’impuissance dans laquelle je me trouve à tout moment d’exécuter ce qui me paroît convenable pour le succès de la bonne cause, sans demander préalablement des ordres à Vienne ; tout ceci, Sire, me force à demander mon rappel, supposé que cela ne change. Je veux que mes cendres reposent dans ma patrie, et prie Dieu pour mon auguste souverain.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 9. Berlin.—“ In the same moment of this morning arrives the office-box with your two private letters of the 2nd instant, and Hertzlett from Petersburg with Sir Charles Whitworth’s dispatches under flying seal. If I avail myself of his departure to write to you, it is only to tell you that everything remains here in statu quo, and therefore that Berlin offers no materials for communication to you, public or private, except two letters to me from Fagel of which I send you the copies. For me it remains to wait here till I hear officially from you, unless any such pressing occasion shall arise for my joining the Prince of Orange as in his judgment and in mine ought to be acted upon by me without even that delay ; but to me it does not seem very probable that any such occasion should present itself in the first and earliest days of Sir R. Abercrombie’s approach.

“ I am, however, beyond measure anxious for information concerning the event of the first enterprise, and all my confidence of its success does not prevent me from looking out with a feverish irritation for full and complete assurance of it. If General Brune is really as active as the last accounts describe him to be, he may find it possible to prevent the first explosion being at once decisive ; but I have not the least apprehension of his being able to supply any considerable means of resistance, particularly if all goes on as well as we had expected at the Texel.

“ With regard to Sir Charles Whitworth’s notion, or rather the Emperor’s proposition of some communication which is to supply at Petersburg all the advantage of a congress, without the inconvenience of such a moment as this for such a measure, I own that I have great doubts of the prudence of adopting it in toto. A partial use of it might have some advantage, and if we could strongly and forcibly apply the influence of Russia in check upon the insatiable avidity of Austria, it is much to be desired that we should do so ; but in the present circumstances of things I do not well see how we could do more than avail ourselves of that particular Russian interference which will be listened to at Vienna, as soon as Suwarrow is seen at the head of a Russian army of 60,000 men.

"I wish we could produce the general explanation of the several objects which the great powers have in view ; and if any common concert of means and interests could have been brought about, that general explanation would have been necessary, and in that case might not have been of extreme difficulty ; but in the present circumstances, where there can be no question of general concert, I should fear that an invitation of general discussion might rather produce than prevent all the dangers which are to be apprehended from discussion. With Prussia we cannot at present have any such discussions ; we are not afraid of the invading projects of any power but Austria ; and if the Court of Petersburg will speak stoutly through Suwarrow for the defence of the southern Sardinian frontier, I cannot imagine that they would venture to dispute it ; and if they did, we should not be more advanced in the business by putting it in a shape of more formal negotiation at Petersburg. I had rather trust to Russian influence supported by Suwarrow and backed by us, than to any more formal negotiation."

JAMES FAGEL to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, August 1 and 5. [Lingen.]—"Dans les conversations que le Prince Héréditaire d'Orange a eues hier au soir avec le Duc de Brunswick au sujet de la tournure que les affaires ont prise à Berlin, il s'est expliqué d'une manière très prononcée en témoignant toute son indignation du rôle que l'on fait jouer au Roi. Il a écrit à ce sujet une longue lettre à Sa Majesté, dont il a lu quelques passages au Prince, dans laquelle il lui donne à connoître que les deux Cours Impériales et l'Angleterre parvenues à rétablir l'ordre en Europe par la force des armes, sans que la Cour de Berlin y prenne également une part active, c'est une flétrissure pour la monarchie Prussienne dont elle se relèvera difficilement, et qui lui fera perdre toute l'influence qu'elle est en droit d'avoir sur le sort de l'Europe.

"Le Roi a répondu de sa propre main une longue lettre de quatre pages, qui paroît l'ouvrage du Secrétaire Bèsme, pour dire que son parti est définitivement pris.

"D'ailleurs le Duc s'est montré réservé vis-a-vis du Prince, ne lui a point fait de questions, et ne paroît pas se douter de ce qui se prépare.

"On dit ici que le Directoire exige du Gouvernement Batave une somme de 10 millions, et l'habillement de 40,000 hommes ; et qu'on est à la veille de former un camp près de la Haye sous les ordres du Général Brune, dont on ne donne point la force.

"Les informations que nous espérons recevoir de M. de Rhoon au sujet des correspondances et de l'organisation générale dans l'intérieur de la province d'Hollande, ne sont pas tout à fait aussi détaillées que nous avions lieu de l'espérer.

“M. de Rhoon m’a dit qu’il avoit passé quelques jours à Varel, au conjointement avec M. Van der Haer. Il lui avoit donné tous les renseignemens qu’il avoit demandé relativement aux moyens de défense, et ceux des dispositions tant dans les deux provinces, que dans le République en générale.” Extracts.

THE EARL OF MORNINGTON TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 9. Fort St. George.—“I was very much distressed to find by the last accounts from England the anxiety and uneasiness you had suffered both on account of Lord Camelford, and your brother Mr. Grenville. It is difficult to describe the sensations with which I read in the newspapers (the only authority I have received) the accounts of his danger and providential deliverance. I trust he will give you full compensation for all your solicitude by accomplishing the important object of his mission.

“For an account of my operations and views I must refer you to the dispatches, and to the printed papers, and to my brother Henry, whom I have persuaded myself to send to Dundas on the occasion of this important crisis. Henry is the only man in India, excepting myself, who is thoroughly master of the whole subject ; and although it is dreadful to me to be separated from him, and left here absolutely alone (Arthur being stationed at Seringapatam) I sacrificed my private comfort to my views of the public service, and resolved to dispatch him to Europe with the Partition Treaty of Mysore, and the Subsidiary Treaty of Seringapatam—now a British garrison. I anticipate the satisfaction you will feel in the magnitude of the services which I have been able to render within so short a time ; if they are estimated and felt in Europe as they are in India, I have nothing to desire in point of character. I only request you to trace my whole plan in all its parts, and fairly tell me whether

I miscalculated any of my moves; for I cannot admit that I owe anything to chance; on the contrary many chances turned against me, which I might justly have expected to prove favourable; and, had I not been singularly unlucky, Seringapatam would have been taken a fortnight sooner than it actually fell.

"I trust you will approve the Settlement of Mysore; on the whole I think France is now for ever excluded from India, and I trust we are for ever established here, if you in England have the firmness to meet all the clamours of monopoly, and to place the government of your Indian empire on a respectable basis. I think you will enjoy the papers found at Seringapatam; never was there such a trouaille since the King of Prussia's famous discovery at Dresden.

"Many thanks to you for your kindness to Richard, of whom I hear very satisfactory accounts.

"My health continues very good, and my spirits improve; I have determined not to send for Lady Mornington; the voyage, the climate might injure her health, and it is my duty not to separate her from my children.

"I know you will omit no exertion to draw from my late services every practicable advantage to my honor and fortune. On this subject, as the first of my friends, I rely principally on you; you will talk with Henry and with my family, as well as with my other friends. My love to My Lady, to whom I send a vast curiosity—a tiger's head of gold and jewels, forming part of the ornaments of Tippoo Sultan's throne; which throne the infernal prize agents at Seringapatam pulled to pieces, before I even knew of its existence. Henry will relate the whole history to you. Out of the wreck I have saved a beautiful bird (named the Huma, see D'Herbelot) for the King; this I have purchased from the Cormorants on the account of the Company. I have also picked up some of the other ornaments of the throne, which had been scattered among the Army. Henry will tell her Ladyship's Majesty in what manner I think she ought to carry her tiger head.

"You know the tiger was the emblem or armorial bearing of Tippoo Sultan.

"I desire that you will superintend my medal for the army, and admire my device and motto; which latter you may convert into Latin, Greek, or English if you can.

"Send Henry back as soon as possible; he has been of great service to me, and has distinguished himself extremely in the late treaties.

"I hope it is not true that you are all of you so mad as to think of Bob Hobart for Ireland. I am sorry to hear that Lord Cornwallis has not succeeded there."

MEMORANDUM.

1799, June 7. Fort St. George.—"The enclosed papers from No. 1 to No. 25 are literal copies of papers found in the palace of Tippoo Sultan at Seringapatam after the capture of that place.

"The copies were all attested at Seringapatam by Captain Macauley, private secretary to the Commander-in-Chief, and transmitted by him to Lieutenant-Colonel Kirkpatrick, Military Secretary to the Governor-General. The mark pe is the abbreviated signature or byze of Tippoo Sultan himself. The orthography of the French is extremely incorrect in the original papers, especially in those dated in the year 1797, which appear to have been written under the Sultan's directions by the Captain of a French vessel then residing at Seringapatam. From these papers it appears that Tippoo Sultan has dispatched three embassies to the Isle of France, and thence to the Executive Directory at Paris, since the commencement of the year 1797.

"The first in April, 1797; the second in October, 1797; and the third in June, 1798, but the person who carried it did not leave Tranquebar until the 7th of February, 1799.

"The nature and object of these several embassies is fully explained in the following papers.

"The papers Nos. 5 to 21 contain a detailed statement of the transactions of the Sultan's ambassadors at the Mauritius in January, February and March 1798; of the landing of the French force under the command of M.M. Dubuc and Chapuy at Mangalore, and of their subsequent admission into the Sultan's service.

"In the papers from No. 22 to No. 25 will be found the particulars of the embassy which the Sultan dispatched to France from Tranquebar, at the moment when he professed a desire to receive an ambassador from the British Government."

[Accompanying the foregoing memorandum are copies of twenty-five letters in French, found at Seringapatam and published by Lord Mornington as containing proof that Tippoo Sultan, notwithstanding his friendly professions, had been negotiating with the French authorities of the Isle of France, and at Paris, for help to enable him to destroy British supremacy in Southern India.]

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 9. Walmer Castle.—"Early this morning your despatches, publick and private, from your brother reached this place. I think you will do me justice to admit that there has not been any want of exertions within the reach of my power to make, when you are informed that, notwithstanding very unfavourable weather for it, the embarkations at the different places have so far advanced as to leave no reason to doubt that our expedition will sail on Sunday morning, unless the state of the winds render it prudent to retard it. It must not reach the coast of Holland so as to hover there without being able to land. The wind is at present fair, but much too high for the purpose of disembarking. We can scarcely at this season of the year be so unfortunate as to meet with too long a continuance of it. It has already lasted for several days, and the storm of wind and rain so very severe yesterday morning as to stop the embarkation, after the men were drawn out and the boats ready. It was accomplished this morning very favourably.

"If I had doubted before, which in truth I did not, of the propriety of our armament getting as quickly as possible on the coast of Holland, your brother's letters received to-day would have removed those doubts; and upon that ground it is that I have resolved of new to instruct Sir Ralph Abercrombie to proceed without delay to Goree. Under all the difficulties which attend the further progress in that quarter, it is impossible to disguise from one's self that the proceeding from Goree to the island of Voorn is attended with most embarrassing and almost unsurmountable difficulties, owing to the narrow channel and very intricate navigation of the Goree Gat. Still, however, I am sanguine in my hopes that the zeal with which our officers embark upon the expedition will surmount those difficulties. But, in the worst view of the subject, I argue that the appearance of our force speedily is in itself a great point gained; and, if from impracticable causes, they should not be able to proceed further in that quarter, it is as easy to embark from Goree for another enterprise, as it is to embark from Ramsgate or Deal.

"I will, of course, send you when I write them a copy of the last instructions to Sir Ralph; but at present I may mention to you that, upon failure of making good the landing at Voorn, my present intention is to instruct him to proceed to Helder and the Texel, and, failing that, to Ameland and Delfzyl. I have this moment sent over a cutter with an officer to Lord Duncan to obtain an answer to certain queries prepared by Sir Ralph Abercrombie, the answers to which are to be carried to Sir Ralph at Goree, and will very much decide his option of going either to the Texel, or to Ameland and Delfzyl. General Don joined me here late last night, and brings a good deal of information with him. From his report it does not occur to me Ameland alone would be of the importance we have been led to suppose; and there is no difficulty in finding 1,200 men to do it, (which is perfectly sufficient for the purpose) if it is thought right; but General Don strongly urges, if anything is to be done in that quarter, 5,000 men should be allotted for it, by which we might raise the whole country, and give them effectual support. If the other operations are to go on, it might be difficult to spare 5,000 for this object; but, next to Voorne and Helder, I should clearly feel that Ameland and the provinces of Groningen and Friesland stood next in importance for the occupation of our whole armament. If the inhabitants in the different provinces should come forward in the manner we are led to hope, I entertain great doubts if the best appropriation of our force would not be to divide it into different bodies, in order to give support and countenance to the inhabitants of different parts of the United Provinces at the same time, and thereby preventing the Prussian partisans from having a footing any where. Unless you can be successful in collecting such a force as both to recover Holland and occupy the Netherlands, I am strongly impressed with an idea that the division of our armament in the manner I have alluded to, would be the most beneficial, with a view to the United Provinces only."

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 10. Park Street, Westminster.—"You will see by the enclosed letter of Georges' how urgent it is that what I mentioned in my letter the other day should be sent without delay. A M. de Chatillon, a most respectable old Royalist officer, is happily landed in France; and will before this time, I hope, have seen Georges. But though the accounts which he will give him will serve as an answer to part of his enquiries, they will not do much to relieve his wants. The arms have been applied for, agreeably, I conceive, to your directions, from the Ordnance; and a cutter and chasse marée promised by the Admiralty (I think by the way it should be a frigate). But you must authorize Frere to follow up the demand in both instances; and must enable him to accomplish the harder task of obtaining from the Treasury the necessary assistance in point of money.

"You will see in Georges' letter a confirmation of my apprehension that the Royalists will not have an option as to the time when they must throw off the mask. I fear, if the operations in Switzerland continue to stand still as they are obliged to do at present, it must happen before even I should wish it, that is before the allies will have passed the frontiers, and long before we shall be in a state to assist them.

"During the time that I was at Walmer, Mr. Pitt was talking of officers whom he might mention to you as capable of being useful to assist the insurgents in Brabant. I mentioned such as occurred to me upon the occasion. But I mentioned to him what I wish to repeat to you, that in my own opinion, there is a great objection to our sending any officers to Brabant, or giving to the inhabitants any encouragement to revolt; inasmuch as it will pledge us to support them; and thereby continue the effect which I think will be produced so much by this expedition to Holland, of withdrawing our forces from objects that are, in my opinion, likely to be so much more decisive. Though I know I contradict a favourite opinion of yours, I cannot help repeating my apprehensions that this expedition to Holland will destroy in the bud, and before it has come to its proper strength and consistency, an army that, with a little delay, would have exceeded anything that we have seen since the first years of the war; and might then have been employed in a better state, if not with more effect, to the objects which have always been uppermost in my thoughts. Of the troops now sent, and of those that will be sent, a great part are in a state which no officer would describe as fit for service. On the subject of pushing our operations in Flanders, I have already, I believe, troubled you, in part, with the objections which I feel to it. With respect to the effect which it is to have in conciliating Austria, we shall be doing, I conceive, with forty thousand men what may be done as well by four lines in a dispatch; and, as a military operation, it will surely be bad economy if, to prevent the enemy from drawing from thence ten thousand men, either we or the Austrians are to maintain in that country an army of twenty or thirty. Except in one or other of these views I do not understand in what way the possession of the Netherlands is to be of any use to us. In the meanwhile the expense is enormous; and the force and money employed there will cripple us for any other operation. As to drawing the troops away, if they once get entangled in these operations I put that pretty much out of the question. My only hope from this attempt on Holland is that the business may possibly be soon settled, and the country put in a state to maintain itself for the present by its own forces, and to allow of our troops being withdrawn for other purposes."

Postscript. August 11th.—"I am sorry to add that an account has been received this morning at the Admiralty that Frotté, together with the boat's crew that were conveying him from the ship to the shore, was surprised by an armed boat of the enemy, and taken just as they were landing. I should be afraid that hardly a hope was to be entertained of his escape."

Enclosure.

A letter signed Georges, describing his precarious situation, and requesting an immediate supply of arms, military equipments, and money.

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 11. Walmer Castle.—"I am very glad you thought of sending me the papers you did yesterday, for, notwithstanding all the information which General Don could give, there are two or three of the papers in the bundle you sent to me of very essential consequence. Late last night Captain Hearne, who commands a Yarmouth packet, arrived here. His arrival was very fortunate. He is very intelligent and experienced seaman, and gave much new light as to the navigation of the Meuse and all the various channels in the neighbourhood of Voorne. If the Goree Gat proves not accessible (which I believe to be the case) by large ships of war, there are so many other resources and modes of attack as I confess leaves me very little apprehensions as to the issue. I send you a copy of my final instructions to Sir Ralph Abercrombie, which I put into his hands last night. If it was essential, they might sail to-day; but I am satisfied that, being now completely in possession of all their intelligence, this day will be better spent in minutely arranging their line of sailing and disposition of attack, than it could be by any orders given from on board of ship. They can do this here, or at least after they are two leagues from shore, as well as ever they can do; being in possession of all their intelligence, and their plan of attack fixed upon. There is another circumstance which has only of late come under discussion. Next Thursday morning the spring tides will be in perfection, and they should not till then reach the coast of Holland. It does not occur to me that I shall have any more to trouble you with for some days. I thought it material to send you without delay a copy of my final instructions, as you may perhaps think it right to send them to your brother."

Postscript. "The accompanying extract of a letter I received last night from Sir Charles Grey will show you how rapidly our second army is getting on. I hope in God the weather will now continue favourable. It makes all the difference in the world to the troops in camp, in respect both to health and spirits."

Enclosure 1.

HENRY DUNDAS to LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY, K.C.B.

Secret.

1799, August 10. Walmer Castle.—"Having maturely considered all the intelligence we have been able to collect respecting the approach to Helvoetsluys, and after a full comparison of the objections arising out of that intelligence to the plan of operations pointed out in your instructions, No. 1, with those to which other suggestions appear liable, I have now to communicate to you the determination by which you are to be governed in these respects.

"In the first place I must state to you that the advices lately received from the Continent render it a matter of the most urgent necessity that the expedition should, without a moment's further delay, proceed to the coast of Holland, and as there appears very little doubt of your being able to take possession of the Island of Goree, you are in any case to consider it as the first object to be attacked. Having secured this point it will then rest with the Admiral and yourself to judge whether the facility it will afford you of proceeding against Voorn is sufficient to warrant the attempt. In the event of your agreeing on this point, not a moment is to be lost in carrying it into execution, and from the well grounded confidence I have in the cordial co-operation of the naval force, I should entertain very little doubt of success if the attempt should be resolved upon as one of which, in your judgement, the difficulties may be overcome by the bravery of the troops, without exposing them or the ships to a greater degree of risk than it would be reasonable to incur for the attainment of a position which (if it can be secured by such an effort) appears certainly preferable to every other. On the other hand should the attempt appear altogether impracticable, or so dangerous as to induce you to forego the prospect of the superior advantage to be derived from it, the object next in point of immediate importance is to attempt to get possession of the Helder and the Texel Island. The mode of proceeding to make this attack, as well as the expediency of its being undertaken, are points on which it must be left to your judgement and discretion to decide, after receiving the report of the officer who has been dispatched to Admiral Lord Duncan to procure information, and such suggestions as his Lordship may have to offer upon the subject. The advantages to be derived from the success of this enterprise, if undertaken, in giving you a secure footing in the Province of Holland, and a safe communication with the shipping, in opening the navigation of the Zuyder Zee, and in all probability giving us the disposal of the Dutch Navy, are of such magnitude as we ought not to lose sight of, in the event of an attack on Voorn being relinquished, without being thoroughly satisfied that they cannot be attained by the force under your command; or without such risk and loss as would counterbalance your success, or render insecure the footing you might thereby acquire in the positions above-mentioned.

“Should you be under the necessity of relinquishing both the above-mentioned objects, there appears little doubt of the facility with which the forces might enter the river Ems, and be landed in the neighbourhood of Delftzyll, of which place they would be enabled to get possession; and from thence to push their operations in such a manner as, according to circumstances and the information you might procure on the spot, might appear best adapted to effect the speedy reduction of the provinces of Groninguen and Friezeland and of the generality of Drent. I have avoided entering into any detail of the military operations which this or the former service might require, wishing to leave entirely to your own judgement to direct the movements of your army according to the intelligence you may procure on the spot of the strength of the enemy, the disposition of the inhabitants, and other circumstances which must govern your discretion in the execution of a plan of this nature.

“Should you be compelled to make the conquest of Groninguen and Friezeland the principal object of your expedition, a larger body of cavalry than is now embarked will, in all probability, be wanted to enable you to push forward and support your operations in that part of the country; and for this purpose I shall take care that not less than 1,000 be held in readiness to embark immediately on receiving a requisition from you to this effect. From several communications lately received from the Continent, there is reason to believe that the taking possession of the island of Amelandt would become the signal for a rising in the provinces of Friezeland and Groninguen; and for this reason, should you direct your operations to this quarter, as well as on account of its local importance with respect to the passage of the Waal, it will I think be expedient that you should send a sufficient detachment to secure and defend the same, whilst you proceed with the remainder of your army to the Ems; and in this case a proportion of the spare arms allotted for arming the inhabitants may be deposited at Amelandt, from whence they may with great facility be passed over to the main land, in case of a rising against the present government. An account of the island of Amelandt, and a plan of attack and defence of the same are herewith enclosed for your consideration.

"Should you determine to make your principal attack upon the Helder, and the Texel Island, I would not, considering the importance of success in this point, restrict you from proceeding with your whole force on this service; but if you should think a sufficient detachment could be spared from it to maintain the possession of Goree for a few days only, until it could be reinforced from hence, it would be very essential not to abandon that point; because in so far as any measures are in contemplation on the Continent under the direction of the Hereditary Prince of Orange, who is now on the frontier, to induce the inhabitants to co-operate with his Majesty's troops for their own deliverance, they are probably taken on the supposition that we shall in the first instance, take possession of the Island of Goree. Having stated the various alternatives which suggest themselves for the employment of the present expedition, and my opinion of the respective importance of each, I think it right to add that I do not wish to exclude the exercise of your own discretion, in concert with the Admiral, either in respect to modifying each or either of these plans, or in adopting any other, being perfectly satisfied that nothing which zeal and bravery can effect will be left undone by the officers or men of either service; and that their efforts will be directed to whatever object may appear to you most to correspond with the advantage of his Majesty's service, the spirit of the instructions you have received, and the ultimate success of the campaign." Copy.

Enclosure 2.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR CHARLES GREY, K.C.B., to HENRY DUNDAS.

Extract.

1799, August 10. Barham Court.—"Six more regiments to those already announced to me, are on their march for Barham Down, and will make the whole nearly 18,000 men, exclusive of cavalry. The 5th regiment took their ground this morning, and which the others shall do as they arrive, without stopping at Canterbury, and will be daily."

SECRET REPORT ON FRENCH AND BELGIAN AFFAIRS.

Transmitted by M. DE LA PALUE.

1799, August 12. Emmerich.—"On vient de recevoir une lettre de la personne qu'on a proposée précédemment, et voici comme elle s'exprime. 'Je pense bien que notre commerce ne réussira pas, d'autant plus que nos articles tombent chaque jour dans un tel discrédit qu'ils ne valent plus qu'on les payent à un tel prix; tandis que les vôtres acquièrent, au contraire, tous le jours une telle vogue, que vous n'aurez bientôt plus à redouter aucune concurrence; le ciel en soit loué, je ne demande pas mieux que de voir prospérer votre maison.

“ Il y a en Bretagne des insurgés, des mécontents en assez grand nombre, mais ils n'ont ni armes ni argent. Il en est de même en Languedoc où ils manquent de même, de chefs, d'argent, et d'armes. Les Chouans se montrent déjà en Poitou, en Anjou, et dans l'Orléanois; ils croissent chaque jour d'une manière inquiétante pour la France. J'en donnerai des détails quand ils seront plus avancés. On peut en espérer beaucoup s'ils sont aidés d'une manière franche et loyale, et surtout par des personnes de leur nation, par quelques chefs puissants. Le numéraire devient chaque jour plus rare: l'emprunt forcé ne produira presque rien, et il est impossible de concevoir comment le gouvernement s'en procurera. Il sera réduit à employer les moyens les plus ruineux. Par les états de l'armée de Massena, elle est, à peu près, de 72,000 hommes; celle du Rhin n'est guères que de 20 à 25,000, et celle des Alpes de 18,000; il y a parmi le soldat un extrême découragement qui ne fera qu'augmenter si on continue à avoir des revers, et si on parvient à ôter aux soldats Français l'opinion qu'on maltraite les prisonniers, et si ceux qui se rallieraient de l'autre côté trouvaient des chefs de leur nation, et un trésorier qui payât exactement leur paye.—On ne sait comment approvisionner les armées et les placer. On est obligé de vider les magasins des villes pour faire subsister les troupes. Les Orléanistes sont dans une quantité telle qu'on ne peut s'en faire une idée, et ce parti se renforce chaque jour; la raison en est simple, on croit par là faire moins de pas rétrogrades, avoir moins de compte à rendre, plus de chose à conserver, enfin avoir une plus grande influence.

“ Par les autres nouvelles qu'on s'est procurées, il est évident que Barras et Siéyes ont travaillé avec succès les Conseils, et qu'ils ont la majorité contre le parti Jacobin. La dénonciation faite contre eux par Courtois au Conseil des Anciens est de la plus grande force, et a été la cause du décret qui les a chassé de la Salle du Manège. Ils tiennent actuellement séance aux Jacobins, où ils n'auroient plus la protection aussi décidée du gouvernement. On s'attend à une rixe, à une commotion, qui sera sans doute considérable ; il est aisé de voir que le gouvernement est vacillant, se trouve environné de dangers, n'a point de plan, qu'il craint peut-être plus les ennemis du dedans que ceux du dehors. Il cherche à relever l'esprit public par les espérances qu'il fait répandre par les feuilles qui lui sont dévouées, sur l'entrée de la flotte Française dans l'océan. Voici le détail qu'elles en donnent. 26 vaisseaux Français, 20 Espagnols ; 9 Espagnols à Rochefort, 9 à Brest, prêts à mettre en mer. On espère de bloquer le Texel, et joindre les 12 vaisseaux Hollandais ; total 68 vaisseaux. Voici les réflexions épaisses dans les différentes feuilles ; l'escadre Anglaise devant Gênes reviendra difficilement dans l'océan à cause des vents et des courans qui règnent dans cette saison dans la Méditerranée ; on surveillera avec des forces aussi imposantes l'expédition secrète de l'Angleterre, et peut-être même on l'enlèvera, parcequ'elle ne peut avoir eu connaissance de l'entrée de notre flotte dans ces passages ; on peut aller au devant des dix vaisseaux Russes et des transports ; on peut s'emparer des vaisseaux épais qui forment les blocus—il est possible d'interrompre le convoi des Antilles qui arrive dans cette saison. Les escadres combinées sont entrées à Cadix le 23 Messidor (11 Juillet), et ont pris plusieurs bâtimens Américains armés en guerre et commissionnés contre les Français. Les Anciens viennent de rejeter à une grande majorité le décret des 500 qui rapportait la déportation de Barrère.

“ Dans le Brabant il y a quelque rassemblement de conscrits qui se cachent dans les bois et font quelques excursions dans lieux voisins. Les mouvemens sont insignifiants, et les Français paraissent peu s'inquiéter. Il passe à Luxembourg d'assez nombreux transports de recrues pour renforcer l'armée du Rhin, ainsi que d'artillerie de campagne, munitions de guerre, effets de campement ; on les embarque ensuite sur la Moselle. Le quartier-général de Beguinot vient d'être transféré à Gand. Il est arrivé quelques bataillons de l'intérieur pour renforcer les troupes sur les côtes. Florent Guyot, qui succède à Fouché de Nante à la Haye, y est déjà arrivé. Son discours de sa réception a été très modéré et n'offre rien de neuf. Les Jacobins Hollandais travaillent depuis quelques jours avec moins d'activité. Les attaques faites à leurs confrères de Paris paraissent les ralentir.”

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 12. Walmer Castle.—“ I had a letter from Lord Elgin on the same subject as yours, and likewise one from the Duke of York. I have spoke to Mr. Pitt respecting it, but he does not accurately recollect whether anything has passed between him and the Duke of Athole, or between the King and the Duke of Athole, which may render it impossible to give the green ribbon to any other than his Grace. His pretensions are certainly very strong, being the only one of his rank in Scotland who has it not; and he was set aside last time to make way for Lord Morton, as he was about the person of the Queen. The situation Lord Elgin is going into and his own rank in the peerage give him certainly a very fair right to ask it, if the Duke of Athole's pretensions do not supersede any consideration of other pretensions. Be so good as explain this to Lord Elgin, and as you will see Mr. Pitt in a day or two, and the King before I see him, you are competent to decide on the business better than I am."

LORD LOUGHBOROUGH [Lord Chancellor] to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 12. Tunbridge Wells.—"Mr. Murray, who is Consul at Madeira, has found it necessary in the conduct of the business of his house to remove to Lisbon, and I should be extremely obliged to you if you would have the goodness to allow Mr. Joseph Pringle, the partner in the house, who will continue to reside at Madeira, to succeed him as Consul there. The office has, for a great many years, been in that house, and executed very much to the satisfaction of all who had occasion to resort to the island.

"I feel a very particular interest in this solicitation; because my very near relation the late Mr. Cheap, who had probably the honour of being known to you during the time he was in the East Indian Direction, has left his share in the house to his family, and his son is now the acting partner in London. Mr. Cheap had held the office himself while he resided at Madeira, and was succeeded in it by the partner who remained in the island. The emoluments of it I believe are not very considerable. But it would be a very sensible mortification to be deprived of the sort of consequence which is attached to it, and to see it transferred to any house of more modern establishment; for I believe this house has been settled in Madeira for almost a century."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 13. Downing Street.—"I am just arrived, having left the expedition completely off, and with every circumstance favourable for its speedy arrival and landing. Pray let me know at what hour I shall come to you to-morrow, to call on Monsieur."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 14. Harley Street.—"Je vous envoie ce paquet que je viens de recevoir par un courier qui m'est arrivé dans ce moment. J'ai reçu différente dépêches qui ne pourront être traduite du Russe que demain, et je vous supplie de me recevoir demain entre deux et quatre heures pour que je puisse vous les communiquer. En attendant je dois vous dire qu'on insiste chez nous à ne pas employer le Comte d'Artois. Il paroît qu'on croit en outre à Petersbourg qu'il est très prématuré encor d'employer aucun de ces princes."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 14. Berlin.—"I scarcely know why I sit down to add a few restless words to my dispatch of this day's date. It is from you and of you that I want to hear, and till I do so, till I hear of the arrival of Abercrombie, and of the English comments upon the Prussian negociation, I can say nothing and write nothing but of impatient anxiety; and in truth you will not wonder at it when you recollect the number of long days and hours which have been dragging on from the 5th to the 14th without bringing to my feverish anxiety any satisfactory accounts of the interesting events which are at stake by land and by water. The royal letter to the Duke of Brunswick is curious enough, although it is obviously the composition of Beihm rather than of the King. You see they are completely silent as to their scandalous dereliction of the treaty which they had approved; but General Stamford has completed this narrative somewhat more faithfully in his conversations with the Duke, and His Serene Highness is pleased to be surprised and indignant at it, and writes, as you see, a bit of a letter to Haugwiz, and threatens to write another and a longer to his master; but these are poor devices which will end only in the effusion of much Christian ink, and will leave the Duke, the King, and the Ministers in the same respectable state in which they now stand. Haugwiz, no longer enjoying the light of my countenance and protection, supplies through Baron Kinkel the little whispering commerce which he had been used to carry on with me through his old but respectable and well intentioned philosopher De Luc; he had insinuated much about the prompt answer he was sure of obtaining from Paris, the great probability of his conducting that negociation so as to make it fail, and the good hopes which he had that, at the end of ten days, we should yet see the Prussian army acting as we wished without a subsidy or convention. This was the bold language which was to set us all at ease upon the Paris overture, and you may easily imagine that I did not receive these suggestions with more either of faith or of respect than they deserve; but now at last our little minister is sunk, I think, below the point of zero even in his own political thermometer; for his last conversation with Kinkel was a confession that he could obtain no answer from Paris, and a melancholy complaint that even Otto seemed to avoid instead of to court any discussion of that overture. It is scarcely worth while to remark upon the degree of humiliation in which this places the Court and the Minister of Berlin, but I mention it rather because it affords some ground for speculation on the part of France and the Directory. Are they hesitating upon the measure of the evacuation of Holland; are they considering of the means of doing this without giving way to the establishment of the Stadtholder; are they speculating upon the chance of frightening you out of your expedition by the report of their combined fleet, quod Deus avertat; are they too much engaged with the politics of Paris to think in these times of Berlin and the Hague, or does a little of each of these reasons produce that silence which makes at present the despair, real or affected, of the Minister Haugwiz? They begin to be uneasy at the Prince of Orange's stay at Lingen. I hope he will soon relieve their anxiety, and step out of their country into his own; it would well crown this glorious work, if Otto should make the King of Prussia send away his own brother-in-law, to deprecate the wrath of the Great Nation in the hour of its decline."

Postscript. "The Russian courier has, at length, while I was sealing my letters, brought with him the Imperial indignation from Petersburg. I am glad to find that the Emperor, however dissatisfied with Prussia, does not talk of more than withdrawing the whole mission, and therefore that there does not seem any ground to apprehend actual hostility between the two countries. I am likewise well pleased to find that Count Panin's conduct is entirely approved of by his master, both in his coming to Berlin and in his leaving it.

"But though this might have been worse, it is still bad; the recall of Panin was sufficient to mark whatever was due to his just sense of indignation; but the recall of the whole mission will be a harsh measure in the public eye, will give no opportunity of any return to better measures, and will tend to serve at Berlin the cause of Paris."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 15. Berlin.—"I am mortified to find by your letter of the 6th that you had not yet received my second despatch upon the official conference which we held with the Prussian Ministers, because as you will already have seen, I do not think that my present stay here is attended with any other effect than that of nursing the Prussian confidence in their being considered by us as still to be solicited, waited upon, and paid according to their own good pleasure. I do not find that I have anything to write in answer to your dispatch of the 6th, and shall therefore put off the formal acknowledgment of it till I have more occasion to write a public dispatch; I have now scarce time for a few lines, or I shall miss the packet of Sunday.

"I do not think it is safe to stir the question in Holland of Prussian negotiation, and I should much hesitate to do so through the channel of the Hereditary Prince's communications;

but I have desired Stamford to write to the Hereditary Prince to guard him against any false impressions upon this subject, and to furnish him with a true and orthodox view of it. The sickness of the Grand Pensionary, who is quite disabled, seems to me to make it advisable rather that the Greffier should come over to these frontiers than that the Hereditary Prince should pass into England; but I have so far executed your commission as to tell him that it was thought in England that he might deem it prudent to go over thither immediately, but of course that it was for him in his wisdom to decide where and how he could make himself the most useful; if your expedition has taken place (as I pray to God it may, in spite of all the combined fleet of Cadiz), very probably the Hereditary Prince has already found the means of passing into the country, or has succeeded in his projects to possess himself of Deventer or Coevorden. What Elphinstone is doing I know not, but I am still persuaded that every additional danger is, in this state of things, an additional motive for pursuing your expedition with redoubled activity.

"I send you a large packet from Lord Minto, which I have scarcely had time to read with all the attention which it deserved, but which seems to me to offer many great difficulties and embarrassments. The first in time and importance is the plan of the campaign, and you will easily see how embarrassing will be my interview with Lord Mulgrave, when I shall have to tell him that, by Lord Minto's account, they do not propose to concert anything with him for this campaign, but regard their own plan as being already fixed and determined. Nevertheless, if Lord Mulgrave arrives here I shall be disposed to advise him to continue his journey to Vienna, and at least discuss with Thugut the unreasonable change which has been made with respect to the plan of the campaign, and with respect to the share which Austria had solicited Great Britain to take in that plan by sending for an officer to discuss it with them. I own that I think there is an additional inducement to his pursuing his journey (if he has begun it) because I think he will perhaps be useful in bringing back the attention of the government there to those points upon which we had understood them to be less at variance with us than they now seem to be. Lord Minto seems to be perfectly aware of the interested views with which Thugut had adopted this plan of military measures; but the hard task is to struggle with those bad motives, and with all the little under machinery that is at work upon those irregular principles. I wish I had the time to pursue the whole of what appears to me to be important in these Vienna dispatches, but, generally speaking, I cannot help saying that I think they betray so rapacious and so insatiable an appetite for conquest, that I should think it desirable without any hesitation to pronounce decidedly on the part of London and Petersburg against the unbounded projects which are now avowed by Austria; projects that decide, not upon the French barrier of Italy, but upon the open and absolute territorial possession of Piedmont, Savoy, Venice, and great part of Tuscany. What are we to say, too, when we see that, in addition to all this, they are to re-occupy their Austrian Netherlands; and that our acquiescence in this enormous plan of plunder is to be purchased, not by their acceding to our plans or measures, but by their substituting others for their own distinct advantage; that they are to throw upon Great Britain even the expense of those Russian troops which have helped to save them from being again besieged in Vienna, and that we shall thereby not have augmented the Russian army by 45,000 men, but have augmented our own expense only for the relief of Austria; and when at the end of all this, they will not ratify our convention without having first good assurances that we are to get nothing by it either in money, none being to be paid to us, or in consideration, as the ratification is to be a secret. When all these demands are opened to us on their side, they do form such an extravagant and unreasonable trespass upon every principle of morality, interest, and convenience, that I protest I could not have imagined my old friend Thugut would have ventured to have brought forward in one and the same moment such an ugly heap of disgusting and insatiable desires. I do not yet understand how it is possible that they can have persuaded the Emperor of Russia to give them the poor King of Sardinia tied and bound into their hands; or how he can reconcile this weakness with the better and more worthy conduct which Suwarrow had hitherto successfully adopted in his name; neither can I bring myself to think that it is desirable for us to concur with them in drawing every Russian out of Italy, when it is confessed by them that their motive for doing so is not the military plan which had been agreed on, but is plainly the detestable motive of being at liberty to range unmolested over all the states and territories which could have found protection from the arms of the allied Courts.

“You will observe that I do not say a word of the military part of their new plan, because there is such large demand upon one’s patience in all the details of their political objects; but if they meant fairly only to meet the military danger of the Middle Rhine, why do they not send there the intermediate 30,000 men, and pursue in Switzerland with the Allies the general measures which they had already agreed to. This is a point, however, upon which professional men are better able to decide; but it requires the assistance of no profession to determine that the general outline of their views, as described in these four dispatches from Lord Minto, is one which it appears to me to be impossible for a British Cabinet to receive and to adopt. I have lost my time and my patience, and yours too, perhaps, in this hasty blot; and more than all, perhaps I shall risk all chance of catching the post which is to convey it to you, therefore I must conclude. My present notion is to-night to write a few lines by Bassett to Lord Minto; I do not like to give myself the airs of criticising, lecturing, or advising those who are better able upon their own business to decide for themselves; but as Lord Minto has sent me his dispatches open, I do not think it fair entirely to keep from him the strong impression which is made upon my mind by the demands which are detailed in them. If Lord Mulgrave comes this road, I will read to him as much of Lord Minto's No. 2 as I have had time to have copied, and I shall be inclined to advise him to go on to Vienna, as if he had received no other intimation than that which Lord Henley had sent as the invitation and request of the court of Vienna; when he is there he can perhaps, by recurring to your instructions, fortify the check which I think Lord Minto should, with prudence and discretion, give to the unbounded and inordinate avidity of the Austrian Minister. The discussion would at least give time for you to write from London, though doubtless it is a discussion which Lord Mulgrave will not for his own gratification desire to enter into.

"I do not know why they reckon Korsakow so late in his arrival as the middle of September. Everybody here reckons that they will arrive at Schaffhausen the 20th instant at latest, and probably sooner. I have no messenger for Petersburg, but will send your dispatch to Whitworth by cypher on the first post day."

SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 16. St. Petersburg.—"If I presume to take up a few moments of your Lordship's time, I expect your Lordship to pardon me in consideration of the irresistible desire I feel to express to your Lordship my gratitude for the signal mark of protection with which your Lordship has honoured me upon this occasion. Your Lordship will do me the justice to believe that this proof of your Lordship's kindness will never be forgotten.

"I have taken the liberty to address to your Lordship a portrait of his Imperial Majesty, tolerably well painted, and a most striking likeness. I sent it about a week ago by shipping, and I most humbly hope that your Lordship will do me the honour to accept of it. Perhaps your Lordship may think it worthy, from the unbounded zeal of the original, to occupy a conspicuous place in your Lordship's apartment."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, August 16. [Cleveland Row.]—"Whitworth, par une dépêche que j'ai reçu après vous avoir écrit, me mande que le Vice-Chancelier lui avoit donné à entendre que la Suède feroit de nouvelles propositions moins extravagantes que les précédentes, mais, comme il est évident que ces troupes ne peuvent être d'aucune utilité pour l'expédition dont il est question, j'espère qu'il se déterminera (comme il paroissoit disposé) de ne prendre la chose qu'ad referendum.

“Je ne vois pas comment il est possible d'accorder des subsides à une puissance qui se met sur le pied de ne pas traiter avec nous. Mais je suppose que pour avoir de l'argent on ne sera pas plus difficile à se desister de cette extravagance que de l'autre.

“Pour le reste il faudra voir ce qu'ils offriront et ce qu'ils demandent.

“Je crois notre expédition certainement allée au Texel. On en avoit le choix si le vent étoit plus favorable pour cette expédition que pour l'autre, et certainement il l'étoit.” Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 16. Cleveland Row.—“I enclose you Mr. Rolleston's statement of the precautions taken by him respecting the Dutch proclamations. It certainly appears to me to be highly satisfactory in so far as relates to him, or to the possibility that this paper can have become public through any indiscretion or negligence in the Foreign Office. You will, I doubt not, feel the necessity of our pursuing this enquiry as with respect to all the persons who appear, by Mr. Rolleston's account, to have been in possession of the copies. I have already seen Mr. Fagel, who expressed to me the most perfect conviction that it was neither by his means, nor through the Prince of Orange, that the paper became public; but, in a matter which is so important, I shall take the liberty to request from him a written statement on the subject.

“Should other endeavours fail, I have myself no doubt that the Privy Council is competent to call the newspaper printers before them, and to examine them on oath as to the person from whom they received the paper. But before this is done, the Attorney and Solicitor General should of course be consulted.” Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 16. Cleveland Row.—“I enclose a letter from the Bishop of St. Pol, on a subject on which he spoke to me at Stowe, and which appears to merit attention. After the experience of Quiberon, we cannot certainly listen to any projects of employing these people in our service; but I can see no harm in letting the priests have access to them, which indeed ought on other grounds to be done; nor in releasing and sending back to the Vendée those for whom the Bishop thinks he can answer as Royalists, but who have been forced by requisitions into Government ships, or have got into privateers to avoid being forced into the army.

“If you agree with me in this, it rests with you to give the necessary orders to the Transport Board.” Copy.

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 16. Admiralty.—“I have not more expectation than you that anything is at present to be done with the combined fleets in Brest; and I am not at all disposed to renew a blockade immediately till there is a greater chance of their being in a state to undertake something which it may be worth while to wear our ships out by attempting to counteract.

“Lord Nelson seems by his last letters so little disposed to quit the neighbourhood of Naples, that I am afraid he will not very readily come to Genoa ; if Lord W. Bentinck’s requisition has been very pressing, he may possibly send a detachment there after having possessed himself of Capua and Gaeta ; and his force is now sufficient (considering the enemy’s weakness in that sea) to enable him to attend to all those objects if he chooses.

“What do you think of this report of the Prussian Minister’s being sent away from Paris ?”

Note of a conversation between COUNT HAUGWITZ and BARON KINKEL.*

1799, August 16. Berlin.

KINKEL.—“Je viens pour vous voir, mais aussi pour savoir des nouvelles. Vous ne voulez pas faire la guerre avec les autres, je pense toujours que c’est afin d’avoir le mérite de la faire pour votre propre compte.

[HAUGWITZ.]—“Comment voulez que l’on puisse rien espérer lorsque l’on voit des sottises comme celle que vient de faire l’empereur de Russie. J’ai empêché que le Roi ne prit le mors aux dents ; il y était tenté ; mais je lui ai prouvé qu’une grande puissance ne devait pas négliger les considérations pour écouter les petites vengeances. Qu’arriverait-il si nous donnions l’ordre à Monsieur de Kalkreuth de concentrer 80,000 hommes qui sont déjà sur cette frontière ? L’Empereur abandonnerait la guerre de France, il en avertirait l’Autriche et l’Angleterre par la retraite de les troupes du Rhin de l’Italie, de l’Hollande : la France triompherait, l’Europe serait perdue, et nous-mêmes nous en partagerions le sort : celui qui a la force de punir une insulte ne saurait être déshonoré : voilà comme je raisonne et comme je tâche de faire penser le Roi. Il ne faut pourtant pas que l’Empereur pousse les choses trop loin, et qu’il s’imagine qu’il peut nous faire marcher à sa bannière. Je ne hésite pas de dire que nous sommes la puissance la plus entière de l’Europe.

[KINKEL.]—“J’applaudis à votre patriotisme, et je conviens de votre puissance ; mais convenez avec moi que l’Empereur donne à la guerre contre la France toute son énergie, mais qu’il n’y emploie ses forces qu’avec mesure. Il y a, tout au plus, 80,000 hommes opposés à la France : l’on en donne généralement 300,000 à la Russie : elle compte parmi ses sujets plusieurs nations qui sont armées en masse : avec cela l’Autriche commence à avoir les mains libres. Par conséquent vous risqueriez dans tous les cas en cassant les vitres avec la Russie. Si votre guerre était heureuse, vous feriez triompher la Révolution ; mais si elle était malheureuse, vous seriez interré avec la Révolution, ce qui serait mourir en mauvaise compagnie.

* Transmitted by Mr. Grenville.

[HAUGWITZ.] — “Croyez-moi ce que l'on dit des forces de la Russie est exagéré. Nous les chasserions d'un trait jusqu'à Mittau, jusqu'à Pétersburgh ; mais ce n'est ni notre intérêt, ni notre sentiment.

[KINKEL.] — “Quelles nouvelles avez-vous donc de Paris ?

[HAUGWITZ.] — “Pas un mot, parole d'honneur : j'attribue cela à ce que ces gueux sont menacés de leur chute, et qu'ils ne peuvent s'occuper d'autre chose : aussi la dernière poste n'est-elle pas arrivée. Pour [Otto] je ne l'ai pas vu, et je ne m'embarrasse plus de ce garnement : il faut que l'affaire soit traitée par Monsieur de Sandoz.

[KINKEL.] — “Que croyez-vous qu'ils répondront d'après les derniers événements arrivés à Paris ?

[HAUGWITZ.] — “Je ne saurais vous le dire, mais cela ne changera rien à mon système. Si l'on m'empêche de marcher au but par les meilleurs moyens, j'en chercherai d'autres jusqu'à ce que je parviens ; je voudrais être à St. James pour répondre à la lettre du Roi de Prusse.

[KINKEL.] — “Et, que répondriez-vous ?

[HAUGWITZ.] — “J'accepterais les engagements que le Roi de Prusse prend, et je lui dirais avec force que je m'attendais à ce qu'il les remplirait ; cela ferait plus de bien, pousserait plus à la roue que toutes les négociations et toutes les conversations ministérielles et personnelles ; et sur cela mille choses à ne pas tarir, de l'attachement du Roi de Prusse pour le Roi d'Angleterre, de son désir de former avec l'Angleterre des engagements solides et permanents. Il revint sur l'expédience d'isoler les intérêts des deux puissances et de les traiter exclusivement ; à quoi les affaires d'Hollande, qui ne regardaient que l'Angleterre et la Prusse, fournissaient le meilleur prétexte possible. Il ne se lassait pas de dire que sa lettre renfermait les engagements les plus propres à rassurer le Cabinet de Londres sur la loyauté des intentions de la Prusse.

[KINKEL.] — “Je ne pouvais pas partager cet avis, et je lui fis part de ma crainte que cette pièce ne ferait pas toute l'impression qu'il en attendait, et d'autant moins qu'elle ne laissait pas de renfermer des contradictions.

[HAUGWITZ.] — “Et lesquelles ?

[KINKEL.] — “Si ma mémoire ne me trompe, il y s'agit du gouvernement Français en termes de mépris, tandis qu'elle annonce que l'on va traiter avec eux ; et il y est question de leurs revers, tandis que l'on s'appesantit sur les dangers aux-quels la monarchie Prussienne serait exposée si on leur faisait la guerre.

[HAUGWITZ.] — “Que voulez-vous quand on devrait faire marcher 100,000 hommes sur l'Escaut, ou sur la Meuse, et qu'on ne veut pas le faire. Il faut nécessairement donner des raisons, fussent-elles mauvaises. Le Prince d'Orange nous a donné un bien grand embarras. Tous ses officiers sont en uniformes, et ne veulent pas se soumettre aux lois militaires : ils ont brusqué les postes. J'ai arrangé cela en engageant le Roi de lui écrire. Les deux princes en se quittant se sont faits des révérences et ne se sont pas assez expliqués. Notre idée est qu'il fasse, mais qu'il n'ait pas l'air de faire; et le Roi, embarrassé de ne pas faire plus pour son beau-frère, n'a pas osé lui dire assez clairement ce qu'il pouvait ou ne pouvait pas admettre.

[KINKEL.]—“ Je suis en vérité bien aise de cet aveu de votre bouche que le Roi est honteux : il a bien raison de l'être, car jamais aucun monarque n'a été appelé aux devoirs personnels de la générosité, et à ceux que lui imposent l'attachement à sa famille, d'une manière indiquée plus fortement par les intérêts de sa couronne; et s'il ne voulait écouter personne là-dessus, il aurait du moins dû accepter sa leçon de ses amis les Autrichiens. C'est la prudence de l'instinct, si on manque d'autres lumières, de ne jamais faire ce que désirent vos ennemis. Leur acharnement a été si grand qu'ils ont mieux aimé risquer dans cette nouvelle lutte les désastres et les défaites, que de s'assurer de la victoire par votre co-opération. La conduite de Monsieur de Cobenzl, et celle de Dieterichstein, et mille autres incidents vous l'ont prouvé jusqu'à l'évidence; et pourquoi ont-ils ce voeu de votre exclusion? Pour vous isoler; parceque vous les embarrasseriez dans leurs projets d'aggrandissement par votre voix au chapitre : ils veulent détacher de vous la Russie, ramener à eux l'Angleterre, et vous travaillez si utilement pour eux, sans conserver même la chance de vous jeter entre les bras de la France, si vous aviez même des politiques assez enragés Jacobins pour conseiller ce parti désespéré. J'avoue que la politique est en cela comme l'amour; on recommence toujours à dire les mêmes choses, et on ne se lasse jamais de les répéter; je vous ai dit ceci si souvent.

[HAUGWITZ.]—“ Cela ne nous a pas échappé, et je puis vous dire à cela une bien singulière anecdote; c'est que depuis peu la Cour de Vienne nous a fait des ouvertures d'une amitié, d'une douceur, et d'une civilité inexprimables. Le Roi en a été frappé, et je lui ai dit que rien n'était plus simple, que nous méritions toute leur faveur en faisant ce qu'ils désiraient. Et une autre anecdote, c'est que Dieterichstein, en partant, nous a donné un mémoire dans le même esprit, que Thugut en a été mécontent, et qu'il a dit, ' ce jeune homme a été maladroit, il a trop fait éclater sa voie.' Et si vous êtes peiné de notre conduite, jugez qu'elle doit être mon affliction, qui ai préparé avec une application sincère et de longue main les mesures que nous devons prendre à l'heure qu'il est. La paix de Basle était indispensable; la guerre se faisait sans accord, sans harmonie; nous n'avions plus d'argent, nous étions embarrassé par nos sottises en Pologne. Elle a été faite, mais je voulais employer le temps pour prendre haleine, laisser par nos stipulations les affaires d'Hollande dans leur entier, et sur la fin de la lutte venir sur cet objet à la rencontre de l'Angleterre. Nous aurions lavé tous nos péchés de Basle et du traité de subsides par notre co-opération, et nous en serions revenus à l'alliance stable et permanente qui est le voeu de mon cœur.

[HAUGWITZ.]—"La Cour de Vienne sortira rayonnante de cette affaire ; si la Russie la pousse trop sur la restauration d'un roi en France, elle la plantera, fera une superbe paix. Elle n'a rien à craindre : tous les peuples ont reçu au midi leurs leçons contre la Démocratie, mais nous restons dans notre bourbe d'esprit de révolution. Vous voyez que j'ai suffisamment senti l'état de la question. Quelles nouvelles des flottes et de l'expédition ? Je suis là-dessus dans une inquiétude mortelle, pourvu qu'ils ne reprennent pas haleine.

[KINKEL.]—"Je puis à cet égard vous rassurer : il y a des nouvelles qu'une autre flotte est toute prête pour aller à la rencontre de l'ennemi, et qu'aucune mesure relative aux expéditions du Continent n'a été pour un seul instant suspendue.

HAUGWITZ.—"Grandissime joie.

KINKEL.—"Vous paraissez encore toujours espérer, qu'en dernière analyse, le Roi se prononcera. Il met en avant un principe qui ne paraît pas promettre des résultats favorables ; 'le bonheur de mon peuple est mon seul devoir, et le bonheur ne peut exister que par la paix.' Devant cet axiome il fait disparaître toutes les considérations de dignité, de considération, d'influence, et même de puissance. Voilà comme je fais l'abstraction de son principe, du moins de celui qu'il met en avant.

HAUGWITZ.—"Oui, mais je pars de même principe.

KINKEL.—"Est-ce que l'on a la paix et le bonheur quand l'on est entouré de chiens enragés, et qu'un grand nombre ont déjà pénétré jusques dans votre maison."

LORD GRENVILLE to the LORD CHANCELLOR [Loughborough].

1799, August 17. Cleveland Row.—"Since I spoke to you I have looked at my memorandum book, and I find an application made some time since by Sir James Pulteney that Mr. Murray might be succeeded by Mr. Smith, who, I think, was stated to be his nephew, and to which I at that time consented. I have never heard any more on the subject, and if the present arrangement for which you interest yourself can be so managed as not to be inconsistent with my engagement to Sir James Pulteney, I shall most willingly obey your commands."

1799, August 17. Egglisaw on the Rhine.—"I directed the messenger Dickens to wait at Schaffhausen until he should hear from me from hence, in the hope that I might be able to send your Lordship an account of the Austrians having effected their passage over the Aar. But I am truly sorry to say that they have completely failed, and that the Archduke, at the head of forty battalions, has been baffled by the exertions of three or four thousand French, the utmost that could be collected on the point of attack before four o'clock this afternoon.

"The passage was so far surprised that the batteries were erected, and the first pontoons got well into the water before the enemy discovered the attempt.

"Two bridges were carried about half way across the river, when the first of them was carried away by the rapidity of the stream; and the second was prevented from being finished by the French musketry, though protected by forty pieces of heavy artillery, which the Austrians had placed in battery on their side of the river.

"I believe that the Archduke will renew the attempt to-morrow, as I met twenty-five more pieces of heavy cannon and above three hundred artillery men on their way to the bridge, as I came home this evening.

"M. de Korsakoff and the other Russian Generals expressed much dissatisfaction at the manner in which this attempt was conducted; and the Archduke and his staff-officers looked uneasy and ashamed.

"If the passage be carried to-morrow by the strength of the Austrian artillery, as I trust it will, it must necessarily cost a great many lives. The French were receiving considerable re-inforcements this evening, and were entrenching themselves close to the water's edge, and in the woods behind the landing stage. In the meantime the Archduke has got all his artillery and nearly the whole of his army shut up in a cul-de-sac between the Rhine, the Limmet, and the Aar; and I should not be at all surprised if the French were to attempt to take Zurich this night or to-morrow, in which case His Royal Highness's position would become highly critical and dangerous.

"I am truly sorry to add that the French are entirely masters of the canton of Schwietz [Schwyz], where they are committing every sort of excess.

"He has lost a number of men and nearly the whole of his artillery.

"The Swiss legion suffered severely, and behaved admirably in the disgraceful affair of Wednesday last before Zurich.

"Colonel Ramsay would undoubtedly have written to your Lordship a more full account of the affair of the Aar, but he has been detained by the extreme badness of the roads and darkness of the night, and I feel that I ought not to detain the messenger any longer."

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1799, August 16-20. Harley Street.]—"Je vous ai envoyé ma dépêche pour que vous l'arangiez comme vous le voulez. Je n'ai pas d'autre vue depuis que je me souviens que de lier nos deux pays par l'amitié la plus indissoluble, ainssi faite ce que vous voulez; ajoutez, efassez, corigez, attenez, renforcez. Je vous donne ma parole que je fairai copier ma dépêche telle que vous me renverez celle que je vous ai envoyez. Je vous prie seulement de ne pas expédier le courier demain avant quatre heures."

LORD GRENVILLE to WILLIAM WICKHAM.

1799, August 18. Downing Street.—“Your letter and despatches which were received here on the 16th have, as you will naturally suppose, thrown me into no small degree of perplexity. The business of the Swiss levies appeared to me however to admit of no delay, and I have therefore settled it as follows, though, for the reason which I shall presently state, I do not yet write to you officially upon it.

“I consider Hotze’s pretension as totally inadmissible. If he wanted to choose the officers himself, this would diminish in reality that influence which this country ought to have in return for its efforts. If he wants only the appearance, he can want that only for the same purpose, and it must therefore for the same reason be resisted. You will therefore be directed to accept, with all due civility and attention, his resignation. Korsakow will by that time be arrived, and I see no difficulty in putting the regiments under his orders as commander-in-chief of the subsidised army; reserving however by express explanation with him;

1st. “That the Inspector-General shall be a British officer, and shall have exclusive command and control over all matters of detail as to the formation of this corps.

2nd. “That the commissions shall be signed by the King, and shall be given by you exclusively, or in conjunction with the Inspector-General.

3rd. “That his Majesty shall reserve to himself, whenever the corps shall be sufficiently large, to name a general officer, of whatever nation he shall think fit, to assume the command of this, as of an auxiliary corps serving with the Russian army; and

4th. “That his Majesty will, when he thinks proper, separate it from the subsidised Russian army, and put it exclusively under the orders of a French Prince; explaining, however, that this is not intended to be done but in the case of actually entering into France, or being on the point of doing so.

“If Colonel Craufurd had even had the rank of full colonel, I would have tried to carry a different arrangement, and to have procured him local rank as Major-General to command the Swiss army under the Russian General; though I am not sure I should have succeeded in this; and, with a Lieutenant-Colonel, it is not to be thought of.

“I mean therefore to offer him, on these terms, the place of Inspector-General and Commissary united. But I trust, at the same time, I shall have the means (and for that I am waiting) of proposing to him to quit the thing entirely, and to take an active situation in the Duke of York’s staff in lieu of it. I should be much hurt to do anything which could injure either his interests or his feelings, for I have a real regard and good opinion of him; but this plan will, I think, be more useful and more acceptable to him than remaining with the Swiss troops on the footing I have mentioned above, and which is the only one that I think practicable.

"I have no doubt that the levies must be made in the way of regular regiments, and that the question about the officers must be referred back to your decision. I cannot think that it would be possible to put Pichégru at the head of the force.

"I fear we shall really drive Monsieur to despair. My heart really bleeds for him. He was on the very point of setting out when your despatches arrived; and with them a fresh remonstrance from Petersburg against his being employed. I felt obliged to suspend his journey, but I shall be anxious to see the moment arrive for his resuming it.

"Lord Mulgrave will have explained to you our projects; they were brilliant, but I fear we are too late.

Postscript. "As there is nothing in my intentions respecting Craufurd that is not founded in real good wishes towards him, you will use your own discretion in mentioning them to him or not. The next mail will probably bring you my official letters, and there is hardly any chance of their being in any respect different from what I have here stated.

"If Craufurd does not remain with you, I mean to offer the Inspector-General to Ramsay."

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1799, August 18. Harley Street.]—"Comme vous ne m'avez pas donné de notte des arguments dont vous vous êtes servi, pour me répondre sur les objections que j'étois obligé de vous faire hiér sur l'envoi du Comte d'Artois, et sur la nouvelle instance que j'avois aussi ordre de vous faire sur les subsides de la Suède, j'ai compris le sens de vos objections sans vous garantir les détails et les arguments, ayant la plus abominable mémoire du monde.

"Je vous envoi la copie de ma dépêche. Examinez la, je vous supplie, et s'il y a quelque chose de trop, je pourai l'efacer, et ce que j'ai oublié vous pourrez le marquer au chevalier Whiteworth, auquel je me raporte."

LORD MULGRAVE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 18. Berlin.—"I arrived at this place late last night, and, in obedience to his Majesty's command, took the earliest opportunity of communicating with Mr. Grenville.

"It was with the greatest regret that I received from him an extract of the substance of a dispatch, No. 2, from Lord Minto to your Lordship, as it appears to preclude the whole ground and object of my mission; not only from Baron Thugut's declaration that 'a concert is unnecessary, the plan of operations being not only determined upon, but what remains of it about to be executed'; but also from the nature of that plan of operations, which appears to leave no choice of measures to the Russian forces, but absolutely to confine them to the object of keeping the army of Massena (now, I understand, placed under the command of Moreau) in check, for the sole purpose of preventing its interference with the Archduke's operations against Mayence,

“After the very full military discussion which, previous to my quitting England, I had with your Lordship on the proposed operations either in Switzerland, or on the frontiers of France, it will not be necessary for me to trouble your Lordship much at length to shew that the progressive removal of the army of the Archduke on the arrival of the different divisions of General Korsakow’s army, and the occupation by these of all the posts at present held by the Austrian forces, is relinquishing at once the object of the deliverance of Switzerland; is leaving Piedmont entirely in the power and at the disposal of the court of Vienna; and, at the same time, rendering the subsidiary army of Korsakoff, and the other forces of the Emperor of Russia in that quarter, the mere defensive instruments of the peculiar military and political objects of the Austrians.

“A combined operation of the Archduke’s army with the collected forces of Russia might have driven the French from Switzerland, possibly without an action; or, in the event of their hazarding a battle, with the probable destruction of that last army of the republic; after which the operations against Mayence (as they are obstinately to be persevered in) might have been undertaken with a remaining prospect of a secure position on the frontiers of France for the Russian army, and the opportunity of preparing measures for offensive operations in the enemy’s country at the opening of the ensuing campaign; whereas, an attack with the Russians only on the position of the French army in Switzerland, even should it be successful, must be at such an expense of men as to render all prospect of further service from that army very doubtful, and hardly to be hoped for. These considerations appear so plain and obvious, that I cannot help apprehending something more than the mere choice of military operations to have influenced the decision of the Austrian government on this measure.

“The offer of the co-operation of 30,000 men on the right flank of the Russian army appears to me to be another branch of the system of evasion and fallacy which has, with so much address, been contrived to withdraw the army of the Archduke from the contest in Switzerland to an easy operation under cover of the Russian forces; for, M. Thugut is well aware that the co-operation of those troops at Huningue and Belfort can only be required as a measure subsequent to the French being driven out of Switzerland, which he states himself is the utmost that can be effected this campaign; and he accordingly guards the offer of that co-operation with the term ‘if it is thought expedient by his Majesty at the proper season; that is, at soonest, at the commencement of the next campaign.’ M. Thugut states that the Russian army collected will be equal to that of the Archduke now in Switzerland. But (without remarking upon the exaggerated estimate of the Swiss force, and the inclusion of Rhebinder’s corps, which is not within reach), the representation made to Mr. Wickham by the Archduke must be recollected, in which his Royal Highness states that although he might succeed in dislodging Massena, that it must be effected by the sacrifice of the flower of his army, and such a loss of men as would incapacitate him from further exertions or subsequent operation. The reasons which influenced the Archduke to abstain from the attempt to force Massena's position are intrinsically of equal validity when applied to the Russian army; but the sacrifice does not appear to be equally important in the estimation of M. Thugut, and it seems to have escaped his recollection that the deliverance of Switzerland was proposed to be effected by a combination, and not by a substitution of forces; and that the co-operation on the right of the Russians was to be a consequence only of the favourable result of that combined operation.

"A further question of considerable importance arises, even supposing his Majesty's acquiescence in this employment of the Russian subsidiary force, and the consent of the Emperor of Russia to lend the remainder of his army to the same object; and that is the possibility of taking up winter quarters, and procuring subsistence, on the line from Zurich to the Valois, with a French army on the line from Basle to Geneva. And if that should be found impracticable, it will become a question whether Switzerland should not at once be relinquished, if the Court of Vienna persist in the pursuit of their object at Mayence; and an immediate attempt be made to penetrate into France by the way of Chambery and Grenoble with the Russian forces: their right being covered by the Rhone, and their left by the southern corps already destined for that object. I am aware that the Austrians may refuse their co-operation in a measure which will either oblige them to remain in Switzerland, or to relinquish all the fruits of their operations in that country. The only other measure to counteract the selfish views of Austria would be to withdraw the Russian troops entirely from Italy, and employ them for the object to which the army of the Duke of York is destined on the coast of France, in the event of the deliverance of Holland and the Netherlands by the successful operations of the forces under the direction of his Royal Highness. I am not unconscious that the two last are extreme and violent measures; but in a case so difficult and unforeseen as the march of the Archduke to Mayence previous to driving the French out of Switzerland, and under the circumstance of the whole of the Russian force being trepanned into so delicate a situation, and tethered to the support of the Austrian operation, I have thought it expedient to state to your Lordship everything which suggests itself to my mind.

"I shall proceed to the headquarters of the Archduke (although the object of my mission appears to be precluded by the decision at Vienna) and endeavour to dissuade His Royal Highness from the removal of his army out of Switzerland, at least till the combined efforts of the Russian and Austrian armies shall have driven the French from that country. Should my representations not produce the desired effect, I will repair to the headquarters of Marshal Suwarrow, in the hope of inducing him to unite with me in the strongest remonstrances to the Court of Vienna against this sacrifice of the best cantons of Switzerland, this waste of the forces employed by His Majesty and the Emperor of Russia for the great objects of the common cause. It is much to be apprehended that the arrival of General Korsakow's corps may have already produced the removal of the army of the Archduke.

"The departure of the courier for England immediately does not allow me time to methodize or correct this dispatch, or to digest and select my ideas, as I should wish to do on a subject of such magnitude and importance; but time is above all things precious at this moment, and I know that your Lordship's judgment and indulgence will correct and excuse all that is defective in my conception of the subject. The awkward situation in which I shall feel myself personally placed by urging my interference, after the declaration of M. Thugut that I am not to be listened to, will chiefly be irksome to me inasmuch as it is connected with the circumstance of my acting in the name and under the orders of His Majesty; but the importance of the object in my mind precludes all considerations of etiquette, even under that powerful impression."

LORD MULGRAVE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 18. Berlin.—"I proceed with very little hope of success; indeed with none but what rests on the possibility of persuading the Archduke that the glory of driving the French out of Switzerland, and the completion of what he has so well begun, is of sufficient importance to his own reputation to induce him to undertake that measure upon his own authority, previous to the removal of his army. I fear, however, that we are completely taken in Thugut's trap, which is too well laid and too deeply considered to be evaded. The march by Grenoble, which I have mentioned in my dispatch, is merely stated as the only active operation that can be suggested, and one likely (if it were feasible) to distress the Austrians very near as much as the French; but I fear it is but an imaginary resource, and I think I can even at this distance see insurmountable objections to the adoption of that attempt as an insulated operation.

"As you are already informed of the very serious inconvenience to my own affairs with which I have undertaken and am about to prosecute this journey, and as you must also be aware of the very pretty figure I shall make at the Archduke's headquarters, rejected and disallowed by the Minister at Vienna, and upon a fool's errand to discuss what has been determined without me, I trust there can be no objection to my immediate return from that awkward and irksome situation as soon as I shall have laid my reasons before His Royal Highness. If his army should have marched, it will be hardly necessary to go to Suwarrow. I will not lâcher prise if I think I can do anything, but I shall have a most uncomfortable and impatient feel, and no disposition to stay without good reason. I cannot help regretting that I am not detained till you heard again from hence, as this awkward business might then have been entirely avoided. I am not yet quite convinced that I do right in proceeding, but as it is the most disagreeable decision to myself, I am at least persuaded that I take it without any bias."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MULGRAVE.

Private.

1799, August 18. Dropmore.—"I could much have wished before I wrote to you to have received Lord Minto's account of his conversation with Thugut; because I think his energy will, in the present moment, force out some of those secrets which have hitherto been so carefully concealed from us. But I considered the difficulties in which you would find yourself on the receipt of Lord Henley's letter, and I therefore determined to send this messenger off to you without further delay.

"The intended recall of the Archduke has totally deranged our opinions as to the place of treating; perhaps it is only a pretence thrown out for that purpose and not intended to be executed. I wish it may be so, but our time is too precious to allow of waiting to make this experiment. The conquest of Switzerland ought now to follow rapidly on that of Italy; and although I despair of drawing off the Austrians from their project of besieging Mentz, I do not see why, if the Italian army is allowed to co-operate heartily with us, the project which we discussed here should be despaired of.

"We shall, however, as always happens, be weaker than we expected. Korsakow's army, with the Condé troops, will not as yet be 40,000. The Wurtemburghers will not be got to act separately from the Imperial arms, at least not in time; and the Russians in Italy are said not to be more than 10,000, instead of 15,000 at which we had put them. These are great defalcations, and from Wickham's last despatches they are not likely to be soon supplied by Swiss levies; not, however, that I think that part of the force to be despaired of, if the present confusion is well settled.

"It is, however, plain that the whole army will not amount, at any early period, to more than 50,000 effective troops, and that such a force is not alone sufficient to enter France; though, if it were well seconded by an effective operation (not a diversion only) to the southward, I do not see why, in the present state of French force, we might not yet succeed. And to this object I conceive your endeavours must now be principally directed, unless any fresh and sudden change in these fluctuating Austrian plans should give a new opening for pursuing the original idea, which I consider unquestionably the best.

"Very much must, however, depend on the political discussions. If Thugut persists in declining all explanation of his views, we cannot concur in them, for we do not know them, and he will always think that we are thwarting them. If Lord Minto succeeds in getting him, by fair means or by foul, to speak out, I should be very much disposed to think that we might see without jealousy almost any accession of strength to Austria, provided she would consent to our arranging the Netherlands to our satisfaction ; which would certainly not be by giving them to Prussia, the result which he is, or pretends to be, apprehensive of.

"It is, however, in vain to speculate on these points in the dark. Before you get to Vienna I hope we shall have made some progress in the discussion of them." Copy.

LORD MINTO to J. H. FRERE.

1799, August 18. Vienna.--"I received yesterday by the post your letter of the 23rd July, and I shall lose no opportunity of making and enforcing the representations which you suggest, concerning the capitulations to be granted to the French garrisons of places surrendering to the Imperial arms. I had indeed been so strongly impressed with the ill consequences which the return of so many disciplined and veteran troops into France must produce, that I ventured to state my sentiments, which I knew also to be those of Government at home, to M. de Thugut, the first time I ever saw him, and before I had acquired a formal title to speak to him on business. I mentioned this subject to him on the occasion of the expected surrender of Mantua. But he told me that, with a view to that particular capitulation, it was too late to take any step, and therefore unnecessary to discuss the point, for he had no doubt the matter was already decided and executed at Mantua. This proved in effect to be the case, for the news of the surrender arrived two or three days afterwards. On this subject the Austrian officers plead the great necessity of expediting the capture of so many forts and towns, and the difficulty of disposing of such a multitude of prisoners, the number in the possession of the Austrians being already immense. With regard to Mantua, the object was so great that one cannot be surprised at their embracing the earliest means to obtain possession of it, and, in point of fact, a very short delay in settling the capitulation would have retarded the surrender of the place very materially, as well as created very serious difficulties in accomplishing that desirable event. A violent inundation took place the same day or the day after, which destroyed or rendered entirely useless the principal works of the besiegers, and the difficulty as well as the delay in restoring them would have been extreme. I am, nevertheless, fully sensible how desirable it is to prevent conditions so favourable to the enemy, and so prejudicial to the main object of the war, from being granted in future where it is possible to avoid it ; and you may depend on my using my best endeavours for that purpose, in compliance with the instructions which your letter sufficiently announces."

HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 18. H.M.S. Isis, at sea.--"I had the honour of writing you on Wednesday last the 14th instant, in which I stated my intention of going directly against the Helder as the object of the greatest magnitude, and, with all the risk and difficulties which might attend it, more practicable than the attack on the Island of Voorn. Unfortunately, since Wednesday evening, we have had a continued gale of wind, such as must be considered as very uncommon at this season of the year. We have twice had communication with Lord Duncan, who has promised all the assistance his squadron can afford; at this moment there is no prospect of our being able to avail ourselves of it. Should the weather become more moderate, and should the transports keep together, we shall seize the first favourable opportunity of trying a landing to the southward of Kyck Duyn, where we apprehend we can maintain ourselves against any attempt of the enemy until we have forced the redoubt and batteries at the Helder. I do not presume to say that this can be effected without risk on an inhospitable coast which affords no shelter, and which cannot be approached at any time, with a great fleet, without caution. Hitherto the fleet has kept together wonderfully, owing to the moonlight. If we had lost sight of many of the transports I should not have thought it advisable to have persevered in the attempt, because the force we had at sailing was not more than sufficient for so arduous an enterprize, for once on those shores we could not look to a retreat. This weather seems to preclude any prospect of being joined by the Russians. The only assistance we can expect is from Barham Downs. It is difficult for me to say what I wish on this occasion; if we succeed in landing we shall want immediate assistance, but to send a fresh embarkation of troops to sea, on an uncertainty, is what I should not advise. Let them be embarked and ready to sail, should the weather clear up, directing their course towards the Texel. The transports are only victualled for one month, and some of the troops have been on board twelve days. We have heard nothing of the Pomona and Cynthia that went towards the coast of Flanders and Zealand." Copy.

Postscript. "I shall send a letter to Emden to see what is going on, with a letter to the Hereditary Prince of Orange."

VICE-ADMIRAL MITCHELL to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 18. Isis, at sea.—"Although the General has, I suppose, wrote you fully, yet as I promised, I shall state to you the very great anxiety and mortification I have suffered since I last wrote you. The weather that evening was favourable, but the alteration that took place next day for the worse, and its unprecedented continuation at this season of the year I shall ever have cause to lament, as well as the many who are so intimately connected with the success of the expedition, amongst these, Sir, you will in particular.

"The convoy has as yet kept up and together wonderfully, and, if it would only moderate, we should be at issue, and will entertain little doubt of our success, in a short while, as the distance is so trifling. I have at noon, as per log, given you our situation, by remarking the bearings of the Texel. I trust that whatever may be the result that no blame will be imputed to me in the management of so large a convoy in the narrow seas, in endeavouring to keep a position to approach a given point the moment the weather will permit. We have had little communication with Lord Duncan as yet from the badness of the weather, but must as soon as possible be in sight to the southward of me with part of his squadron. I never could have believed to have had such a length of bad weather in this month. I hope the seamen will not take it into their heads to think my friend the General is a second Jonas—they have all been sea-sick. My next I trust will be more satisfactory." Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 19. Berlin.—“I have explained to you in my public dispatch the reasons which have induced me to give a short delay to the termination of my residence here; the hasty and passionate measures of the Emperor at this Court require all the assistance which can be derived from the better temper of the English Cabinet; and the present circumstances of Holland and the situation of the Hereditary Prince of Orange have not as yet appeared to admit of my presence on the frontiers giving them any assistance; the moment however that I shall see this change from the impression of Abercromby’s disembarkation, I shall be better able to judge what will be the most useful direction which I can give to my route from hence; meantime I cannot omit the suggesting to you how many important motives there seem to be for your sending the Stadtholder to Brill as soon as the English troops shall have obtained, by the possession of it, the means of placing him there. You are probably no stranger to the contradictory parties and politics which prevail in the family of the Stadtholder, and you certainly have not now to learn that, whatever is the deficiency of his talents for government, he is very entirely determined that neither the Princess nor the Prince shall govern for him; and in spite of the consideration which he shews to her, and the full powers which he has given to him, I am assured that, either absent or present, he will find abundant means of counteracting everything that is done or that is proposed to be done without him. I have already perceived strong traces of this disposition and of the bad effects of it; and although I am aware, that, in some respects, much inconvenience will be produced by the langour and apathy which his presence may bring to the course of active business, nevertheless, upon the whole, I cannot help believing that the unity of councils and measures which would result from his coming to the Brill would, upon the whole, produce more advantage than inconvenience; nor is it a slight motive for this to recollect how much more generally popular is the Stadtholder than the Hereditary Prince in Holland, and how satisfactory an answer the presence of the Stadtholder would give to the loose suggestions which are thrown out, of a desire to supersede him and to place his son in his room. If you agree with me in this view of the subject, you will not find it difficult to use the influence of the Princess of Orange to obtain his speedy embarkation ; for, doubtless, the manly spirit and intelligence of her character will naturally lead her to wish as soon as possible to approach the scene of action, and to see her husband take as forward a figure as he can in the restoration of the government of his country. In my former letter I stated to you the necessity which there was for the presence of the Greffier, a necessity very much increased by the indisposition and inability of the Grand Pensionary ; and as I presume that the Greffier does not mean to separate himself from the Stadtholder, I cannot help wishing to hear of the prompt arrival of both of them, as soon as the Brill and Helvoetsluys are in our possession ; and though I have yet no intelligence of Abercrombie, I cannot help flattering myself that this event has already taken place.

“Mr. Hammond will have told you that Abercrombie’s and Malcolm’s papers were at Walmer, and therefore that, as yet, I have no knowledge of them. My first recommendation to Colonel Malcolm will be that he should see Le Palue, who is a very good military man, full of zeal and intelligence, and with a good deal more of military science than M. D’Yvoy possesses ; but in these matters you know how exclusively every agent wishes to act, and how difficult it is to make any one draw with any other, their mutual hatreds being so much greater than that of the common enemy. I have still the same horror of splashing into all this Dutch tripotage, but, nevertheless, I will work fairly through whatever of it may fairly belong to me if there is any chance of my doing good and real service ; but it is a subject through which, I must very fairly acknowledge, I do not see my way.

“Lord Mulgrave, I know, is not sparing of his pen, and he will probably tell you at length all that has passed between us. The reflection of some days has rather increased than lessened my indignation at the conduct of Austria, and I have done everything which I could to confirm Lord Mulgrave in the prosecution of his journey, in hopes that he will fight a good English battle against these German Jews. I think there is some knavery at Vienna, too, on the part of Rozamousky ; how can it be possible that he should be authorized to approve the siege of Mayence, at the same time that the Emperor of Russia concurs with us in trying to enforce the original plan of campaign ? How can it be that the Russian Emperor consents to surrender the King of Sardinia to the Court of Vienna at the moment when, by Whitworth’s last despatches, he is expressing his apprehensions of their ambitious designs, and proposing to us to make head against them in concert with him ? I have not thought it worth while to notice to you the last proposal from Petersburg, because I think it evident that no such simulacre de congrès could now do any good ; a congress to concert operations in the beginning of this campaign was a good measure, if it could have been brought to bear ; but in the present state of the campaign, with the conquests already made by Austria, and the views which are avowed at Vienna by Thugut to Lord Minto, a congress for the discussion of those views must be a hostile measure towards Austria, and will be so considered by them, and therefore will produce nothing but bickering and ill blood; I do not therefore quote this measure as approving of it, but as a measure which demonstrates at Petersburg the jealousy held there of Austria, at the same moment that Rozamowski is, in the Emperor's name, forwarding and assisting the objects of Austrian ambition. In this state of things I have recommended to Lord Mulgrave to go on immediately to Suwarrow, and learn his sentiments upon the present plan of campaign. We believe here that Suwarrow has unbounded powers from his master, and if he sees the objections which we feel to Thugut's plan, I should recommend to Lord Mulgrave then to go armed with Suwarrow's authority to Vienna, and menace them plainly with the withdrawing the Russian army from Switzerland to Flanders and the bas Rhin, if they persist in their Mayence project against the opinion of Russia and of England. If, on the other hand, Suwarrow approves of the Austrian project on Mayence, and will trust for his army to the support of the intermediate 30,000 men announced for that purpose by Thugut, then and in that case I should think Lord Mulgrave might lend himself to the concert of this plan. To be sure it will be mortifying enough, because if the operations are to be divided, you had much better originally have sent your 45,000 Russians to the middle Rhine; but now, by this measure of Thugut's, you have all the disadvantage of divided operations by the most roundabout course which could have been imagined for them. I have, however, still some hopes of Suwarrow resisting Thugut, and I find he has new means and motives to do so, for the King of Sardinia has made Suwarrow Field Marshal and Commander-in-Chief of all his troops, besides calling him cousin and prince and all the fine names which could be furnished from the Herald's Office at Turin; surely the stout old Russian will never let them lock up these honours at Vienna with the poor miserable King that gave them to him.

"It is now long since I have done all I could by means of Castel Alfieri to hasten the return of the King to Turin, and yesterday his Minister told me that he had profited by all my good lessons, and hoped he had succeeded in obtaining the immediate return of that monarch. Do write to Petersburg and scold our friend Paul out of this shabby dereliction of the Sardinian king which they boast at Vienna to have obtained at Petersburg, but which I still think is a mistake, or a treacherous work in the hands of Rozamowsky. I must not finish this subject without informing you from good authority that the King of Naples has just signed a treaty with Vienna to secure to the house of Austria the succession of Naples, in prejudice of the King of Spain; you see that by this measure they declare their intention at Vienna of becoming masters of all Italy if you will let them.

"I must still add to this long letter upon the subject of General Stamford; you who know how highly I esteem him will not wonder at my desire to retain, as long as I can want it, the benefit of his liberal spirit, of his intelligent and zealous assistance; and I have, though against his inclination, prevailed upon him to consent to pass into Holland whenever I shall be obliged to do so.

“For this purpose I must desire of you to be so good as to obtain a proper letter to him from the Stadtholder. He thinks it best that he should not be recalled from Berlin as Chargé d’Affaires, because that would give an improper appearance of hostility between the house of Orange and Charlottenburg; and I agree with him in wishing that he may receive without delay a permission from the Stadtholder to absent himself for a time from Berlin without being recalled from thence. By this means I shall have the advantage of his society and assistance, and he will still be enabled to be useful at Berlin whenever the occasion shall arise. Pray have the goodness to lose no time in sending the proper letter upon this subject from the Stadtholder.

“I have this moment heard from the Prince of Orange from Lingen of the 15th instant, and have the pleasure to find that Vander Spiegel is at Emerick, and is on his road to Weerdt to meet the Hereditary Prince, with whom he is to return to Lingen.

“They have heard of a firing from cannon near Flushing on the 10th, but I believe it was only the fete of the 10th August; I wish I could feel confident that it was the fete d’Abercrombie. The Hereditary Prince says that all his accounts are good, but the country is so wound up that he fears an immediate explosion, and this fear is another motive for our impatience to hear of Abercrombie.

“Of news I have none, except that Bellegarde is marched with 22,000 men through Savoy to Switzerland, and that Massena, or rather Moreau, has detached two divisions and a half to meet him; surely a fine opportunity for the Archduke to attack.”

Enclosure.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD MINTO.

1799, August 15. Berlin.—“The dispatches which you sent to me under flying-seal, and which arrived here this morning, appeared to me to be so important that my impatience to forward them by the messenger of to-day has prevented me from giving to them as collected an attention as they deserved and required. Shall I not, however, confess the general impression which they made upon me? Shall I not acknowledge that it was difficult for me to read of the immoderate and insatiable demands of Austria with all the patience and good temper with which you have written of them? It is fortunate for you, and for the better occupation of your time, that the English dispatches of which Basset is the bearer to you will not allow of my detaining him long enough to give you the full swing of the Berlin commentary.

“I do not undertake to trouble you with any military criticism upon the new military plan which is proposed, but I confess I think it difficult for the Austrian Cabinet to shew why they could not have satisfied their desire of bringing some force to bear upon the Middle Rhine, by placing there the new corps of 30,000 men, which might still have left the original plan of the allied Courts to its whole and complete strength and effect.

"The complaint which I should feel disposed to make at Vienna is that every single circumstance of every part of the proposals now brought forward by the Austrian Cabinet are each of them conceived in the greediest spirit of separate gain, and there is not even an affectation on their part of accommodating any one of their demands to any other point beyond their own direct and immediate advantage, and that to the most unbounded and immoderate extent.

"What is the change of their plan of operations except a desire of removing from Italy the interruptions which Suwarow gives to their hostile occupation of the dominions of Sardinia? What is the avowed principle of their new march to Mayence but to add to Venice the re-occupation of the Netherlands which they had abandoned for it? Where is it on the whole circle of their territory that they are not looking for and almost announcing their intentions of aggrandisement?

"Their views in Italy no longer rest upon a barrier against France, but openly look to the control of all Italy and the territorial occupation of the greatest part of it; for after Venice, Milan, Piedmont, Savoy, Lombardy, and Tuscany, I know not why the nominal monarchy of Naples should be left, only to do homage to the real sovereign of the whole country; and with this you will observe that they are betraying as restless an avidity on the side of the Low Countries as they could have done if they had lost all their possessions, and were again bargaining for room to breathe round the city of Vienna.

"Look then to the subject of military expense, and see that by the assistance of Russian troops in Italy they have scarcely recovered from their first panic, before they discard their auxiliaries, refuse them bread to eat in the country which they have saved, and desire of Great Britain to pay them and to employ them so as to prevent the French from breaking in upon Austrian Piedmont. If we refuse this we shall be taunted with the failures which will result from it; if we accede to it, instead of multiplying the allied arms by our subsidy, we shall only have relieved the purse of Austria by that of England, without adding new or increased force to be opposed against the common enemy.

"Not to leave the subject of expense, look now at their proposal respecting the convention.

"Thugot tells you fairly that, ratified or unratified, no money can be paid, and no arrears discharged; but what is worse, this ratification, unproductive in payment, is to be equally unsatisfactory even in form, and they will not sign what they have promised to sign, except with the new promise made to them that this signature of theirs shall never be disclosed. What can they think that we want in the ratification if, both in form and substance, it is to be as if it had never happened.

"I will not pursue this harsh and ungracious task which you will naturally think I have too much dwelt upon; but what I chiefly meant to insist upon is, the whole of this heavy account offers not one single article in it which has even the semblance of advantage to the common cause, or to the cause of any power in Europe except the cause of Austria; and surely it a most ungracious proceeding in my old friend Thugut, that in a discussion of common and reciprocal interests, he should not give to us one single article which bears even a friendly seeming in our favour.

"It is very true that his business is to make his demands and to expect yours, but, without some principle of equitable forbearance to be reciprocally applied in these discussions, I do not see how they differ from other acts of hostility, although between the pen and the sword there is some difference in the weapon.

"I must not overlook in my catalogue of Austrian grievances one to which, as to most of them, you are as sensible as I am, though you are more patient and more temperate in treating of them than I am; I mean the solicited mission of Lord Mulgrave, solicited by Thugut himself, and now referred by him to the possible future concert of the next campaign. I was waked this morning by an account that Lord Mulgrave was on his road from Cuxhaven. You will easily believe that I feel for the awkwardness, the indelicacy, and the impropriety of the situation in which he is placed by these projects of Austrian acquisition; but I do not know that in his situation I should feel it incumbent upon me to stop short because Thugut had turned round; I cannot affect to offer any advice to Lord Mulgrave, and certainly he does not stand in need of any, but to me it seems doubtful whether, having come as far as Berlin, he might not with some advantage ask at Vienna through your interference, why he was sent for in July to be sent back in August.

"Upon this point however, as upon the whole of this subject, it will be my province only to hear your decision and his; I wish for his sake he had not come, but he only can decide whether to return or to go on.

"I am ashamed of keeping the messenger from you while I am unprofitably lengthening out this letter; but I have written so much and so freely because I feel confident that you will consider my doing so as the best proof I could give of just and real esteem and friendship.

"I have nothing new to say from Berlin. The King seems confirmed in his neutral system, and rejoices in his escape from his treaty of co-operation; they appear to have no answer yet from Paris. The expedition from England goes on, and I trust that I shall not stay long after the next mail, though I have not yet heard the Cabinet determination.

"The Emperor of Russia has recalled the mission, but that is all; it is very bad, but hostility would have been worse." Copy.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August. Stowe.—"Your gazette extraordinary is indeed most complete; for the progress of Suwarrow leads (as far as I can judge) to the most decided consequences to Switzerland, now open to supplies and assistance; and to southern Italy cut off from all intercourse with France. Still however the fortresses of Piedmont are such a formidable barrier that, unless they have been neglected in every part of their appointment, they will give time to the French to recover the effects of the first blows that have stunned them. These blows must be assisted by offensive operations in Holland and Flanders from England, and with a force equal to the object; and I do not despair of seeing the great nation check-mate, even though Tom's Prussian shall continue as obstinately neutral as he has hitherto done. I see the necessity of this offensive system so strongly, that I am miserable in not having yet seen any measures taken that appear likely to enable you to collect the 25 or 30,000 men necessary for such an operation. As to the French fleet, their manœuvre of sending six Spanish ships from Ferrol to the Isle of Aix, with troops on board, makes that chapter still more inexplicable, unless the putting into that port has been matter of necessity and not of choice. At all events, I should imagine that the Mediterranean is now the object, as it opens to them a very wide field of enterprise and of relief to their falling cause in Egypt, Malta, Naples; and I fear that you cannot hope to guard against all of the very many contingencies that may turn up as trumps to them in that quarter. I cannot help thinking that more ships might be spared for the reinforcement of Lord St. Vincent without risking Ireland.

"I am now to be a suitor to you on behalf of our friend Praed, who wants to convert a St. Ives parson into a holder of two livings by the magic talisman of a chaplaincy, which I cannot give him, my list being full, and which he and I humbly sue at your hands."

THE HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, August 19. Lingén.—Revenu hier-au-soir de l'entrevue que j'ai eue avec le conseiller Pensionnaire, et à la quelle ont également assistés le Drossard Bentinck et le conseiller Brandsen, je m'empresse de vous informer que j'ai trouvé le premier de ces Messieurs jouissant d'une fort bonne santé, et ayant la tête aussi nette qu'il soit possible de le désirer. Il a pris ses mesures de manière à pouvoir rester jusqu'à ce que nous puissions pénétrer dans la République même. Les idées de M. Van der Spiegel relativement à l'établissement d'une administration provisoire dans les Provinces s'accordent, en général, avec les miennes, de même que sur la convocation des membres qui formeront l'administration de l'union, et prendront la place des Etats Généraux. Vous serez à même d'en juger par le mémoire dont je vous envoie ci-joint la copie, ainsi que de la proclamation telle qu'elle a été définitivement arrêtée après les conversations tenues avec ces Messieurs. Vous remarquerez qu'elle est parfaitement conforme à celles qui ont été dressées en Angleterre, et que les difficultés que le mot d'amnestie paroissoit offrir à bien des personnes, se trouvent levées par la tournure qui a été donnée à cet article, qui, pour le fond, est resté le même.

“ Je m'étois flatté de trouver Aylva et Mollerus au rendez-vous proposé, mais j'ai été trompé dans cet espoir. Mollerus m'a fait savoir que la crainte d'exposer sa femme et ses enfans, et la possibilité qu'il fut obligé de rester hors du pays l'avoient engagé à renoncer à son projet.

“ On m'écrit de Berlin que M. de Haugwitz a continué après mon départ à donner les assurances les plus prononcées sur la rupture des négociations avec le Directoire, mais que, tout nouvellement, il étoit aisé de voir qu'il cherchoit à se rapprocher lui-même des principes d'après lesquels il étoit forcé d'agir, et de justifier le changement par le désespoir, et par la conviction que le parti étoit pris sans retour ; qu'il ne dissimuloit plus que les bases proposées par le Gouvernement Francois tendent à ce qu'aucune des puissances coalisées n'aye des relations dans la République ; en un mot qu'il est question du rétablissement du Stadhouderat accordé par le Directoire à l'intercession Prussienne, et à condition de rester lié aux mesures utiles et avantageuses à la France.

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 20. Park Street, Westminster.—“ I have been changing backwards and forwards in great uncertainty respecting the choice of a proper residence for Monsieur ; but am upon the whole inclined to rest in my original opinion, especially when confirmed by that of Monsieur himself, that the Isle of Wight would have too strongly the air of something being intended on the coast of France to be consistent with the system necessarily acted upon at present of keeping back the insurrection of the Royalists as long as possible. If the effect of Monsieur's presence in the Isle of Wight was to be the attraction of our thoughts, the drawing down of our blood-sluices to that quarter, I should feel, perhaps, in that consideration a compensation for every other inconvenience. But as I fear it will make no difference in that respect, I yield to my own first apprehensions, backed by a pretty strong opinion on his part, and should prefer to see him placed in some part less declaratory of an intention to make use of him on the side which such a situation as the Isle of Wight would seem to indicate. Perhaps, if the Isle of Wight should ultimately be chosen, as I understand it to be the situation which is at present looked to, a corrective of what I apprehend may be found in the opinion that the placing him there was intended only as a blind ; and that we can never intend any serious operations in France while we are sending all our force to be ingulfed (I beg pardon for the expression) in the bogs of Holland.

That we may not be driven to determine upon the Isle of Wight for want of some other situation let me at least mention that, in talking with Pelham this morning, two places have occurred to him; one a house of Lord Onslow's near Guildford, which he conceives may be at present to be let; another a house of his father's in Sussex, upon the coast indeed and close to the shore, but not in a part which has ever been marked out as being, or which is capable of becoming a place of embarkation. The former of these, in respect of its distance from London, I should say was the most eligible. Cranbourne would appear to me a very proper place, but I am afraid it would not appear so to others. Swinley, I understand, has not sufficient accommodation even for the few persons that Monsieur would have with him. The King's house at Newmarket which has likewise occurred, would be objectionable on account of the possibility of his stay being extended till the time of the October meeting. Cheveley, if untenanted, would only partake in the objection of being somewhat too far distant from London. A means of enabling him to quit London, which is what he is most anxious about, cannot fail to be speedily found, if a proper person is employed whose business it should be to make the enquiry.

"I cannot but apprehend a further inconvenience in placing Monsieur in a situation which may seem to imply an intention of acting on the coast of France, namely the use which may be made of the circumstance in the Opposition prints. If Parliament were sitting, or if we had any papers that would take up the question on the other side, I should think the circumstance a recommendation. But, in the sort of unoccupied and untenanted state in which men's minds are apt to be upon questions of this sort, I should have great fear of the notions with which they might first be filled, and still more of the impression with such notions might make upon our counsels. If you think that we are proof against this danger, the objection loses of course the greater part of its force.

"There is a matter of another sort which I have often forgot to mention, particularly when I saw you at your house the other day. I have never known distinctly what the sort of minutes were that were kept of the proceedings of Cabinet; or how far those who were present, and have entered no express declaration of dissent, would appear on any sort of record as parties to the measures adopted. It has happened, of course, on numerous occasions that I have felt myself in a minority with respect to questions more or less discussed in Cabinet, without any wish to mark my dissent from the decision generally taken. On the principal questions respecting the negotiations for peace, that dissent, I conceive, was marked, as far as I felt it at the time necessary to be so, by my either being absent or being entered as such. The same happened on some of the questions which seemed to decide on the general direction given to the war in the beginning of '96. But the change of system adopted at that time came on in such a way, and rested, as far as I recollect, so little on any decision of Cabinet formally taken, that I hardly know whether the opinions of individual members, one way or another, were likely to appear.

“Upon the present occasion my opinion is, I am sorry to think, so decidedly adverse to the course of proceeding adopted, and which has, I know, your particular concurrence, and the subject is of itself so important that, though I have no particular anxiety to mark my dissent, I should naturally feel unwilling to appear on the face of any document as having concurred in it. The course of proceeding which I mean is that of directing our force against Holland and Flanders, instead of reserving it for operations on the coast of France as soon as the allies shall have entered from the other side. In this, as in other cases, the general measure has come on so gradually, and often in a way to be so little of a res integra at the time when it has been mentioned that, having no previous notice of the questions about to be proposed, it has been difficult to say where dissent could be distinctly expressed. But I believe you will readily agree that there has been no time in which the coast of France would not have been my primary object, supposing the allies to have been ready to co-operate; or in which I did not declare my wish, so far as occasions occurred of declaring it, that we should leave ourselves open for that object, supposing the case to happen in which alone it could be desirable.

“All, therefore, that I am anxious about is that I may, in some way or another, avoid the appearance of concurring in a system which is directly repugnant to my own ideas. I should have no objection to stating my reasons at length, grounding, of course, my dissent not upon anything arising out of the event, and which in fact is as likely to prove adverse to my opinion as favourable to it, but upon those considerations that have at all times determined me, and with which the event has very little to do. I am not solicitous, however, for more than that I may not be considered as assenting to the present measures. In my idea the expedition to Holland can in no degree answer, except in the single case of the country being surrendered to us, so as to admit of our troops being drawn away in time for co-operation with the allies as soon as they may have entered France; and I do not think the probability of that case happening, or the advantages to be expected from it so great as that I should be willing for the sake of that hope to risk the evils which, in different degrees, will arise, as I conceive, upon every other supposition.

“I have delayed this letter so long, in consequence of some matters which have engrossed my thoughts of a private nature, that the first part will, I fear, have become useless. Should anything be necessary on the other subject to answer the purpose which I have stated, I will be obliged to you to let me know.”

GEORGE HAMMOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 21. Downing Street.—“I am very happy to send your Lordship a copy of Captain Reynold’s letter, which gives as satisfactory an account of the expedition as could I think be hoped. The Griper gun boat is arrived at Sunderland. The Lieutenant of her reports that he left the fleet also after the gale (having suffered so much that he was obliged to make for the nearest port) and that the fleet was collected, and none of them appeared to have suffered excepting his own vessel and two of the troop-ships which had lost their main top sail yards.

"Mr. Pitt has desired me to say that he thinks there will be some account before Friday, on which day he will most certainly be in town, but he shall hold himself in readiness for coming to-morrow in the event of any accounts being received in the course of this night or to-morrow morning. Count John Bentinck has been here. He says that Count Rhoon, being anxious to see your Lordship before he sees the Prince of Orange or any other person, will wait upon your Lordship at Dropmore to-morrow morning."

Postscript. "Your Lordship will recollect that the gale of Thursday was the first and most violent we had. Admiral Mitchell's squadron got sight of Lord Duncan's fleet before the Pomona parted from the former."

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 21. Harley Street.—"Je vous envoi la traduction de la dépêche que votre courier m'a apporté ce matin de Petersbourg. Je joins aussi la lettre confidentielle que j'ai reçu de Comte Kotchoubei. Gardez la première, mais je vous prie de me renvoyer la seconde. Il me semble que les explications que notre Cour demande à ses alliés sont prématurées, et qu'elle a tort de croire que la guerre est sur le point d'être terminée. J'espère que vous ne m'oublierez pas quand vous viendrez en ville, et que vous me ferez savoir quand je pourai vous voir."

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 21. Downing Street.—"The shortest way of showing you the progress we have made is to send you the letter and return this morning received. There are transports ready for six thousand men, which therefore can be ordered anywhere within an hour after we receive accounts from Sir Ralph Abercrombie."

LORD GRENVILLE TO HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 22. Dropmore.—"I have received your letter with the return, which is indeed highly satisfactory. The intelligence I sent you yesterday speaks of reinforcements being sent to the Helder, and although I trust there is little doubt of our succeeding there in the first instance, yet I submit to you whether the next 6,000 men should not now be embarked without waiting to hear more, and sent to Lord Duncan's rendezvous, from whence he would either send them to join Abercrombie, or in case (I hope and trust a very improbable one) of any unexpected misfortune, he would prevent their committing themselves to any risk, and would either send them on to Delfzyl, or return them to you.

"It must be expected that on Abercrombie's first landing every effort will be made that they can make to oppose him. The first week or ten days is therefore the critical period, and if they should be stronger than we expect, a few days either way may be very material.

"When these six thousand have joined him, he will have little less than 20,000 troops, besides the assistance of as many seamen and marines as he can draw from Lord Duncan's fleet; and with that force he will surely be strong enough to wait for the Russians, if not to advance. The next division after these six thousand might therefore I hope go to Ameland. If he should succeed more rapidly than he had hoped, and should himself judge that he does not want the first 6,000, he may send them round to Ameland, but this is not likely.

"I am greatly obliged to you for having settled Craufurd's business in a manner which, I trust, will remove all difficulties."
Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 22. London.—"I need not say anything in answer to your letter of yesterday, as the letter from the Duke of York will have set your mind at ease on the subject of Colonel Craufurd. In truth it is a great convenience to put him in the department along with Colonel Anstruther.

"I have this morning heard from Sir Ralph Abercrombie and Admiral Mitchell. I send you copies.* It is miraculous how they have kept together, and I trust I am not too sanguine in hoping that we are soon to [hear] of their having made good their landing. I have sent the orders for the two brigades at Barham Downs for which we have transports to march immediately and embark. That is all Sir R. Abercrombie suggests; but I confess to you my own feelings dictate that I ought to follow that order with another to sail, even if I should not hear further from Sir Ralph in the course of this day or to-morrow. If under any unexpected disappointment they should be even obliged to return without being of use, I don't think that is a reason which ought to weigh with me, for the chance of a disappointment in the first instance is not to be put in competition with the important benefits that may arise from the arrival of so substantial a reinforcement at a critical moment when they may be wanted."

COUNT STARHEMBERG TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 22. London.—"J'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer ci-joint une lettre que j'ai reçu du Prince de Salm mon cousin, ci-devant au service d'Angleterre, et toujours dévoué de cœur et d'âme, comme tout bon gentilhomme et honnête homme doit l'être, à la cause du trône et de l'autel. Vous verrez par cette lettre même combien il est important que le pauvre prince ne soit pas nommé ni compromis. Le zèle anime, ce me semble, les deux cousins qui n'ont rien de caché pour l'homme en place que j'aime et respecte, même quand il me tient rigueur.

* See pages 296, 297.

“Je connois cet Angely dont parle le Prince de Salm. C'est décidément un gueux, et le Comte de Woronsow, qui le connoit encore mieux que moi, peut vous donner des renseignemens plus circonstanciés sur son compte. D'après cela, je me suis acquitté d'un devoir, et j'abandonne le reste à votre sagesse.

“J'ai reçu hiér dépêches et lettres volumineuses de M. de Cobentzl. Il m'informe en grand détail de tout ce qui s'est passé, se passe, et se passera. J'avois deviné une partie de ce qu'il me dit, et il m'a appris le reste. J'infère du sens de ses écrits et de ses instructions que l'on va enfin en passer par la ratification. Tandem, tandem. Il me mande aussi que pour l'aider dans ses négociations futures, M. le Chevalier de Witteworth vous demande un adjoint, et qu'il indique Lord Auckland et Lord Malmsbury. La prévention très déplacée qu'on a pris contre ce dernier, dont je sais pour ma part apprécier les talens, feroit qu'on le verroit arriver avec peine (je parle de ma Cour, s'entend) mais on m'a donné l'ordre d'insinuer que Lord St. Helens seroit fort agréable. Vous savez que mes insinuations se font toujours ainsi de vous à moi, parceque vous ne compromettiez jamais votre ami. Le Comte de Cobentzl me paroît désirer singulièrement ce ministre. Je sais qu'il a bien de l'esprit, qu'il est honnête, aimable, et je suis même lié avec lui, mais ce n'est pas à moi à prononcer. Ne faites, de grace, aucun usage de tout ceci, et croyez à mon tendre attachement.”

Postscript. “J'oubliais de vous dire qu'Angely avait trouvé le moyen de tromper le Prince d'Orange, qui en a été la dupe, et l'est encore, je crois. Il l'employoit autrefois.”

THE HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, August 22. Lingen.—“Les informations que j'ai reçues depuis le départ de ma dernière lettre, ne contiennent rien de nouveau sur la situation intérieure du pays. Le nombre des jeunes gens qui en sortent pour se soustraire à la réquisition augmente journellement, depuis qu'il paroît que cette mesure se poursuit avec vigueur.

“On débite depuis quelque jours, que les ordres ont été donnés pour faire marcher 4 bataillons à Zwoll, ainsi que 1,400 Francois de ceux qui viennent d'être fait prisonniers en Italie, et se sont engagés à ne pas servir de trois ans contre l'Empereur. Cette nouvelle merite cependant confirmation et paroît d'autant moins probable que l'on n'a rien appris jusqu'ici de l'arrivée de ces prisonniers, et qu'il n'est pas apparent que l'on désorganise la Nord Hollande de troupes Bataves pour les envoyer de ces cotés-ci. Ce qu'il y a de sûr, c'est que deux commissaires nommés Dekker et Rutmulder viennent d'arriver à Zwoll, et qu'ils ont ordre d'ouvrir toutes les lettres et d'examiner les voyageurs qui viennent de ces quartiers-ci. Je puis vous mander aujourd'hui que nous sommes en correspondance avec un des principaux ingénieurs, qui a la direction des mesures de defense entre la Meuse et l'Escaut, et qu'il a déjà donné des informations qui indiquent qu'il est de bonne foi, et qui m'ont décidé à lui faire passer une somme d'argent, et à lui promettre pour l'avenir une pension qui sera proportionné au service qu'il rendra. D'après ses rapports il paroît que les inondations n'ont pas encore été formées à Bois le Duc comme on l'avoit assuré.

"Hiér-au-soir j'ai reçu le rapport ci-joint (A.)^o de la conversation que F. Fagel a eue le 4 et le 6 de ce mois avec Van Braam, et qui n'indique pas une volonté bien prononcée de sa part de remplir ses engagements. Comme, au reste, la conversation est, à ce que je crois, antérieure à l'entrevue que Verheul a eue avec Van Braam, et dont je vous ai déjà donné avis, il est possible qu'il soit décidé à tenir parole; l'événement en décidera.

"Le Collonel Malcolm, nommé par le Gouvernement Britannique pour s'aboucher avec Yvoy, et concerter ce qu'il y aura à faire pour organiser l'insurrection dans la Belgique, est arrivé à Elten, et lui a communiqué ses instructions. D'après ce que Yvoy me mande, elles sont fort étendues, mais il ne paroît muni d'aucune autorisation relativement aux fonds dont on aura besoin pour cet objet. En attendant, il a pris sur lui de faire l'achat de dix mille fusils, et il s'est arrangé avec Yvoy pour l'envoy et la distribution de ces armes.

"Les nouveaux renseignements qui ont été pris dans la Belgique pour sonder les dispositions des principaux membres des États, sont tous satisfaisants. Il en est de même de la généralité de la nation. Toutes les classes paroissent fort portées pour une réunion, au cas que la maison d'Autriche se décide à en céder la possession. Le Vicaire-Général ayant fait une tournée dans différentes villes de la province d'Hollande ainsi qu'à Utrecht et Nimegue, dans le but de disposer les esprits parmi les Catholiques en faveur de la maison d'Orange, en est revenu fort satisfait. Il a trouvé chez les principaux curés dans ces villes des dispositions très favorables, et l'inclination de travailler les esprits, dans le même sens, par tous les moyens que leur religion leur fournit l'occasion d'employer.

"Ci-jointe (B.) je vous envoie la copie d'une Note qui m'a été adressée par l'Evêque de Ruremonde, et qui contient les points sur les quels il souhaiteroit que les Catholiques fussent avantagés. Ces demandes me paroissent modérées, et n'éprouveront, à ce qu'il me semble, point de difficultés. Je vous prierai au reste de vouloir bien me faire parvenir vos ordres à cet égard; en attendant, je me suis borné à donner provisionnellement la réponse ci-jointe (C.)

"Je vous envoie (D.) la copie d'une lettre que j'ai reçue du Roi au sujet des bruits qui s'étoient repandus comme s'il s'effectuait de ces cotés-ci un rassemblement de troupes. Vous trouverez également la réponse (E.) que j'ai faite à Sa Majesté, ainsi que la copie de la lettre (F.) que j'ai adressée au Général de Blucher sur cette affaire. Celui-ci m'a déjà fait savoir, comme vous verrez par la pièce annexe (G.) qu'il avoit fait un rapport fidèle au vrai état des choses, ainsi je n'ai pas de doute que cet incident n'aura aucune suite ultérieure.

“Ci-jointe (sous lettre H.) se trouve aussi la copie de la proclamation, qui n’a pas pu être envoyée par le dernier courier.”

Note by H. Fagel.

“The enclosures D. E. F. H. being in German and Dutch, I have not thought it proper to trouble your Lordship with. The three first are the correspondence of the Hereditary Prince about the objections made by the King of Prussia to the increased number of Dutch officers upon the frontier.

“The last is the Hereditary Prince’s proclamation, with a few slight alterations adopted in consequence of the Pensionary’s suggestions.”

Enclosure (B).

A letter to the Hereditary Prince from the Bishop of Ruremonde complaining of restraints on the free exercise of the Catholic religion formerly imposed by Dutch authorities under the rule of the House of Orange.

1799, le 19 Aout. Emmerick.—“L’évêque de Ruremonde expose, avec le plus profond respect, qu’ayant eu communication de la lettre de votre altesse sérénissime du 6 Juillet dernier, adressée à Monsieur le Baron d’Yvoi, il a de suite et de conséquence écrit à un des principaux ecclésiastiques du diocèse de Bois le Duc; que son vicaire-général, Monsieur Syben résidant à Nimegue, s’est adressé en suite de la même lettre du 6 Juillet et pour remplir les vues y reprises, à plusieurs et les plus notables du clergé des territoires de Nimegue, Meuse et Waal, et du Pays de Cuyck, faisant tous partie du diocèse de Ruremonde.

“Qu’ensuite de la commission de M. le Baron d’Yvoi, qui lui avoit été communiquée par Monsieur Michiels, le dit vicaire-général s’est porté dans différentes villes et places de la République des Provinces-Unies, que cette commission a été remplie avec autant de promptitude que de succès.

“Le suppliant expose que, sous la juridiction des différents Magistrats, Drossards, et Baillifs des sus-dits pays, situés dans son diocèse, ils se sont rencontré ci-devant plusieurs entraves au libre culte de la religion Catholique, entr’autres, et nommément, que les orphelins Catholiques dépourvus des moyens de subsistance, entrant dans les maisons destinées à leur entretien, y devoient renoncer leur religion, où ils sont maintenant recus sans être contraints de faire un si triste sacrifice, et où ils sont cependant élevés maintenant sous des maitres et des provideurs de la religion Catholique.

“Et comme il convient pour le bien public que le culte de la religion Catholique soit à tous égards libre et sans gêne, le soussignée supplie très humblement votre altesse sérénissime de daigner y pourvoir de la manière qu'elle trouvera dans sa haute sagesse la plus convenable, et la plus propre pour étouffer à jamais tout espoir de dissension.”

Enclosure (C).

The Prince's reply, expressing a confident belief of his father's desire to grant full toleration to the Catholics of the Dutch Republic.

“En possession des représentations que vous m'avez adressées par le canal de M. d'Yvoy, je m'empresse de vous informer que je n'ai pas manqué de les porter à la connoissance de mon père, ne m'étant pas possible de vous donner une réponse positive aux demandes qu'elles contiennent avant de connoître ses intentions sur ces objets. Il m'est cependant permis de vous assurer, d'après la connoissance que j'ai de la manière de penser de mon père, et ainsi que je l'ai marqué à M. d'Yvoy dans ma lettre du 6 Juillet, qu'il est très éloigné d'avoir les sentimens d'intolérance pour les Catholiques Romains qui lui ont été quelquefois imputés ; qu'au contraire, il est prêt à employer toute son influence, quand il sera rétabli dans les charges héréditaires, pour faire obtenir à tous ceux de cette religion les mêmes avantages dont ils ont joui dans les provinces où ils étoient le moins entravés, à quel égard je me flatte que vous voudrez être persuadé que j'ai les mêmes sentimens. En conséquence j'ose espérer que les points que vous désirez que soient accordés ne souffriront pas de grandes difficultés, et me flatte que tout pourra s'arranger au gré de vos désirs.”

LIEUT.-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY to
HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 23. Off the Texel.—“Since I had the honour of writing you last we have had only two days that afforded us the means of carrying into execution the orders with which we were charged. The 20th was a calm, the 21st moderate; the General Officers came on board the Isis and received their instructions to land the troops on the 22nd, between Huyck Down and Callants Oog.

“When we were on the point of landing, the weather became so tempestuous that we had not a moment to lose in getting under weigh, and in going to sea ; it now blows very hard and there is no appearance of any change. We mean to remain here till Tuesday morning the 27th, when we shall sail for the Ems with one week's provision of water, bread, and beef. Should any opportunity offer to land on the coast of Holland near the Helder, we shall eagerly embrace it. The Admiral will leave cruisers to acquaint any vessels from England of our destination. The convoy hitherto has kept well together. They have not indeed any port into which they can go. With this wind we can fetch no port except the Firth of Forth or Cromarty bay. Colonel Maitland and Captain Winthrope of the navy went to the Texel on the 20th in the evening, and have not brought us back any answer to the summons they carried, owing probably to the badness of the weather. You may rest assured that nothing shall be wanting on our part to fulfil our orders; but the difficulties are not of an ordinary kind." Copy.

W. HUSKISSON.

1799, August 23. H.M.S. Isis, off the Texel.—“In my last to Mr. Dundas you will find what kind of weather we had experienced. On the 20th a calm succeeded heavy gales of wind; on that day I went with the Admiral on board the Kent. Lord Duncan concurred in the attack on the Helder and on the Dutch fleet, and gave Admiral Mitchell ten line of battle ships for that service. The 21st was very moderate; the general officers came on board the Isis and received their orders to land next day between Huyck Down and Callant's Oog. We made land about noon, and in the evening Maitland and Captain Winthrope were sent in the Coburg cutter with a summons to the Dutch Admiral and officers commanding the land forces, with copies of the Prince of Orange's declaration and the proclamation in my name; they were directed not to deliver their despatches but to the chiefs themselves. We came to anchor in the evening of the 21st, weighed on the morning of the 22nd, but were almost immediately obliged, from the wind and tide, to anchor again, and to stand into the Hack [Mars?] Channel. At noon unfortunately the weather suddenly changed, it blew a perfect gale of wind. We were obliged to put to sea without a moment's delay, and this morning the gale continues. The convoy keeps well together, owing, I believe, to their having no port to which they can possibly run. Maitland and Winthrope are not yet returned. We suppose they were admitted to see Storey and Colonel Genguel the Commandant at the Helder. There did not appear to be any considerable shew of troops near the Helder, nor any batteries except those on the right and left of the Helder Town. The Dutch ships of war were placed to defend the two passages into the Zuyder Zee. On our approach two frigates got under weigh, and one of them came to an anchor, possibly to cut away the buoys if necessary. The buoys leading over the Hack Deep [Mars Diep?] were not removed, and a frigate of ours anchored to secure them. We mean to cruise here till the evening of Monday next the 26th instant, in hopes that the weather may become more favourable; although our views are now clear, we shall not hesitate to attempt a landing, and we hope to receive reinforcements from the Downs before that day. The state of our water and provisions will not allow us to remain longer; we shall then proceed to the Ems with about a week's water and provisions on board the transports. In the Ems, where we may expect smooth water, the ships of war can afford us a small supply. We shall of course leave cruizers off the Texel to acquaint any ships from England of our destination. I am fully aware that the risk of anchoring with near 200 sail of ships on a beach affording no shelter, and exposed to the prevailing winds, and of then disembarking on a hostile shore a great body of troops, is beyond the rule of prudence and common sense; yet I know that circumstances may palliate at one time what would be inexcusable at another. The island of Ameland is a 'Ridiculus Mus.' I cannot think of it. A company of marines, from Lord Duncan's fleet, is sufficient for such a conquest." Copy.

SIR JAMES CRAUFURD to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 23. Hamburgh.—“I hope I shall not be thought presumptuous in venturing very humbly to state my wishes to your Lordship that if, in consequence of the fortunate turn of affairs which seems to be near at hand, a minister or any person with whatever title should be sent to the Low Countries to observe what passes there (a minister of course will not be sent till it be settled who is to have those countries, and till some government be established) I may be allowed to exchange my present mission for that situation; unless, which I am not vain enough to suppose, your Lordship should have any other destination for me. I do not presume to ask you for promotion, but merely to be allowed to exchange my present employment for one not superior.

“In the event of the communication with England being opened anew by the way of Holland or the Low Countries, this mission, I conceive, would cease to be interesting. One great object of it at least would no longer exist; the present circuitous road would, of course, no longer be taken by the disaffected Irish and English, and the French agents who pass and repass between England and the continent; they would then naturally resort to the towns and ports of the Low Countries. Of course, if I have hitherto been of any use in watching the motions of these people, I flatter myself that I might be of more, in such a state of things, if placed in the Netherlands, than if I continue here; and the experience of a year and a half in this sort of employment may give me some advantages which another might not have.

“Whatever fate my request may have, your Lordship, I hope, will pardon it with your wonted indulgence, and attribute it to a desire, not I trust an illaudable one, of being always in an active scene of employment, as well as that of going to a country infinitely more agreeable to me, and more suited to my circumstances than this.”

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 23. Stowe.—“Your suspicions respecting your miserable Prince are, as you see by the enclosed, perfectly well founded. I own that I think he had better for his own sake, and for yours, go back to Edinburgh, if his voyage is as undecided as when you last wrote; for the idea of the Isle of Wight will exactly leave him, as well as you, open to every plague that can arise out of the tracasseries of the émigrés; and as he cannot be to remain long in that same isle, you will be at last to move him. Now by letting him (in his present humour) go back to Holyrood, you have the full means of keeping him, without inconvenience, waiting till the beau moment arrives. All this is writ under the idea that nothing is in perspective for the coast of France; for if the news of the last mail lead you to believe that anything may arise there to which it would be fit to employ Monsieur, the Isle of Wight seems a very proper berth for him for the present. I shall merely answer that I take it for granted that, in any arrangement that may be proposed to him, it would be wished to meet his Royal Highness's convenience and comfort, and to reconcile those objects as much as possible with the several means that may present themselves of making his talents and situation useful to the common cause; and therefore I shall recommend him to abide by your advice whatever it may be.”

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, August 23. Dropmore.—“Je vous suis bien obligé pour votre avis confidentiel, dont je ne manquerai pas de profiter. J'avois déjà donné aux deux ministres du Duc de W[irtemberg] une réponse verbale dans ce sens, et celle que je leur dois par écrit y sera conforme.

“Je vous renvoie la lettre de M. de Kotschouby. Je suis parfaitement de votre avis sur le contenu de la dépêche. Il vaudroit bien mieux continuer la guerre avec vigueur que de commencer déjà à se disputer les dépouilles d'un ennemi abattu, il est vrai, mais pas terrassé. Jamais cette discussion ne produira rien de bon, et il y a cent contre un à parier qu'elle mettra la discorde entre les puissances.

“L'idée d'un congrès de paix à plus d'un mois de distance du théâtre de la guerre est de toute impossibilité—et, d'ailleurs, d'où apprend—on que le Directoire songe à un congrès de paix, lui qui fait des efforts pour mettre en campagne pour l'année prochain cinq cent mille hommes.

“Vous savez que nous avons des nouvelles de notre expédition jusqu'à dimanche. Elle tenoit encore la mer, et le convoi n'étoit pas dispersé. Le temp nous a été bien contraire, et de toute manière.” Copy.

SPENCER SMITH TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 23. Constantinople.—“I have been honoured with your Lordship's letter of 9 December, introductory of Mr.

Leake, one of the officers belonging to B[rigadier] General Koehler's detachment.

"I need hardly say how perfectly desirous I ever am of shewing the best attention to such a recommendation, but I have to regret, in the present instance, the difficulty which this gentleman's distant behaviour throws in the way of my obedience to your Lordship's commands to the extent I could wish.

"Mr. Leake, in common with the other gentlemen of his Majesty's military mission, keep themselves so aloof and insulated, in a manner, with respect to the post I occupy, that although they arrived at Constantinople with the Charon so long ago as the 14 June, and have ever since inhabited either this residence, or the same village in the environs that I occasionally resort to for fresh air, and consequently that we have often met, yet it was only on the 11th instant that the General thought proper to make me acquainted with these gentlemen at a visit I paid to him; and it was four days ago that your Lordship's letter was sent to me by the bearer; since when I have not been so fortunate as to meet with him at home. I should not be thus circumstantial in my notice of an occurrence of this nature but that the general style and manners of these military travellers, and more particularly their deportment towards myself and the factory, have struck everyone as quite a novelty at this place, and affords room to apprehend misrepresentation or complaints of want of hospitality which, I can assure your Lordship, we always exercise; and that upon the most easy terms to all strangers, and particularly such whose respectability of character, as in the present case, speaks for itself.

"Having my pen in hand in this way, your Lordship will permit me to join in an act of justice which I understand my two noble friends, Lord Nelson and Sir W. Hamilton, have rendered to a very meritorious person. I understand these distinguished personages have written your Lordship a joint letter in favour of poor Foresti, our excellent fellow labourer at Zante.

"It is now near six years that in my public and private capacity I have known Consul Foresti. He is, without exception, one of the most indefatigable men of business, and zealous servant of the king and of the public, I am acquainted with in this part of the world. The terra firma jurisdiction of his consulship in Albania brings him partially under mine, and it is difficult to enhance the value of his vigilance and foresight, and the utility of his correspondence during every circumstance of the late and present extraordinary times. His obliging attentions to every wish from hence, and anxious activity of information, his unchangeable devotion to the good cause when under persecution and suffering; in short, take him for all in all, as far as it is possible rightly to appreciate those with whom one has not a personal acquaintance, I do not think there exists a fairer title to some mark of his Majesty's favour, to some indemnification for all he has gone through, in any officer of the line he is in. I cannot suppose the recommendation of my old friend and colleague, Sir William, and of the gallant Admiral to need such a make-weight as my testimony, but I should really be sorry to be behind and left out in a good office in which perhaps I ought to have taken the lead, as the oldest and most direct correspondent of Mr. Foresti, and the one whose post has perhaps the most benefited by his essential services.

"It is with some reluctance that with such matter I couple such an indifferent topic as self; but I have so few opportunities of attracting your Lordship's notice in my individual capacity, that I trust you will pardon me for reminding you of my own situation, having some need of your Lordship's kind patronage, after a stormy and laborious mission, long struggling against untoward circumstances, and under the influence of a climate adverse to my constitution, superseded at the moment I began to reap the enjoyment of a change of circumstances, and of course considered here upon the spot as half disgraced; and, to crown all, thrown more back in the world, by the destruction of my property last March, than I was at my first establishment in this country.

"I presume to lay a request before your Lordship for some mark of favour and approbation of my faithful discharge of every duty to the best of my abilities, that may counteract, in the opinion of the Porte and of the public, the disadvantageous impression of Lord Elgin's arrival over my head.

"And if your Lordship should feel charitably disposed to endeavour to assist me to bear the burthen of a loss of rather more than 2,000*l.*, between my wife and myself, in the late fire, I can furnish you with such a precedent as even the economical Court of Vienna having made this catastrophe serve as a pretext to give a gratuity of [to] every officer of the Internunciature, from first to last, burnt and not burnt, equal to a year's salary; while the Court of Russia, ever foremost in example of munificence, has gone considerably beyond that mark, and with less attention to proportionate calculation.

"And lastly, to take leave once for all of a subject I very reluctantly and diffidently touch upon, I make it my humble request that, in case your Lordship can give me no hopes of remaining at the head of affairs here upon the expiration of Lord Elgin's mission, to the success of which his Lordship and yourself may count upon my best exertions, I may be removed to any residence in the southern parts of Europe; my constitution being no longer proof against a northern winter, which I am morally sure I should never survive. Whereas I have the greatest hope that a timely removal to such a climate as Italy would still restore to me the comfort of animal existence which I have more or less been a stranger to during the first years of my employment here, which is a climate sui generis. It is not for me to pick and chose, or talk of preferences to my superiors, but if your Lordship would allow me to address you here, not as Secretary of State, but as a patron of a more indulgent description, and indeed the only one I possess at this long and distant separation from home, I would fain whisper that I know Sir William Hamilton's desires and intentions of retirement, and that your recollection of me upon that occasion confers an obligation that would cease but with my being, and limit the bounds of all my official ambition. I had rather reside at Naples, with mere bread to eat, than at any other spot upon the known surface of the globe; and, much more, to obtain an honourable post there in my profession would leave me nothing to ask or wish for. I have thought your Lordship may be interested by the perusal of a letter my brother has sent open through my hands for Mr. Nepean, with some papers probably destined for the public eye. I therefore send this packet in the same way to your Lordship's care."

Postscript. "On reverting lately to your Lordship's public correspondence with reference to my own personal prospect in consequence of the change in this mission, I did not fail to derive much comfort from the notification in No. 16, of 18 December, of his Majesty having been graciously pleased to express his intention of conferring upon me the additional character and emoluments of Secretary of Embassy. I, of course, rather studied the gazette for the publication of the appointments connected with this post, and not having seen my new character annexed to Lord Elgin's nomination, I have felt rather uneasy lest such official omission should any ways abridge the slender income I have to count upon for the renewal of all my household establishments, and payment of debt to my predecessor. I trust your Lordship's benevolence will obviate the prejudice to me of any such delay if, as it may be, merely accidental. For, in fact, I do not recollect ever seeing my previous appointments ever so made public at all. In the midst of the haste with which I have been obliged to get through these lines I have received a private letter from the squadron, of which I have judged some passages worthy of your Lordship's attention."

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY to H. DUNDAS.

1799, August 24. H.M.S. Isis, off the Texel.—"Colonel Maitland and Captain Winthorpe returned during the course of the night from on board Admiral Storey's ship in the Texel. They were received with politeness, and had much conversation with Storey, Van Braame, Capelle, and Yurge. They held an equivocal, timid, unmanly language, talked of the situation in which they were placed, and hinted a wish that we should come and relieve them from their embarrassment. From the observations Colonel Maitland and Winthorpe made, the ships appeared ill manned, and the Helder a place of no great strength; the boatmen who conducted them on board their cutter said they were all heartily tired of their situation. Troops and sailors were arriving constantly from the southward. The weather still so severe that we cannot look near the shore. We are short of water and provisions and must run for the Ems. You will naturally see the disadvantages in beginning at this late season our operations at the extremity rather than in the heart of the country. I have the honour to inclose Colonel Guenguel's answer to the summons sent. I send this by the Coburg cutter going in to the Humber to repair. My next letter will be from the Ems. We shall leave cruizers to direct all vessels coming to us to steer for the Ems." Copy.

ADMIRAL LORD DUNCAN to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 24. The Kent, off the Texel.—“I would not let the cutter go off with the dispatches without a few lines to you; particulars of our situation you will have from Sir R. Abercromby and Admiral Mitchell. The weather has only prevented us from being in possession of the Dutch Fleet; it now looks better, and yet am in hopes we will do something. I shall now only add that the most perfect harmony subsists amongst us, and all seem actuated by the same zeal for the public service and the success of the expedition. The Russians also seem impressed with the same sentiments. The weather now looks better and I still have good hopes.” Copy.

VICE-ADMIRAL MITCHELL to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 24. H.M.S. Isis, at sea.—“As Sir Ralph Abercromby has wrote you and I myself have much to do, yet I cannot let this slip away without saying a few words. The weather, ever since we gave up the Goree and Voorn attack, has really been so rough and totally so unfavourable for any communication that little was done until last Tuesday and Wednesday. The General and myself went on board the Kent, talked and settled all matters in the best possible manner. Wednesday, a fine fair day, the General arranged his matters with his officers and I settled everything with the captains. Ships were sent in and even anchored at the destined spot the squadron was to anchor. In short, everything had the appearance of readiness, and I would have trusted success, but on the Thursday morning, when we approached the shore, the wind freshened up to the southward; it headed the squadron and convoy so much, and with the ebb tide, I was obliged to anchor very close to the Hack sand about 6 o'clock in the morning. By noon it blew a gale, and coming more round to the westward with a heavy swell, I was under the painful necessity of getting under weigh to save the transports; the weather that night was the worst we have experienced since we have been out. Yesterday it cleared up, but blowing so hard that although we made the land again, we could not attempt anything, but we held our own all yesterday afternoon, and to-day it blows fresh. We are now standing in; if it moderates we must be ready and make the attempt. It will break my heart if the weather continues. Never could I have expected at this season, and this month in particular, such constant blowing weather. To conclude, late last night, after closing a despatch for the Admiralty, and when the General also wrote you, the flag of truce with which Colonel Maitland on the part of the General, and Captain Winthrope on Lord Duncan's and my part returned, late last night, as the request of Lord Duncan to send in the flag of truce on the Wednesday evening. Captain Winthrope's report, as well as the Colonel's, has made me feel most severely indeed; I shall ever have cause to lament the gale of last Thursday, as I am confident if the day had kept moderate it would have been a brilliant day for old England. They certainly expected us, but were in no strength, and from what they could pick up from Admiral Storey and his captains, the whole fleet of Holland and the possession of the Helder and that peninsula and that port, for a future port, to facilitate our further disembarkation of troops and provisions during the remainder of the campaign, would have been the result of that day's work, and that with little loss on our part, either on shore or in the squadron. The numbers on shore on that day did not exceed 1,300 men, and all the captains that were on board were the Prince's men, the other patriot captains were not sent for. Therefore, the loss to me and the general must be felt with great pain indeed; I must hope the best, and bear it up with the best fortitude I can. I shall begin to think my friend the general is a second Jonas. You'll excuse any incorrectness, as I have three or four to address myself to, Lord Spencer, Lord Duncan, the Admiralty Board and I should have begun with yourself, so this will plead in my favour better, my friend the general having only you to act and communicate with. I shall again, when opportunity offers and worth your information, write you.

"I enclose you Admiral Storey's answer to the summons sent in by Lord Duncan and myself." Copy.

Enclosure.

ADMIRAL STOREY to ADMIRAL LORD DUNCAN.

"If I acceded to the proposal you made to me as an officer, I should be unworthy of the esteem of Lord Duncan, and would lose the good opinion of every honest man. I know the duties I owe to the flag under which I serve, and to my country. Even if your force was to increase to double their number, my sentiments will remain the same, therefore, my Lord, expect of me a defence worthy my honour and my nation. Meanwhile I send instantly your summons to my Government. Should you choose to wait for their decision, I shall inform you of it."

Postscript. "I beg you will communicate my sentiments to Admiral Mitchell." Translation.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY to H. DUNDAS.

1799, August 24. Off the Texel.—"I have just received your letter of the 22nd, and have sent back the cutter to the Downs, directing the commanding officer of the troops embarked there to join us immediately off the Texel, with what force he can bring. Should the weather prove moderate, we shall once more attempt a landing, and we shall, at all events, remain here as long as our water and provisions permit, which cannot be many days longer. The weather within these few hours appears more favourable ; but the wind will not permit us to think of landing.”

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 24. Downing Street.—“The want of a Lord Lieutenant for Hampshire has been attended with much inconvenience in all our late operations, and several arrangements are actually standing still from that circumstance. I have repeatedly mentioned the circumstance to Mr. Pitt, and was obliged to send to him just now upon the same subject, in consequence of a letter received from Colonel Sloane. He informs me that he delayed the appointment of Lord Bolton in consequence of some conversation with you, and that he had omitted to resume the conversation with you. He is gone out of town ; but if there is not some very pressing reasons for the delay, I wish it was intimated to the Duke of Portland that a Lord Lieutenant may be appointed.”

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private and confidential.

1799, August 24. Schaffhausen.—“I venture to take the liberty of mentioning to your Lordship that it has been hinted to me in the Austrian army that any mark of personal attention or approbation on the part of his Majesty would be particularly well taken by the Archduke.

“I throw this out for your Lordship’s consideration without at all presuming to offer an opinion in what way the thing can be done, or whether it can be done at all. I will only add that if anything of the kind were done, it would be highly gratifying to me to have the slightest part in it. A letter in the King’s own hand, supposing an occasion for such a measure should offer itself, was what was suggested to me.

“I am extremely anxious for Lord Mulgrave’s arrival. At present my situation is very awkward, having neither credentials nor instructions that authorise me to talk either to the Archduke or General Korsakoff as I have hitherto done, and I trust entirely to your Lordship to cover all the sins I have been guilty of.

“I wish for Lord Mulgrave’s arrival on another account. I am truly sorry to say so, but it is my duty so to do, though in the strictest confidence and to your Lordship only, that Craufurd’s manner of writing and talking to the Swiss is so exactly contrary to mine that, were it only for the contrast, he must become odious to them.

“Unfortunately I can see no remedy but his immediate removal, or his being placed under some person of higher rank and more unassuming manners.

"It is not possible for me to interfere as I could wish to do for I cannot change his tone or his temper ; and I should therefore gain nothing but his ill will, and lose besides the little influence I have over him. I doubt also, according to his instructions, which only direct him to consult me on political matters, whether I have really any right to interfere at all with any part of his conduct.

"The appointment of the officers ought, unquestionably, in this country to be considered as political, and always was so by every State that raised troops here; but, as my instructions would not bear me out in claiming it, I have thought best to say nothing at all ; but it is absolutely necessary that a new system should be adopted in that respect, otherwise my mission will be a mockery. I wished to have said so when I wrote before on the subject, but the hope of being able to preserve some influence in the appointments prevented me. If I asked it as a favour, Craufurd would do anything for me, but he will neither bear remonstrance nor observation.

"I am entirely persuaded that the Archduke is at last disposed to act with vigour and effect, and I trust that in a day or two I shall have a most satisfactory account to send your Lordship.

"It is difficult to say whether Suwarow is most angry and dissatisfied with the Archduke, or his Royal Highness with Suwarow."

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 26. Downing Street.—"Along with this you will receive copies of my despatches received this morning. We are really very unfortunate ; everything has been done that could be thought of to ensure success, everybody employed in the business are doing their duty with zeal and cordiality, and complete success seems to have been almost certain if we had not been frustrated by the extraordinary circumstance of a ten days' hurricane in the month of August. There is still a chance, for they were to keep their ground till the evening of this day. All yesterday and this day are very moderate, and they may have been able to do their business. But the very delay enables the enemy to collect their strength. Upon this point, however, it would appear that all Count Rhone's [Rhoo] information is inaccurate, and if they could have accomplished their landing at the beginning, it would probably have cost very little. Our reinforcements, luckily, got well away yesterday, and I trust will join them in the course of this day ; which, I hope, will afford a counterbalance to any additional strength their opponents may have collected."

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 26. Berlin.—"You will easily judge of the feverish impatience in which I am passing my time when I know from Mr. Hammond and Lord Spencer's letters that the fleet had sailed on the 13th, and when I know that no news of their arrival was known at the Hague on the 16th, or at Lingen upon the frontiers on the 21st.

"Meanwhile, in order to be more within your reach and nearer to the eastern frontier of Holland, I have determined to go on this day se'nnight to Hamburg, and there to wait the course of events, or to move from thence to any spot where I can help them.

"Haugwiz blusters to Kinkel about all that they will do if France does not quickly answer, but I doubt too much the course of his feeble threats to fancy that he will speak loud enough to be heard by Syéès, and now that I have stayed long enough to avoid all appearance of hostile rupture, I think I cannot do better than to go as soon as I can take leave of the King. The last accounts which I have from the interior of the United Provinces describe a good deal of activity on the part of the French at Berg op Zoom, Breda, Venlo, and Juliers, and, as far as I can trace it, the prevailing notion both at Paris and at Berlin is that we shall attack Flanders in the first instance. By this time I do hope and trust that we have made our attack, and if I do not hear of it in 24 hours more I shall really feel entirely at a loss in what manner to account for the slowness of our arrival at a time when two successive packets have crossed over to Cuxhaven, one on the 19th, and the other on the 22nd. Meantime you will be glad to hear that Van der Spiegel is quite well in mind and body, and is now with the Hereditary Prince at Lingen.

"If any new proof were wanting to show you how completely the King of Prussia was sunk into his miserable system of neutrality, I would refer you to the Hereditary Prince of Orange, and desire him to show you the King's letter to him of the 16th instant, in which complaints are made of the Dutch officers collecting there; and his Prussian Majesty, instead of assisting the Dutch according to his guarantee, or his brother-in-law according to the ordinary relations of families, quotes upon his own brother-in-law his new line of demarkation, and civilly warns him not to let any of his countrymen trespass upon it. You will easily believe that I have not let pass this opportunity of contrasting upon this subject to the Hereditary Prince the conduct of Great Britain with that of his Royal brother-in-law, and I do not think that the comparison will be lost upon him.

"You will see by my letter to Whitworth that, in my indignation with Razomouski, I cannot help suggesting the expediency of there being some Russian Minister at Vienna who will speak his master's real language, and will support more faithfully and efficaciously the duties of an allied Minister. As yet you will have observed that the only two points on which Lord Minto has desired his assistance, namely, the original plan of campaign, and the restoration of the King of Sardinia, are points upon which he has refused to give it, in the very moment when the Emperor was loudly agreeing with Lord Minto, by his language to Whitworth at Petersburg, If I could have my way I would send Panin to Vienna; he would there do real good."

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 26, 11 p.m. Berlin.—“Instead of sending to you by the Dutch officer belonging to the Hereditary Prince of Orange, I am enabled by the arrival of Whitworth’s messenger to forward this more directly to London. I am glad to see that there is no danger of real hostility from Petersburg, and, therefore, that I may safely quit Berlin as soon as I can take leave. I shall still propose to leave Berlin for Hamburg on the 1st or 2nd of September, though I have always told the Hereditary Prince of Orange that I will come to him whenever he really wants me, and, till he does, I do not think that I shall be of any use, but rather in his way and in that of those about him. I have shared all your anxiety about the fleet, but my messenger who is just arrived from Cuxhaven with your letters of the 16th and 20th, tells me the packet-boat which brought them on the 24th had seen the fleet on the 23rd off the Dogger bank a good deal dispersed, but to all appearance without any real injury, and he assures that he counted 136 sail; so if this be correct I hope before now that they are really landed. I have instantly sent to Lingen to tell the Prince of Orange of this new destination for the Texel. I have received half an hour ago, by estatfette from Dresden, an account from Vienna of a bloody victory, as you will see, but it is probably the entire ruin of the French army in the Genoese.

“I do not add anything to this letter, because if I detain the messenger he will miss the packet-boat.

“You will have seen by my later letters that the French have destined a camp for North Holland, which seems to have been from a knowledge of your intention. Pray make somebody always write a line upon the occasion of these alterations, as I am misleading my prince as to the point of attack. I have not yet the papers relative to Abercrombie’s instructions, or those of Malcolm, of whom I hear nothing.

“I do not in this hurry say anything about Oxford, but I think your answer seems quite correct. The object of Parliament is answered at Buckingham. All that could recommend the other, is that it is of more flattering and general testimony. If it came in that shape without being sought by me, I do not feel in it any wrong to Windham, and the custom of the University forbids, I believe, the candidate to be active. My answer when I return would therefore be founded upon a wish to engage in no contest on my part, and upon a readiness to feel and acknowledge the compliment of that election, if it were likely to take place without creating anxiety and ill blood. I have never from Windham had any knowledge of his intentions at Oxford; but I will write of this in more quiet times; my dreams are now of fleets and of Dutchmen.

“I do not find that any new promise of success has as yet offered at Deventer, and therefore it remains to be seen how far the impression of an English landing will open a road from the German frontier ; that road may be immediate upon the first explosion in the country, or it may be delayed until it be opened by military operations beginning from the sea-coast. This result will, I think, be more usefully watched by me in the neighbourhood of the Prince than actually with him, more particularly because he is naturally jealous of control, and uneasy at all which has the appearance of it, and which seems to draw from him the merit of the activity which he so laudably bestows upon this interesting subject. Whenever he seems to wish for me, you will easily believe that I will not be absent, but, in the present state, I have been persuaded that I do better at a little distance than by giving myself more entirely to the circle at Lingen.

"I believe I shall be downright feverish with anxiety till I hear more decisively of this important stroke ; but I must say for you all that you have done stoutly and spiritedly, and that will always be doing handsomely, and generally successfully.

"Do not forget my irritable nerves ; in these interesting days, a post without a letter is as bad as a bullet in the thorax."

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

Most secret.

1799, August 27. Downing Street.—Count Woronzow having made to me a communication similar to that contained in your dispatch No. 58, respecting the establishing at Petersburg a concert as to the further views and measures of the allies for the prosecution of the war, I have, by his Majesty's command, entered with that Minister into a very ample discussion of that subject ; as far as it is possible to go without further explanation from Vienna. And having at his request transmitted to him a note of the outlines of those instructions which, as I had informed him, her Majesty had directed to be transmitted to you on the subject, I think I cannot better put you in possession of his Majesty's views than by sending to you by this messenger a copy of that paper, which contains a summary of the language to be held to the Court of Petersburg on the subject in question.

"On the first article there is not much to be added. The King's views respecting the course and progress of this campaign have been already communicated to you. The recent advices from Vienna prove that very different objects are, unhappily, in the contemplation of that Court ; and the lateness of the season, as well as the reluctance of the Austrian Government to enter into satisfactory explanations with his Majesty, seem to leave little hope that the plan of undertaking the siege of Mayence will now be abandoned.

"It remains, however, to be considered whether the circumstances of the war will be such as to afford any hope that the Russian forces, which will now be united in Switzerland, will be sufficient to follow up the Austrian successes in that quarter, and to penetrate into Franche Comté or to Lyons. This must in a great degree depend on the strength of the French army in that quarter, and on the degree of effective aid which is [to] be expected from the Austrian armies to the right and left of the Russians.

"It will therefore be very useful that you should keep the Emperor's mind as much as possible intent on the main object of the campaign, that of taking winter quarters in Lyons, and of raising the standard of royalty there. And it is particularly to be desired that you should succeed in reconciling His Imperial Majesty's mind to the employment of the Count d'Artois, whose situation points him out as so much the fittest of the French Princes to be employed there, and whose character (if it may be judged of by his conduct here) is no longer liable to the objections which might perhaps be justly made to it at an earlier period of his life.

"I had great pleasure in seeing from your despatch No. 64, that the Emperor was himself so much bent upon the prosecution of the war against the common enemy, as to be forming plans for carrying it on even without the aid of Austria. I presume that it is on some such plan as this that the orders, to which the enclosed despatch from Colonel Ramsay alludes, were given to General Korsakow.

"Nothing can be clearer than the understanding of the two Courts on the subject to which that despatch refers, nor than the stipulation of the treaty respecting it. And I should hope that, by the plans which are now adopted, there is even less danger than before of any misunderstanding upon it. Any representation respecting it on your part might, I think, unnecessarily tend to implicate General Korsakow in a manner by no means to be desired, and I trust it will be sufficient if you keep your attention fixed on this subject, and bring it incidentally from time to time under the Emperor's view in its true light.

"It is only on the spot, and by professional opinions, that it can be decided whether after the reconquest of Switzerland it will be possible and prudent to attempt to push the Russian army forward into France, with the aid of no greater Austrian force than the Court of Vienna now proposes to leave in that quarter. But it will be essential that the Russian General should have full powers to pursue this plan if it shall appear practicable, and should be instructed to turn his attention to it preferably to any other.

"The necessity of choosing a more central place than Petersburg for the establishment of a congress for peace is too evident to be dwelt upon, but the expressions used in the dispatch to Count Woronzow from his Court made it necessary for me to say as much upon it as is contained in the second article of the enclosed paper.

"You will remark upon the third article how much it is his Majesty's object to connect with the establishment of a concert of views for the conclusion of peace that of a plan of military operations to be executed by the different powers engaged in the war. A point which is the more important because, without some check of this nature, it is greatly to be apprehended that the Court of Vienna, finding itself in some degree secure of its own objects, may discontinue or relax its efforts for the common cause, unless it be bound by positive stipulations to pursue them according to a specified plan, to a specified extent, and for certain objects previously agreed upon.

"Nothing more can be said in the present moment than what I have stated to Count Woronzow respecting his Majesty's ideas of maritime peace. And there is, I trust, very little ground to fear that these will be in any respect likely to excite opposition at Petersburg.

"The fifth article includes the King's ideas, first, on the re-establishment of monarchy in France; secondly, on the policy of holding out to the people of that country some security against dismemberment; and thirdly, on the necessity of confining France within her continental limits, such as they stood at the commencement of the Revolution.

"On all these points former discussions have already established a complete union of sentiment between his Majesty and the Emperor of Russia.

"The remainder of this article relates to the final arrangement to be made at a peace respecting those countries in Germany and Italy which, having been conquered by the enemy or ceded to him by their respective sovereigns, shall now be reconquered by the arms of the allies.

"This is a subject on which the King is not called upon to propose any plan, nor would it become him to do so. It is but too evident that the views of Austria are those of great acquisition and aggrandisement. To refuse to that power all benefit from the success of so brilliant a campaign would perhaps be unreasonable in principle, and would most certainly be extremely difficult in practice. In so far as the accomplishment of those views, whatever they may be, should tend to strengthen the defensive frontiers of Germany and Italy against the restless ambition of France, it could scarcely be looked upon as unfavourable to the interests of England, provided they did not extend so far as, by augmenting too much the Austrian power, to endanger the general balance of Europe.

"On these points, however, it is rather the business of his Majesty to receive than to anticipate the proposals of his allies. This part of my communication to Count Woronzow has, therefore, as you will observe, been confined to very general and indefinite expressions.

"The subject of the Low Countries requires to be treated in another manner, and the greatest advantage which his Majesty hopes to derive from the conferences to be carried on at Petersburg is by obtaining some security that these provinces, which may very probably be liberated from their present oppression by the success of the operations now carrying on by his Majesty and the Emperor of Russia, shall not be re-delivered into the hands of Austria without fresh and more effectual engagements of barrier treaty; or (what would be preferred by his Majesty) that they should be united to the Dutch Republic, forming (with the addition perhaps of the Bishopric of Liege) one compact and independent State, of sufficient wealth to re-establish the fortified barrier, and of sufficient power to defend it.

"These general ideas I have stated to you in order to enable you, if circumstances should require it, to enter upon the conferences without any appearance of delay on his Majesty's part, supposing that the Austrian Minister should be found equally ready.

"But before anything can be finally concluded on these subjects, a considerable time must be expected to elapse; and I shall be enabled to transmit to you, from time to time, such instructions as his Majesty may judge necessary for your conduct in the course of the discussions.

"The pretensions of the Neapolitan Minister are in the last degree extravagant, and I have every reason to think will be disavowed by his Court." Draft.

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, August 27. Downing Street.—"The enclosed despatches to Sir Charles Whitworth, which are sent open to you for your perusal, will apprise you of the nature of the discussion which His Majesty has directed to be entered into at Petersburg. His Majesty has judged that your presence at that Court, and your assistance in the conferences there, might tend very materially to promote their success. His Majesty is therefore desirous that you should for this purpose proceed to that Court. Your recent letters of credence and full powers are sufficiently ample to enable you in that case to enter upon the business in question; and the instructions which I have addressed to Sir Charles Whitworth should be considered as the rule for your joint conduct. But if either the state of your own health, or the pressure of the business which is likely immediately to arise in the quarter where you now reside, should induce you to wish on private and public grounds to decline the service now proposed to you, His Majesty's servants, however impressed with a sense of the great benefit which would in their opinion arise from your presence at Petersburg to the great objects which are in question, have, nevertheless, humbly recommended it to His Majesty that this point should be left wholly to your decision; and even if the result should not be such as they would wish, I can with full confidence assure you of His Majesty's gracious acceptance of the service which you have already performed." Draft.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, August 28, 12 p.m. Berlin.—"Lord Minto's servant has brought me letters from him which desire me to open his dispatches to you, and I find in them so much important communication that I do not delay his messenger one moment, and I am writing these few lines while his horses are getting ready. If on the one hand there is some disappointment in the French having broken in upon the Grisons, yet it is something that the common danger should have forced Thugut into measures more of concert and of co-operation than common interests would ever have succeeded in obtaining from him. We know nothing here of the French successes in Swisserland, and therefore I cannot judge what is the extent of the evil or of the loss attending the French eruption. I shall be very cautious not to name it here in the present moment, for I have heard this evening, indirectly from Alvenslaben, that they have this day received from France an answer not only of positive and peremptory refusal, but that refusal couched in terms which are extremely ungracious. The government here have even gone the length of speaking in the strongest terms to their confidential friends upon this subject, and they give themselves the airs of blustering and threatening an immediate march of the Prussian troops. I had already yesterday sent to Count Haugwiz my letter demanding an audience of congé, and I am actually waiting the King's pleasure and the communication of it. It is not possible for me to guess how far what they will learn here about Swisserland will damp the warlike fit which has come upon them this evening, but, as far as I can learn by indirect communication, I am told that their notion this evening was to let me have my audience of leave, but still to march themselves with all expedition.

"I have so little faith in this angry burst of courage that I cannot say that I expect anything from it. I have latterly rather avoided than courted any possible discussion with them, although I have been anxious enough to stay and trace their course; and I have avoided them because in the present moment I really trust that we should not want their assistance, and I honestly own that I should rather be afraid of a limited co-operation on their part, than anxious to obtain it. You will see some traces of this in the letter which I sent to Haugwiz, but I must not forget to remind you that, however harsh this letter may seem, it was necessary to allude to the facts which had passed, and to state them, by letter at least, in order to have something like a record of their past weakness and inconsistency. I had anxiously pressed Panin to join with me in an official note for this purpose, but he was unwilling to do so lest his Court should disapprove it, and I did not like to take singly a step which might look like a separation of interests at a time when I wished to have all the effect of the most perfect union. I therefore would not present a separate note, but I have shortly alluded to the chief points in my letter asking for an audience of leave. To this letter I have yet received no answer, except a short one to say that my letter should be laid before His Prussian Majesty.

"I remain therefore uncertain whether this refusal from France will tempt them to try to keep me or no. Perhaps they will do nothing except taking possession of their own trans-Rhene provinces; perhaps they will not do that, but will remain entirely quiet, which is most in character for them; perhaps they will make some overture to me to stay, and perhaps they will make none, but let me go quietly as if no refusal had been made to them; my present disposition is to continue to urge my departure for the 1st September, and I do not see that any overture ought to induce me to delay it, short of an actual declaration or commencement of Prussian hostility against France. If they will now march in hostility into their own Duchy of Cleves and then into Flanders or Holland, for that event I should be disposed to talk with them and to concert with them, not by pecuniary subsidy, but by such military co-operation as you are now carrying on with Austria. As it appears to me extremely doubtful whether the loud threats of Alvensleben to Baron Kinkel about their French answer this evening, will really produce anything, and as we have such cogent reason for believing that they certainly will never do anything here, I should be sorry to lead you into any new expectation even of the faintest shade; but yet, as you may have better French intelligence which may furnish to you a more authentic and a better grounded comment, I have determined to name the circumstance in a few lines of a public dispatch. I am still full of anxiety to hear of our disembarkation; the only intelligence which I have received is by a note this evening which asserts that a letter is just received from Amsterdam stating that on the 24th the English fleet was at the Helder, the Amsterdam garrison hurrying to defend it, and great confusion prevailing in consequence. This sounds very probable, and I am much inclined to believe it, and not a little anxious to confirm it.

“Lord Minto’s private letters to me are expressed in great kindness considering the vehemence with which I had written to him upon the contents of his four dispatches, and are full of good temper and of laudable desire of conciliation. I see, however, with some regret and concern that he is far from agreeing with me in my objections and apprehensions of Austria taking complete possession of Piedmont; and I should by his letters be afraid that he considers this measure as one which is agreeable to the wishes of more than one or two of the English Cabinet. For my own part, as far as I am yet able to form any opinion upon the subject, I cannot believe that it is wise to give all Italy to Austria; and when Piedmont is added on to the Milanese, to Lombardy, to Venice, and part of Tuscany, I cannot consider the rest of Italy as being other than a more extended Imperial fief. I had yesterday a long conversation upon this subject with M. de Hudelist, the Austrian Chargé d’Affaires, and I saw evidently that he not only avowed this intention on the part of Austria, but he went so far as to recommend that, for the sake of establishing an intimate union between London and Petersburg [Vienna?], we had better ourselves propose an arrangement of this nature to M. de Thugut. I hear no motive for this except a security against France; if that is a sufficient motive for Austrian acquisition, their possessions will be as extensive as their fears, and Swisserland will naturally find its place also in these new and unbounded Imperial title-deeds. When I answer Lord Minto I must again attack him, for I cannot in conscience acquiesce in the monstrous crawl of Thugut."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 28. Walmer Castle.—"The only thing I can say with certainty on the first reading of the mortifying packet you have sent me is that this, and every fresh embarrassment, will be a fresh reason for your brother's going as soon as possible to Petersburg. I will write to you again on all the rest of the subject, as soon as I have thought over a little more the difficulties which arise. In the meantime I should like much to see Lord Minto's despatches themselves, if they are returned and can be spared."

Postscript. "Not a word more yet from our expedition. The wind is against hearing, and, I am afraid, for these two days has been very unfavourable to acting; but I think Sunday and Monday ought to have done the business at the Texel."

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE to COUNT BENTINCK-RHOON.

1799, August 28. London.—"Monsieur le comte Guillaume Gustave Frédéric Bentinck, seigneur de Rhoon et Pendrecht, Varel, et Knipphausen, ayant offert de se charger de l'organisation et de la direction des habitants armés de la province d'Hollande et de Westfrise pour le rétablissement du gouvernement légitime, et la conservation du bon ordre et de la tranquillité, S[on] A[ltesse] a trouvé bon de commettre et d'autoriser à cet effet le dit Comte Bentinck, le tout sans préjudice de l'autorisation générale donnée dans le même but par S[on] A[ltesse] au Prince Héréditaire son fils. S[on] A[ltesse] a trouvé bon, de plus, de recommander au dit S[eigneur] Comte Bentinck de suivre à tous égards, relativement à l'organisation et à la direction des habitants armés de la province d'Hollande et de Westfrise, les instructions qui pourront lui être transmises par S[on] A[ltesse] le Prince Héréditaire: et en outre, afin de remplir le but salutaire pour lequel la présente autorisation lui est donnée, d'agir de concert avec les officiers commandants des villes ou districts de la province d'Hollande nommés par nous, ou, en vertu de notre prédite autorisation générale, par le Prince Héréditaire; de même qu'avec ceux auxquels une autorisation semblable à la présente aurait pu être donnée par nous ou par le Prince Héréditaire, pour quelques villes ou districts de la dite province.

"En conséquence, nous prions et requérons tous ceux que cela peut regarder, de reconnaître, respecter, et assister le susdit Comte Bentinck dans la susdite qualité. Le tout provisoirement et jusqu'à ce que nous ayons trouvé bon de révoquer la présente."

Copp.

HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 28. Klein Ketten, near the Helder.—“ We have succeeded in an enterprize which, as far as I can be allowed to judge, was most precarious, and which, if I were to give an opinion even after success, ought not to have been risked. We are now to make the most of our success, and as soon as we shall be enabled to procure horses and waggons to carry forward our tents and little baggage, we shall endeavour to push on to Alkmaar, where the country becomes more cultivated and productive. As we have now a scene past, I hope there will be no delay in sending us three or four regiments of Light Dragoons; the want of cavalry is severely felt. Lord Duncan agrees with me in thinking it right to bring directly the Russians to the Helder, and a letter will be dispatched immediately to that purpose. The force that opposed us yesterday was about 7,000 men, well clothed, well armed, and well disciplined. A very considerable desertion amongst them has taken place, being composed mostly of Austrian and Prussian deserters. They may be said to have behaved better than we expected; they certainly at times pushed our people with spirit and perseverance, as they returned several times to the attack. I proposed forming a corps from the Dutch deserters and giving it to Lieutenant-Colonel Sontag, who is very intelligent, and who has been to us most useful. The officers may be taken from the old Dutch officers, some of whom are now with us. I shall consult the Baron de Heerdt on this subject.

“It is impossible as yet to form any opinion on the disposition of the country. We shall observe strict order, and give every kind of protection to people of all descriptions. I could not yesterday sufficiently admire the spirit of the British soldier. Without any sort of discipline, they did in their own way as much as could have been expected from veteran troops. Sir I. Pulteney really surprized me. He shewed ardour and intelligence and did himself honour. I have reason to be satisfied with all the general officers, although they did not all shew the same intelligence. I was unfortunately deprived of Colonel Hope by a wound in his leg, which is not dangerous; he has no fever, and will be soon well. Colonel Macdonald did his part like a brave and skilful officer. Lieutenant-Colonel Hay, whom I highly valued, was killed at my side—he has left a widow and six daughters without a shilling. Lieutenant-Colonel Graham of the 27th, after shewing many instances of heroic courage, is dangerously wounded in the head. If this is a Scotch expedition they have borne the brunt of the day.

“I trust that you will recommend Colonel Hay’s family to the King’s goodness. If I have endeavoured to render any service to the public on this occasion, the only reward is that this poor family may not be left destitute. I cannot conclude this long letter without saying that I observe in Lieutenant-Colonel Anstruther very superior abilities. He promises to be an officer of the first class.” Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 29. Wimbledon.—“As the easiest way of conveying my sentiments to you without having the trouble of writing another letter, I send you a copy of a letter I this morning wrote to Mr. Pitt. I have the same doubts you have as to the probability of landing either Sunday or Monday, and that gave rise to my viewing the subject in an ulterior and contingent light, that we may not be unprepared for any event that occurs.”

HENRY DUNDAS to W. PITT.

Enclosure.

1799, August 28. Wimbledon.—“In the course of the night I have been ruminating upon what directions it might be necessary to give before I leave London, and this has led me to consider of the disposal of our present force, and the objects further to be pursued under the different contingencies which may happen. Perhaps the accounts which may arrive in the course of this day or to-morrow morning may supersede much of what has occurred to me, but it is only the trouble of writing a little more than may be useful, which is of no consequence, and if it should prove otherwise a day may be gained.

“Of course the deliverance of Holland is the primary object to which all our force whether British or Russian must be immediately appropriated. And if the armament under Sir Ralph Abercrombie is successful in making good its landing, and establishing itself in the province of Holland, everything is then plain and simple, and the only order to give is that, as soon as the transports shall return and have received what additional water or other outfit they may be in need of, the troops at Barham Downs shall be ordered to march and embark without delay, and proceed to join the others in Holland. Our idea was that the Duke of York would sail as soon as the Russian troops arrived at Yarmouth. I am very clear this plan should be altered, and I shall immediately communicate to His Royal Highness my reasons, and I know he is ready to go at an hour’s warning. Independent of the Russian troops, we shall have in Holland an army of 24,000 British infantry, besides what cavalry it may be necessary to send. This is certainly a command fit for the King’s son, and I cannot help thinking that, with a view to future connexion, it is desirable that a Prince of the Blood should have a chief part in the deliverance of Holland, and the re-establishment of the House of Orange. Besides, His Royal Highness being on the spot, and having the influence which it is said he has with the Prince of Orange, may be of essential use in the future details we talked over the last time Lord Grenville you and I met together.

“The next supposition is that Sir Ralph Abercrombie may not be able to execute his present plan, but obliged to yield to the weather and make for the Ems. If he goes there, I am not too sanguine in hoping, after all the information we have received, that the speedy deliverance of Groningen and Friesland will be the consequence; and that accomplished, 5 or 6,000 men is the utmost that, in conjunction with the force of the country, can be requisite to confirm what the success of our arms has achieved. A general officer (probably general Don, from the communications he has already had with the Prince of Orange's friends in those countries, may be thought the best) with a force to that amount being left, there will still remain about ten thousand. These with General Abercrombie and the other officers under his command should either return to the Downs, if they want any additional outfit for the ships and transports, or, if they do not, should be ordered to repair to such rendezvous as may be concerted, and along with the troops at Barham Downs to put themselves under the command of the Duke of York. The force will then amount to 18,000 British infantry and a proportion of cavalry, and, with such a force, I should hope when the weather permits, there could be no difficulty in the Duke's successfully undertaking what Sir Ralph Abercrombie, from uncommonly boisterous weather, has been obliged to postpone. Even if the troops under Sir Ralph should not return to the Downs, where the Duke of York proposes to embark, still I should think it right to order Sir Ralph himself to come, in order that he may, before the Duke of York sails, lay before His Royal Highness in detail the plan by which, according to the concert between him and Lord Duncan and Admiral Mitchell, the attack on the Helder and Texel was proposed to be made. This would save a great deal of time; and to make it complete, either Lord Duncan if he is returned, or Admiral Mitchell, or both, should be ordered likewise to attend the Duke of York before he sails. By such a previous well-digested arrangement much time would be saved; and the armament, when it does sail, would be ready, if the weather allowed, to go directly to the execution of its object. I mentioned to the Duke of York the idea of his coming to Walmer Castle before he sailed, and the previous arrangement to which I have referred could all be concerted there. I shall probably see His Royal Highness in the course of this day or to-morrow morning, and in suggesting the other particulars I have detailed to you, I shall at the same time mention to him that he may probably be called upon sooner than I once thought of.

"It will readily occur to you that, in the execution of what I have mentioned, no preparation is requisite that can create any delay; for the transports which would return from the Ems would carry the troops at Barham Downs, within two thousand; and, if I recollect right, there are already prepared supernumerary transports to that amount; but, if not, I shall give orders about it to-day. I shall write to Lord Grenville to communicate to him what I have written to you, in case he has any suggestions to offer to me; and I shall not leave London till Friday, instead of to-morrow, in order that I may receive your answer to this, and give any additional order that may become necessary in consequence of the suggestions I may receive. I take it for granted it will be no inconvenience to you to take your ride over to Barham, that you may convey to Sir C. Grey and your brother some general idea of the time when the troops now at Barham Downs may be called upon to march and embark.”

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 29. Dropmore.—“I have read with attention the letter you sent me; and the subject is one which had, of course, occupied much of my thoughts in this painful interval of suspense.

“If Abercrombie lands in Holland, of course the whole thing is clear, and we have only to reinforce him as fast as we can; keeping only in view that when the Russians arrive, or perhaps sooner, we must assist our friends in the Eastern Provinces with some small force; and that when we have our Russians, but not before, we may perhaps wish to make an attack on Walcheren by sea, that being a point the possession of which would be of the utmost importance after we had made a certain progress in Holland. On this subject I send you some intelligence received from the Hereditary Prince, which shews that, there also, the difficulties had been much exaggerated to us.

“In your second supposition, however, I confess I fear you are too sanguine. That our force now under Abercrombie will effect a complete counter-revolution in Friesland and Groningen I have no doubt; but when that is done there will still be some point on that side (say Coverden or the Yssel or what you please) where the French and Batavians will collect whatever force they can, and where you must for some time at least keep together a larger regular force than 6,000 men, and probably a more considerable officer than Don; otherwise we may see all our work in that quarter unravelled while we are pursuing our objects elsewhere.

“The arrival of the first Russian troops at Yarmouth, which may be now daily expected, will put you enough in force to undertake both objects, supposing each to require no more than from 18 to 20,000 men; and allowing even that their execution is to be totally independent of each other. And you will still have a reinforcement of 6 or 8,000 Russians more, besides cavalry, to send where you please.

“If the first Russians, with the British now at Barham, are sufficient for the Texel expedition, being assisted by so powerful a division as that in Groningen, the object, after taking the Helder, would certainly be to push on with them to Amsterdam and the Hague. And this might be much facilitated by transporting the troops which could be spared from the Overysse army across the Zuyder sea from Staveren or Kampen to Enchuysen, according to the Duke of Brunswick’s original plan.

"If these ideas are right, the steps would be (always supposing Abercrombie to have landed at Delfzyl, not in Holland):

1. "To let him push forward in that quarter to the best defensive position he can take to cover the eastern provinces, which position I suppose would be Coverden or the Yssel; and it would be desirable to concentrate it as much as possible, in order to be able to detach from that army.

2. "To keep our Barham Down force in readiness to sail with the Russians to the Texel the very moment the first Russian division arrives.

3. "When the Helder is taken and the fleet secured, to push on to Amsterdam; and for that purpose to reinforce our army in Holland by bringing across the Zuyder sea whatever can, at that period, be spared from Overijssel.

4. "The second division of Russians would be considered as a reserve to be sent to either of these points which wanted reinforcement, and, if both were found strong enough, then to be sent to take possession of Walcheren, from which even its small present defence would in that case probably be withdrawn.

"What would be the best arrangement of your officers in that case you can best decide. You must remember that our command as with respect to Russians is to be decided always by seniority.

"The Duke of York, of course, commands the whole. Lieutenant-General Herman is, I understand, senior to Abercrombie, but there comes only a Major-General with the first division, and he is probably senior to all our officers of that rank.

"It will have occurred to you that if Abercrombie lands in Groningen, he will want some cavalry almost immediately."

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August 29. London.—"I have received your letter, with its enclosure from your nephew Sir Watkin. There must be some mistake in it, for it is impossible that Lord Cornwallis would authorise the drafting of a fencible regiment into any other.

"There are many applications from some of the fencible cavalry to go upon foreign service, but there are sound reasons in policy why they should not be sent in preference of the regular cavalry. You would otherwise, for the sake of gratifying (I admit it) a most honourable and meritorious public zeal, deprive yourselves in all future wars of the service of those who, by being kept at home, would be deprived of that experience which alone can make soldiers. If you can keep Austria from being very dishonest, and we are thereby enabled at the beginning of next campaign to carry on our operations on the great scale we propose, we may then have room for the service of the fencible cavalry; and none deserves better than Sir Watkin to have every attention paid to the dictates of his ambition.

"No news to-day from our expedition. Mr. David Scott, who has been cruising in those seas for a month for his health, passed over from Lord Duncan's fleet and arrived within these two days. He says he was half-way over on Saturday, that it was perfectly calm early on Sunday morning, and continued so all Monday. It is therefore barely possible that they may have been able to collect their transports in the course of the Sunday, and to land on the Monday. But even in that event it is impossible to be free from anxiety, for their destination being known to the enemy for a period of ten days, when they could not land, every opportunity was given to the enemy to collect their force, and make their defence as vigorous as possible."

HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, August 31. Klein Ketten.—"Since the action on the 27th, nothing has passed on the land side. The Admiral has received the Dutch fleet on terms. The enemy has shown no enterprize, and we have been stationary from necessity. We shall move on Monday; Alkmaar is our first object. I trust the Duke of York will soon join us; it is my wish. I think we have a prospect of success, and it is my desire that he should have the credit of it. I shall serve with more zeal than if acting for myself. I hope he will bring some regiments of cavalry with him; they are much wanted. Hitherto we know little of the disposition of the people. Few Dutch deserters have come in; those that we have, either as deserters or prisoners, are Germans or Hungarians. If the Admiral avails himself of the command of the Zuyder Zee, he will alarm Amsterdam, which will influence the whole of the Batavian Republic. General Don went this morning to the Hague with a summons to the Directory, and the Hereditary Prince of Orange is expected. We hear of no movement amongst the Prussians on the frontier of Holland. Sir J. Pulteney, Colonel Hope, and indeed all the wounded officers are doing well." Copy.

VICE-ADMIRAL MITCHELL to EVAN NAPEAN.

1799, August 31. Isis, at anchor.—"It blowing strong from the south-west, and also the flood tide, I could not send away my short letter of last night; I therefore have, in addition, to request you will lay before the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that on the morning of yesterday I got the squadron under weigh at 5 o'clock and immediately formed the line of battle, and to prepare for battle."

"In running in, two of the line of battle ships and the Latona frigate took the ground; we passed the Helder point and Mars Deep and continued our course along the Texel in the channel that leads to the Vlieter, the Dutch squadron laying at anchor in a line at the Red Buoy in the east-south-east course. The Latona frigate got off and joined me; but as the two line of battle-ships did not, I closed the line. About half-past 10 I sent Captain Rennie of the Victor with a summons to the Dutch admiral, as it was Lord Duncan's wish that I should do so; and in her way she picked up a flag of truce with two Dutch captains from the Dutch admiral to me. Captain Rennie very properly brought them on board, and from a conversation of a few minutes, I was induced to anchor in a line, a short distance from the Dutch squadron at their earnest request. They returned with my positive orders not to alter the position of the ships, nor do anything whatsoever to them, and in one hour to submit or take the consequence.

"In less than the time, they returned with a verbal answer that they submitted according to the summons, and to consider themselves (the officers) on parole until I heard from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Prince of Orange, for my further proceedings.

"I have now the honour to enclose you herewith the line of battle in which the squadron advanced, a copy of my summons to the Dutch admiral, and also a list of the Dutch fleet.

"Admiral Story's flag is down, and I have sent an officer on board each of his ships to have an eye over and the charge of them, as they themselves requested that it should be so; I have also furnished them with the Prince of Orange's standard, many of them not having had it before, and they are now all under these colours. To maintain quiet among the crews I issued a short manifesto, of which I also enclose a copy herewith; but I would beg leave to suggest the propriety of sending them to the Nore as soon as possible for fear of accident.

"I shall go on shore and consult the General where I can best assist him for the good of the service we are both engaged in, and shall arrange, with their Lordships' concurrence, a flotilla to secure and assist him to take possession of all the ports in the Zuyder Zee. All the ships of Lord Duncan's squadron should remain with me until I have orders how to dispose of the Dutch squadron. There will be no trusting them without a sufficient force. The animated exertions and conduct of the whole squadron are far above any praise I can bestow on them; but I shall feel most sensibly impressed on my heart their spirited conduct during the whole of this business. We have all felt the same zeal for the honour of our sovereign and our country, and although the conclusion has not turned out as expected, the merit I may say, in some measure, is still not the less due to my squadron; and if I had brought them to action I trust it would have added another laurel to the navy of England in this present war. The Dutch were astonished and thunderstruck at the approach of our squadron, never believing it possible that we could so soon have laid down the buoys and led down to them in line of battle, in a channel where they themselves go through but with one or two ships at a time.

"I have sent Lieutenant Collier with these dispatches, who will give their Lordships every information, as he has been employed in the whole of the communication with the Dutch squadron, and was also on shore with me, as my aide-de-camp, on the day of landing."

Postscript. "Since writing the above I received the Dutch Admiral's answer in writing, which I enclose herewith." Copy.

Enclosure 1.

VICE-ADMIRAL MITCHELL to REAR-ADMIRAL STORY.

1799, August 30. Isis, in line of battle.—"I desire you will instantly hoist the flag of his Serene Highness the Prince of Orange. If you do you will be immediately considered as friends of the King of Great Britain, my most gracious Sovereign. Otherwise take the consequences. Painful it will be to me for the loss of blood it may occasion, but the guilt will be on your own head." Copy.

Enclosure 2.

REAR-ADMIRAL STORY to VICE-ADMIRAL MITCHELL.

1799, August 30. Washington, at anchor.—"Neither your superiority nor the threat that the spilling of human blood should be laid to my account, could prevent my showing you, to the last moment, what I could do for my Sovereign, whom I acknowledge to be no other than the Batavian people, and its Representatives, when your Prince's and the Orange flags have obtained their end. The traitors whom I commanded refused to fight, and nothing remains to me and my brave officers but vain rage, and the dreadful reflection of our present situation. I therefore deliver over to you the fleet which I commanded. From this moment it is your obligation to provide for the safety of my officers and the few brave men who are on board the Batavian ships, as I declare myself and my officers prisoners of war, and remain to be considered as such." Copy.

Enclosure 3.

VICE-ADMIRAL MITCHELL to the CREWS OF THE DUTCH FLEET.

1799, August 30. Isis.—"The undersigned Vice-Admiral, in the service of His Majesty the King of Great Britain, charged with the execution of the naval part of the expedition to restore the Stadholder and the old and lawful constitution of the Seven United Provinces guaranteed by His Majesty, having agreed that, in consequence of the summons to Rear-Admiral Story, the ships, after hoisting the ancient colours, will be considered as in the service of the allies of the British Crown, and under the orders of His Serene Highness the hereditary Stadholder, Captain and Admiral-General of the Seven United Provinces, has thought it proper to give an account of this agreement to the brave crews of the different ships, and to summons them by the same to behave in a peaceable and orderly manner, so that no complaints may be represented by the officer the undersigned will send on board each of the ships to keep proper order, until the intentions of His Majesty and His Serene Highness the Prince of Orange as Admiral-General shall be known for the farther destination of these ships, an account of which despatches will be immediately sent off; and to make them aware that, in case their conduct should not be so as may be expected from the known loyalty and attachment of the Dutch navy to the illustrious house of Orange on this occasion, any access or irregularity will be punished with the severity which the disorders may have been committed merit." Copy.

[J. HOOKHAM FRERE] to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, August. Downing Street.—“I have had a very long conversation this morning with Monsieur, the result of which your L[ordship] will receive in a series of notes from Dutheil. He was particularly anxious and inquisitive upon the subject of Switzerland, and upon the difficulties which stood in the way of his being employed in that quarter; so much so that I thought I could not well avoid telling him (in answer to his enquiries upon that particular head) that I understood the Court of Petersburg had desisted from their former objections to this measure. I contrived, however, to explain to him (without any mention or allusion to the suspicious views of Austria) that the internal state of Switzerland was such as would make his appearance there a matter of great delicacy and hazard. I found that he was not acquainted with the intention of giving the command of the army of Switzerland to Suwarrow, but so much bent upon making some attempt in that direction that he said: ‘Mr. Pitt and Lord Grenville are of opinion that we ought to obtain a footing in France before the winter. The time presses; perhaps General Korsakow may be able to do something even though the situation of Switzerland should make it impossible to raise a Swiss army. If the ministers are of that opinion, I should wish to set off as soon as possible.’

“With respect to the Western provinces, he agreed with me that the best mode was to distribute a quantity of arms and ammunition through the country, but he added that the number of conscripts and deserters and other refugees made it necessary that a certain sum of money should be added for their subsistence; this sum he placed at about £25,000. I observed that a sum of this magnitude would require some greater exactitude in the account of its distribution than had hitherto been required; to which he replied that he had already sent a commissary to collect the accounts as far as was practicable in a service of that nature, and that he desired nothing more than that an English commissary should be employed for the same purpose. With regard to the corps of peasants to be employed, as proposed in your L[ordship’s] note, he said that of the 140,000 men whom he had reckoned upon as ready to take arms, he had deducted 70,000, calculating upon the remaining half as a regular army ; that the 70,000 thus deducted would be capable of being employed in an irregular way and for limited service. Your Lordship will receive a note on the subject of St. Malo, but I think his Royal Highness is convinced that any immediate attempt of that kind would be very premature, and not likely to be attended with any good effects.

"This is, [I] think, as nearly as I can recollect the substance of a conversation in which I bore a passive part for about an hour and a half."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 1. Berlin.—"I write you one line at the moment I am stepping into my carriage to go to Hamburgh. You will certainly agree with me in considering the new order of movement to the Duke of Brunswick as very important, and very useful in the present moment from the impression it will make in Holland and Paris. I do not believe that they mean here any real hostility, but they mean to re-occupy their Prussian provinces, and to threaten France with a demonstration of force which they will not employ ; perhaps, too, Haugwitz is still looking to the chance of negotiating in Holland itself for evacuation of the French troops, and accession to the line of demarkation ; but in all events their Prussian demonstration is highly valuable just at this moment, whatever may be its object or result. I have desired Stamford to write to the Duke of Brunswick to nurse him up against any military doubts, and I have desired Garlike to write by estafette to Vienna and Petersburg, as I myself have not the time. The Prussians will not make war, but if they make a demonstration, why should we not make as if they made war ?

"The Court, King, and Queen have been to the last degree gracious, and his Prussian Majesty announces to me a superb present of porcelain.

"You see by my letter that it has succeeded in softening my asperity ; in serious truth, however, I do think this little step is in this movement a very great event.

"As soon as I am at Hamburgh I shall have to decide upon my future course ; Holland if it is open ; if not, Bremen, or Munster or Hanover."

LORD MULGRAVE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private and separate.

1799, September 1. Scharhausen.—"Notwithstanding the length of my public dispatch, written last night, I cannot spare you the trouble of reading a private letter, to convey such communications as cannot with propriety be expressed in a public dispatch. I hope, therefore, that these private letters are really what they profess to be, and do not go through the Office.

"Nothing can go worse than our affairs in this part of the world. The jealousy and hatred (arising from envy and conceit) which the Austrians feel towards the Russians is beyond all example; and I am convinced that they would be much more gratified by a serious calamity happening to the Russians, than by any success that could be obtained, even by themselves, against the enemy. The situation in which they have left Korsakow gives but too much reason to apprehend they may be gratified in that object. He appears to me himself very ready to fight, but very unequal to command; yet even his readiness to fight the Archduke (in the short conversation I had with him) was disposed most sarcastically to disallow. 'Pour celui-là,' said he, 'quand l'ennemi est loin il veut tout manger; quand il s'agit d'attaquer, il ne sait plus prendre un parti.' Such an insinuation from a person in the Archduke's situation, made to me at first sight, and under all the circumstances of the conference, is sufficient to show the inveteracy which exists; and that it cannot be kept within any bounds of discretion, or be in any degree restrained even by that delicacy upon questions of personal courage which officers in general feel so strongly bound to observe towards each other, even in ranks less elevated than that which the Archduke holds, and to persons with far different claims to their confidence than those to which the nature and circumstances of our meeting could entitle me. With respect to effective operation (which you mention in your private letter) or cordial co-operation, they are terms which may be in use at Vienna, but which are not, I believe, construed by anybody there in their literal sense. I am decidedly of opinion that no operation on the French territories will take place, or is intended to take place, with any effectual Austrian assistance.

"It is very doubtful whether it will be possible to clear and to retain Switzerland. I fear it is more likely to be entirely lost. The victory of the enemy over General Jellachick and Colonel Strauch, by which upwards of 7,000 men were lost, has completely barred the communication by Mount St. Gothard; and Suvaroff will have to force his way by an attack of the enemy in that quarter, upon the success of which the relief of Korsakow and the hope of clearing Switzerland of the enemy by another attack (before Zurich) must depend.

"I do not think that the energy of Lord Minto is likely to force anything out of Thugut that will be worth knowing. Lord Minto has too much candour for such a juggler. He cannot even pretend to be open, without tacking a mystery to his communications. When he assured Lord Minto that the orders to the Archduke (mentioned in my public dispatch) should be sent, he concluded by requesting Lord Minto not to communicate that assurance to Mr. Wickham, as his (Thugut's) dispatches would not be sent for two days, and he feared the Archduke might be offended if he heard the determination of his continuance in Switzerland from any other quarter before it should be communicated to him by the Emperor. Lord Minto accordingly desires Mr. Wickham not to mention the circumstance, as it would be prejudicial to the frankness of Monsieur Thugut's communications. The two days delay have given time for the march of the Archduke, upon the movement of Moreau, which may or may not have been expected at Vienna. It is worthy of remark, however, that Monsieur Dietreichstein was vehement against the delay of an hour, as fatal to all harmony between the Court of Vienna and those of London and Petersburg. It appears to me highly essential that Lord Minto should be cured of any disposition to trust to the frankness of Monsieur Thugut.

"From what I have already told you of the disposition of the Austrians and Russians towards each other, you will perceive how impossible it is for any powers of conciliation to reconcile and unite them; any attempt to soften either party could only end in a loss of all favour and credit with the party attempted to be softened. I see nothing to be done here. I have on a former occasion given you such ideas as occurred to me upon the project of employing the Russians in another quarter, where no concert would be necessary but between the King and the Emperor of Russia. I could enlarge much more on the unpleasant and distressing subjects of this letter, but I have limited myself (for your comfort and my own) to one sheet of paper."

ADMIRAL VISCOUNT DUNCAN TO EVAN NEPEAN.

1799, September 1. Kent, off Aldborough.—"I transmit for the information of my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty a letter to me from Vice-Admiral Mitchell giving a distinct detail of the great success with which it has pleased the Almighty God to crown His Majesty's arms.

"The boldness of the Vice-Admiral in running in on an open shore with so numerous a fleet and in such very unsettled weather, could only be equalled by the gallantry of Sir Ralph Abercrombie and his brave troops landing in the face of a most formidable opposition.

"During the whole of the conflict on Tuesday, I could plainly perceive the vast superiority of the British troops over those of the enemy, though opposed with obstinacy; and, in justice to both the land and sea service, must say that I never in my life witnessed more unanimity and zeal than has pervaded all ranks to bring the expedition to its present happy issue.

"Finding the Kent, with several of the Russian 74 gun ships, to draw too much water to be able to get into the harbour, I have returned with them to this anchorage; but previous to my getting under weigh at eight o'clock on Friday morning, I had the pleasure to see Vice-Admiral Mitchell with the men-of-war, transports, and armed vessels in a fair way of entering the Texel with a fair wind, and have not the least doubt but the whole of the Dutch fleet were in our possession by noon on that day.

"These despatches will be delivered by Captains Hope and Oughton, both able and intelligent officers, who will give their Lordships most satisfactory information relative to our successful operations.

"I shall now only add my sincere congratulations to their Lordships on this great event, which I think in its consequences may be ranked amongst the greatest that have happened during the war."

Postscript. "The winds having proved unfavourable has occasioned my anchoring here, but I shall proceed to Yarmouth as soon as the weather moderates." Copy.

Enclosure.

VICE-ADMIRAL MITCHELL to ADMIRAL VISCOUNT DUNCAN.

1799, August 29. Isis, at anchor.—"In a former letter I had the honour to write to your Lordship I there mentioned the reasons that determined Sir Ralph Abercrombie and myself not to persevere longer than the 26th in our resolution to attack the Helder and port of the Texel unless the wind became more moderate. Fortunately the gale abated on that morning, and although a very heavy swell continued to set in from the northward, I thought a moment was not to be lost in making the final attempt. The fleet was therefore bore up to take the anchorage, and I was happy to see the transports and all the bombs, sloops, and gun vessels in their stations to cover the landing of the troops by three in the afternoon of that day, when the signal was made to prepare for landing. The General however not thinking it prudent to begin disembarking so late in that day, it was determined to delay it till two in the morning of the 27th. The intervening time was occupied in making the former arrangements more complete, and by explaining to all the Captains individually my ideas fully to them that the service might profit by their united exertions. The troops were accordingly all in the boats by three o'clock, and the signal being made to row towards the shore the line of gun boats, sloops of war and bombs opened a warm and well-directed fire to scour the beach and a landing was effected with little loss. After the first party had gained the shore, I went with Sir Ralph Abercrombie that I might superintend the landing of the rest, and with the aid of the different captains, who appeared animated with but one mind, the whole were disembarked with as great regularity as possible.

"The ardour and glorious intrepidity which the troops displayed soon drove the enemy from the nearest sandhills, and the presence of Sir Ralph Abercrombie himself, whose appearance gave confidence to all, secured to us after a long and very warm contest the possession of the whole neck of land between Kykdoun and the road leading to Alkmaar and near to the village of Callantsoog.

"Late that night the Helder point was evacuated, and taken possession of by our troops quietly in the morning, as were the men-of-war named in the enclosed list and many large transports and Indiamen by us the next day. I despatched Captain Oughton, my own captain, to the Helder point last evening to bring off the pilots, and he has returned with enough to take in all the ships necessary to reduce the remaining force of the Dutch fleet, which I am determined to follow to the walls of Amsterdam until they surrender or capitulate for His Serene Highness the Prince of Orange's service.

"I must now, my Lord, acknowledge in the warmest manner the high degree of obligation I am under to your Lordship for the liberal manner in which you continued to entrust to my direction the service I have had the honour to execute under your immediate eye, a behaviour which added to my wish to do all in my power to forward the views of Sir Ralph.

"It is impossible for me sufficiently to express my admiration of the bravery and conduct of the general and the whole army, or the unanimity with which our joint operations were carried on, the army and navy having on this occasion pulled heartily together." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE TO HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 2. Dropmore.—"If there are insuperable reasons against sending Sir Watkin's fencible regiment over now, in addition to whatever regular cavalry goes to the Continent, you would really much oblige me, and do, I think, an act of justice, if you would contrive to bring them from Ireland, and to station them here as preparatory to their embarking in the spring.

"His regiment was the first that volunteered for that service, and the first that went upon it. You have seen how disagreeable it is found to be to all who are engaged in it, and, without meaning any reflection on Lord Cornwallis, he certainly has not the art of making it otherwise. Sir Watkin, however, has too much right feeling to have pressed in any manner on the Duke of York or on Government his wish of taking his turn of being relieved from it, or rather of being relieved from it so long after his turn is come. But he does not the less strongly feel that wish, and, in confidential conversation, he has told me that his officers also strongly felt it; and though he would not do or say anything so unsoldier-like as to attempt to choose his service even in a case where he had embarked voluntarily, yet I am sure he strongly feels the hardship of being continued there, and seeing so much other force brought away. If, however, the gratification of these feelings, surely not unreasonable in themselves, should lead to any inconvenience to the public service, I can answer for him that, of the two, he would prefer the private to the public inconvenience." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE TO W. WINDHAM.

1799, September 2. Dropmore.—"When I was last in town I discussed a little with Mr. Pitt the question whether, under all the present circumstances, and with the disposition shewn in other parts of France to rise against the Directory, we were in fact doing right to persevere in the system of discouraging the insurrection in the north-west provinces. The result led, I think, to a pretty strong impression in both our minds that the time was now come when we ought, by supplying those provinces largely with money and arms, to put them in a situation to co-operate with what is going on upon every side of France. Nothing more, however, was done than my desiring Frere to ask from Dutheil a statement of such means as might be required from us for acting on this plan. A squadron in the bay forms, of course, an essential ingredient in it, and this, I understand, is agreed to at the Admiralty, and on the point of being executed. Monsieur expressed to Frere, as I understand, some uneasiness lest this should interfere with our Swiss project, on which he appears to have set his heart. I see no reason why it should, supposing that project to turn out to be practicable; but every fresh letter from Vienna throws us back in that business.

"I do not know whether you have read Lord Minto's last dispatches. If not, pray read them. You will, I think, agree with me that the gross indecency of the conduct held to Lord Mulgrave, and to the King through him, required that we should do and say at least as much as has been done and said on the occasion. My opinion has long been fixed that good words and liberal conduct are both thrown away on Austrian politicians, and that all our measures towards them should be regulated solely by the view of what we think best and most becoming for ourselves. Perhaps if I had been to act quite on my own single judgment I should, in the present case, have carried the application of this principle yet further than I have done; but I cannot be surprised that those who do not keep their attention constantly and undividedly fixed on this object should be less strongly impressed than I am with the conclusion which the experience of six years has produced in my judgment on the subject." Copy.

GEORGE HAMMOND to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 2. Downing Street.—"The dispatches from Sir R. Abercromby and Admiral Mitchell are this moment arrived. I cannot procure the copies now, but I will send them to-morrow morning—they are dated Thursday. Abercromby proposes marching on to Alkmaer, but expresses a desire that cavalry may be immediately sent to him. Two ships of the line and three frigates in the Nieuwe Diep have surrendered; the remainder, 9 sail of the line, had advanced up the Zuyder Zee as far as the shoalwater would admit, and Admiral Mitchell with 13 ships of the line was following them, and, when the officers came away, had a fair wind and was within an hour and a half sail of them. No doubt is entertained at the Admiralty that we shall hear in the course of the night of the whole being in our possession. If they have not surrendered they must be taken without difficulty. A message had come from the Texel island desiring that a British garrison might be sent there, and when the officers came away the detachment was passing over to the island, and the Orange colours were flying on the fort. Sir Ralph Abercromby represents the desertion among the Dutch troops to be very great.

"Our loss at the Helder was sixty-one killed and upwards of 300 wounded. The loss of the enemy in killed alone was 1,000 and upwards. I have not seen the despatches, but I understand that they contain little more than what I have stated.

"Sir R. A[bercromby] in a private letter speaks with rapture of the conduct of the troops."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private and most confidential.

1799, September 2. Schaffhausen.—"I received by East, the messenger, your Lordship's letter of the 18th ultimo, on the subject of the Swiss levies, and cannot say how thankful I am that you have given me so very early an answer.

"The arrangements which your Lordship has made will be in every respect satisfactory as far as they go. But I feel it now a matter of duty, however remiss I may hitherto have been in that respect, to say that it will be impossible for me to take any responsibility on myself, either with respect to the levies, or to the general interests of his Majesty in this country (which most essentially depend on the manner in which those levies shall be made and conducted) unless the Commissary, whoever he may be, have clear and positive directions to take no measure whatever of general arrangement, nothing in short that is not really matter of detail, without having first taken my opinion upon it. And, above all, let me press upon your Lordship the necessity of letting it be known that the choice of the officers will really rest with me, and that no official paper, note, or public regulation of any kind be given, but under the signature of the King's Minister.

"I trust that your Lordship knows me well enough by this time to be persuaded that I do not ask these things for my own interest or pleasure, and that I am not given to use the King's name lightly. You will no doubt recollect that my opinion was different when I left London, and that it was at my own desire that Craufurd's hands were left free. It is experience alone that has taught me that, without something like an absolute authority to be exercised by some one known to have the confidence and to speak the opinion of the British Government, no good whatever will be done here.

"I could state many facts that would satisfy your Lordship of the correctness of my opinion, but I trust that your Lordship will give me credit for having formed it on very sufficient grounds.

"I will only say, generally, that public notes have been given and papers signed in which his Majesty's name has been too freely used; and that regulations shocking the national prejudices have been made and enforced without consulting me, or even mentioning them when done.

"Believe me, I do not mention these things with a wish to do Craufurd any harm, nor have I had the slightest quarrel with him. On the contrary, I love and honour his good qualities; I have the highest opinion of his military talents, which I wish to see employed in the service of his country; and, in the different situations in which I may be placed, it is very important to me and to the public service to have the opinion of such a man to refer to with confidence. It may be said that all my difficulties are personal ones, depending entirely on Crauford's natural character; but if I had no authority or means of doing good in the present arrangement, though I had long personal friendship and mutual good opinion to trust to, what can I hope for from a stranger.

"I have no hesitation whatever in saying, notwithstanding all the difficulties thrown in our way by the Austrians, that with a good military commissary entirely at my orders, and a civil commissary of accounts, I would have answered at this moment for 5,000 regular troops at least.

"It was Crauford's confounded system of paying the militia and the contingents, and his shocking the national prejudices by refusing to let the Legion recruit because he did not like the colonel, and forcing the men to enter into Bachman's regiment, that stopped the recruiting service altogether; and the mischief done then can only be repaired by his absence, and by a different system, which never can be adopted whilst he shall be here, or whilst the mode of raising the levies and the appointment of the officers shall be subject to the caprice of any officer whatever, unacquainted with the prejudices and notions of the people of the country.

"With respect to the person whom your Lordship mentions as Crauford's successor, it is absolutely necessary for my own peace and happiness that I should disburden myself in confidence to your Lordship of what I have heard respecting him; premising that, in all other respects except the point which I am about to state, I have no possible objection to him. But if that point be not cleared up, my life will be made miserable by my own fears and suspicions; besides that, being connected in the same mission with him, I must seriously look about me to see that no imputation fall upon myself.

"When your Lordship first mentioned that person to me I own I startled, having been told by the Duke of Portland that he was strongly suspected of receiving money from foreign officers employed in his Majesty's service; and I know that his Grace, who had his information from John Bentinck, considered the charge as serious. But having consulted confidentially my friend Calvert, who is pure as tried gold, I thought from his character of the man that he was incapable of such an action; and, therefore, I thought myself warranted in saying nothing to your Lordship on the subject, in which I own I was wrong. But there was something so very foul in the very nature of the charge that I wished to forget it had ever been made, particularly when I was persuaded that it was entirely without foundation.

"It is with pain I now mention that, on the Baron de Roll's arrival here, he spoke to me of this suspicion as of a thing generally known, and which he firmly believed to be well-founded;

adding that he had heard an officer say in a public room on hearing of a late appointment, 'Voilà un gaillard qui va faire bien de l'argent.'

"I asked him to name the officer, which he peremptorily refused. I then pressed him to give me any other proof whatever of his suspicion, affecting entire disbelief of it, and ignorance of its existence. After much hesitation he said that he had no direct proof against the principal, but that he knew from the persons who had paid it that his second had received money frequently; that this fact was well known in the Office, where it was generally understood, as well as by the payers, that the principal received his share. He added that he had heard the same insinuations thrown out in Mr. Windham's, or rather Mr. Woodford's office, against the same person (which he admitted might be a jealousy de métier). He named M. de Calonne and the Duke of Choiseul, both of whom he was certain had paid money to the second; adding that the thing was generally known among the higher emigrants, and that, if the people in the Office were questioned with ability and discretion, the truth must come out, being known to so many persons.

"These facts may be all true without the participation or knowledge of the principal, but it seems necessary that the attention of some one should be directed, at least, secretly to this object. At the same time I have no doubt that your Lordship will feel it very essential that my name should not appear without absolute necessity; and I particularly wish that, if you think the thing worth noticing in any way, you would speak confidentially on the subject to the Duke of Portland, though I almost doubt whether I have done right in mentioning John Bentinck's name.

"If any change should take place here I will venture to say that my own feelings and wishes would lead me to name the elder Clinton, whom I mentioned to your Lordship when in London, as the fittest person I know. He was then in Ireland, and has since been here, and the more I see of him the more I am persuaded that he would gain the affection and good opinion of the people of this country, without neglecting his duty to his own.

"I agree with your Lordship entirely, on thorough consideration, that Pichégrou would not do as a commander; but on that subject I shall probably write in a day or two an official dispatch."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 3. Stowe.—"My wife has been ill. If anything could distract my attention from an object so near to me, it would be the good news from Holland. I agree with you that, in all probability, that blow is now decisively struck; but as I have no confidence in the numbers or the sort of the force that is to be created there to defend your line (whatever it may be) against the Low Countries, in aid of your 18,000 Russians, I fear that a considerable part of our English force will be to be locked up on the defensive, at a time when certainly every man may be most usefully employed offensively in twenty different points that can be pointed out; but principally on the coast of Normandy, following very much the system and the line of Henry V.'s move, which I have lately studied. Of course, when I talk thus upon paper to you, I do not expect an answer upon details; but only wish to draw your attention where I think it may be usefully employed. I can, of course, be no judge how far it may be necessary to send Tom to St. Petersburg; but I own that I had set my heart on seeing Holland in his hands; and I very much doubt (though I urge it slightly because the same idea must have occurred to you) whether six weeks or even six months of your exertion at the Hague can give to the Stadtholder or to the country what both of them so much want.

"As to your 20,000 men from the militia, my heart and soul goes with your exertions on this subject; and if I had the data I would work for you; but before I can look at any other means, I wish to see (what you can get for me in confidence) a return of the numbers already given to the army, distinguishing the regiments of militia from which they have volunteered. I have already writ much to Dundas upon the subject, and I am perfectly ready to meet him at Dropmore to discuss his ideas with him, under the most anxious wishes that some arrangement may be made to give you the largest possible offensive force. But I must have a few materials.

"Adieu; for every reason leave Holland to Tom if possible, for I had rather volunteer to Russia myself by executing your orders at Petersburg, than that you should break in upon his career where he will do so superiorly; and upon your career at home, where I see many reasons for thinking you a sine quâ non."

Postscript. "Do not think that I want any of your offices; I want nothing but such an end of this struggle as you and I both wish for; but I am in earnest when I say that, if I can save Tom's mission by doing your orders myself, I would undertake it for six months, rather than you should leave England and he Holland, in both of which you both are invaluable."

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 3. Kleitz.—"I trust that in reading my public dispatch you will give me full credit for the motives which I have there stated as reasons why the letter which you are reading is written by me on my road to Hamburgh instead of on my road to Petersburg. In truth, those reasons are all of a public nature, and though I have been somewhat shaken in health by the winter of the Elbe, I should not on that account only be deterred from encountering the expedition of Petersburg or any other where I could do good; but in this instance, unless I very much deceive myself, I am confident that I would do none; and I am persuaded, when you come to consider how strongly Thugut is opposed to this measure, you will see that it affords no assistance or security, or promise of any whatever, with respect to Austria. You want no help in negotiation at Petersburg to influence the Emperor of Russia, and it is impossible not to see that Whitworth succeeds with him as much, if not more, than another English minister could do. It is to reach Vienna that you have looked at this project of Petersburg congress; but as you did not then know how violently Thugut pronounced himself against Cobentzel's protection to it, you could not be aware of the insurmountable difficulty which will be created by it. It is no answer to say that Thugut will not venture to refuse it, if the Emperor of Russia insists upon it; perhaps in that case he will not refuse it, but is it possible to imagine that a consent so extorted can lead to a successful negotiation; is it not evident that the distance, delay, and reluctance of the Court of Vienna will make the march of any such negotiation so slow as to exceed the sluggishness even of an Imperial Diet. That Cobentzel, who always means to overthrow Thugut in order to succeed him, should favour a measure which would bring le bureau des affaires étrangères into his hands, I do not wonder; but, even if I had not Lord Minto's information upon this subject, I should have felt confident from my knowledge of Thugut that he would never suffer such a project to come to a more prosperous ending than the last silly project of Cobentzel, which ended, as you saw, in complete nullity.

"Do not believe that my partiality to Panin has created the proposition which I hint at in my dispatch; I may perhaps be mistaken, but I am sure I am not misled by my partiality to him in the persuasion that his succeeding Razomowsky at Vienna would give the allied Courts more real efficient strength there than can be obtained by any other arrangement. If you could through this channel, and that of Lord Minto, send fairly to Vienna with any such offer respecting Italy as you can satisfy your conscience in making, I do believe you would advance more in that great difficulty than by any other road which could be taken. I do not either say this lightly. I have conversed lately very much with Hudelist, who is well informed of Thugut's general views and objects, and he has told me in pretty plain words that now that I have left Berlin and relieved Thugut from the fear of a new connection between England and Prussia, now is the moment for our making some offer of arrangement on the side of Italy to Baron Thugut. When I last spoke to him on this matter, I expressed some surprise at Thugut's expecting from us a proposition of this sort which he should more naturally make to us, and Hudelist agreed that it was more reasonable that it should be so; but he appealed to my knowledge of Thugut's reserve against the probability of his doing so; and he said very emphatically two or three times, that such was the reserve of Thugut's character that he would never make a first proposition of this nature, but if any such were made by us, Hudelist repeated that he was sure and confident that we should understand one another. You know very well how greatly I apprehend the exorbitant expectations of Austria, and I have already both to you and Lord Minto said plainly what I thought of them; but in what I am now suggesting I am alluding to the manner rather than to the substance, and I cannot help believing that whenever you have made up your mind to the sacrifices which you would consent to see made to Austria, you could not do better than to let Lord Minto state them, and if possible to contrive that Count Panin should be the Russian Minister to support them.

“Whether this would succeed or no I know not, but it is impossible for me to conceal from you that the other measure appears to me to be one which would waste itself away in endless delays and difficulties, while Thugut would be counteracting and laughing to scorn at Vienna all that his rival Cobentzel was dreaming of doing at Petersburg. I flatter myself, however, that before this time Lord Minto's dispatches will have created the same impression upon your mind too; upon my mind that impression is already so strongly made that, although you see I will consent to sacrifice my own ease and objects to any of real public service, I cannot honestly say that I should feel the smallest chance of doing the least degree of benefit to the public or of credit to myself in this arrangement at Petersburg. I would, and if necessary I will, now as at all times, put by all reference to myself, but I cannot say that I should carry with me the smallest hope or confidence of doing any good by a great personal sacrifice. Having said this, I am ready to make it, if neither the public motives which I have stated nor the disadvantage of my distrust of the benefit of it should appear to you to be reasons for the government to change their dispositions respecting me in it. I am sure I should do no good, but I will do what is wished, if under all these discouragements it is still wished. I am, however, persuaded that you will agree with me in thinking that, under all these circumstances, I have taken the best course in pursuing my journey to Hamburgh, where I shall probably learn how to join the Prince, and whether any opening into the country appears yet to be practicable.

“I have said nothing in this letter of the difficulties respecting my absence from Holland, because I do really think that if English politics can allow of your coming over and doing the business yourself, it will be sooner and better done than in any other shape; if that cannot be, I still will execute my promise, and will go through as much of that Dutch arrangement as in your conscience you can ask me without making a Sir Joseph York of me; but if that can be, I do most heartily urge you to pursue the notion of giving six weeks to it, and in my heart and conscience I am satisfied that it would be so best and soonest done; in that case, however, I find still an additional motive for declining this unprofitable simulacre de congrès at Petersburg which I so entirely distrust, for, in the case of your coming, I will most certainly put off my return to England, and pass with you in Holland whatever time it may be necessary for you to pass there. I am sure at Petersburg that I can do no good, and this persuasion is so strong that I would not advise you to send anybody there who so entirely disbelieved in any possible advantage to be derived from it; but trusting that you will feel upon this occasion the strength both of my arguments and my prejudices, I feel satisfied that it will not be pressed upon me. I am sure likewise that the benefit of your coming over and doing this business at the Hague would be incalculable, and I am sure I need not tell you how happy it will make me to come and write with you there instead of going and writing to you from thence. In either of these last cases I can perhaps be of some little use, but in that of Petersburg I know I can do nothing but waste my health, my temper, and my patience.

"I do not know what is become of your Flemish project, and of your officer Malcolm, for I have never received his instructions, nor have I a word from him, though I hear reports of his being with D'Yvoy in that country. Henry would have been no embarrassment to me, and as I think it would have been useful to him, I would have taken him if I had gone, but thank God there is now, I trust, no question of that. I am impatient to send away the dispatches to Whitworth, and this letter to Cuxhaven. When I leave Hamburg I will leave directions with Harward and Sir J. Crawford.

"I am delighted with our first success of the 27th, though I have no particulars. I conclude I shall find at Hamburg accounts of the whole thing being done, and I will then go and wait with the Prince of Orange the result of this warm and active measure, instead of going to freeze and shiver at Petersburg without the smallest chance of being useful.

"Of course I return the separate dispatch to Whitworth relating to myself, and I have not mentioned to you the future proposal of military operations with which I was to have been charged at Petersburg, because that proposal will be as easily and usefully stated by Whitworth as it could by me; but I cannot help suggesting one word of doubt whether your force as left in Holland will be found large enough in the 20,000 men which you propose, because Flanders, while still occupied by France, will still furnish means too large of attack for a body no larger in Holland than that which you name.

"I presume that Le Palue's friend is already come over to England, but in the last three weeks the Prince of Orange and M. D'Yvoy and M. Thuil have had in their own hands all the Flemish insurrection; and as I have known nothing of Malcolm, who is with some of them, I have not heard of any of the late intelligence from thence. As soon as I see the Prince of Orange, Stamford has promised to join me, and I will employ him about Le Palue's correspondent. I trust you have not forgot the letter I begged so urgently from the Stadtholder to enable Stamford, by leave of absence, to quit Berlin."

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, September 3. Dropmore.—“L’entreprise dont Wickham vous parle étoit une tentative pour passer l’Aar. Je vous envoie sa lettre particulière. Les dépêches sont aujourd’hui avec le Roi, mais quand elles retourneront, Hammond vous en communiquera le contenu. Il n’y a pas de langage pour exprimer l’infamie de cette Cour de Vienne. Lady Grenville et moi désirons infiniment de vous voir avec votre famille ici. Quand pourrez-vous nous donner ce plaisir? Nous y sommes établis pour tout le tems que sa Majesté passera à Weymouth, à l’exception seulement de mes courses occasionnelles en ville. Si vous serez prêt, mon courier partira demain pour Petersbourg, avec les excellentes nouvelles d’hier.

“Vous savez que la première division de vos troupes est arrivé à Elsinour. Elle est d’environ six mille hommes, les autres vaisseaux ayant été maltraités par le vent et ayant retournés à Revel. Ils viendront avec la seconde, qui ne tardera guères de suivre la première. C’est un beau coup que nous avons frappés, et nous voilà déjà dans le cœur de la Hollande, ce qui nous auroit coûté une campagne en arrivant par les provinces d’Outre Yssel.” Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE TO HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 4. Dropmore.—“I congratulate you sincerely on the surrender of the fleet, the consequences of which are beyond all calculation. Mitchell may now (as he proposes) arm a flotilla which will block Amsterdam, and oblige it to surrender even before it is invested by land. As I have seen nothing of Abercrombie’s letters but in the Gazette, I should be obliged to you to send me copies or originals of any which will explain his situation, progress, and views.

“Huskinson has sent me the two letters from Malcolm and Yvoy. It seems very pressing to take some decision upon them, and, though the sum appears large, it does not seem too much for the object, supposing that in a fair way of being accomplished as they assert.

“His demands are: 1, Money, of which you and Pitt will judge; but, 2, If credit to that extent is given a secretary and accountant well used to business seems quite indispensable. Some officer of inferior rank would, I should think, be best for that purpose, and hundreds would be eager for it.

3. “Military rank to enable him to command the whole thing as Brigadier-General. How far this is practicable in itself, and how far he is equal to a command of from 10 to 30,000 men I know not, but I should doubt both. Possibly it may damp his ardour, but it seems fair to tell him that if the thing took so large a shape as that, we must send officers of higher rank to conduct it; and they should be fixed now.

4. “Some English officers to assist him now, which seems very necessary.

"But, 5, the thing which he does not ask, and which seems above all things wanting, is some man of political conduct to direct so intricate and difficult a business precisely in the course that we wish it to take. I am afraid he is not equal to this, and some assistant of this description is absolutely necessary to prevent the Austrian emissaries from turning this, as they do every other exertion we make, solely to the profit of Vienna.

"You will have learnt that I was right in my conjecture, and that Thugut has told Lord Minto plainly that Austria will not hold the Netherlands. But there is no doubt she would be glad enough to take them by our money and efforts, and to exchange them precisely in the most injurious mode to our interests, by putting there some Italian Prince whose territories she has seized. This we must prevent at all risks, for there is hardly any political event that would be more hurtful to us.

"It is for this reason that I am clearly of opinion we ought to encourage this rising now, and support it by large efforts of arms and money, in order to have it sufficiently strong not to require any very large support of troops. Some British troops as a noyau we must let them have when they are to act; but these would, in case of success in Holland, be well spared from our army there, of which they would form the advanced guard.

"I hardly know who to recommend as a political mentor to Malcolm. I had thought of Paget, but with great talents, perhaps discretion and coolness is not his forte. He is, however, a man of uncommon ability (in my judgment) and he has that energy and activity of mind which such a service requires.

"Drake would not do it ill, but he is in ill health, and is named to another mission. Jackson on the whole I think the best that I have to recommend. If Pitt and you can think of any better man so much the better, but it should not be delayed, and therefore, when you have decided, you had best apprise Hammond of it that he may see the person you recommend, though it must be principally under your orders that he must act."

Postscript. "Above all things let Abercrombie keep Rottier where he is, and, by pretending to employ him, or even actually employing him in his flotilla, prevent his acting as Starhemberg's spy on all we do. Starhemberg is so much soured that this point is of more importance than you may think. He certainly would do us all the mischief he could in this business, and think he was serving his Court by it." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MINTO.

1799, September 4. Dropmore.—"You have certainly a most uncomfortable beginning of discussions at Vienna. Kalitscheff has written to Woronzow that, since the surrender of Alexandria and Mantua, Thugut's tone and views are changed, and so I fear it is.

"The abominable lies with which Dietrichstien has opened his career in Switzerland must, I believe, in all fair construction, be imputed to Thugut himself, whose instrument he seems to be for the purpose of keeping down the Archduke's reputation and influence. When one considers how near these people have been to the very brink of ruin, and how much they have still at stake, their conduct really appears almost incredible, if we were not condemned every day to see it, and suffer by it. They are perfectly incorrigible, and all we can do is to continue to depend upon them as little as possible. Wickham will have told you that they have [been] deceiving him all along about the strength of the Archduke's army. What Thugut now says about Massena's force is equally false, and must be known by him to be so. But if it were true, what excuse could be made for keeping the Austrian army of more than double the enemy's strength (for so the case would then be) acting for two months on the defensive; and at last sacrificing two cantons, and hazarding the bringing the French back into Swabia?

"You will have seen with pleasure our glorious and happy success at the Texel. There, thank God, we depend on no co-operation, and I hope the fullest success is now within our reach.

"If Lord Mulgrave is with you at Vienna, will you have the goodness to communicate to him my dispatches, and to add that I do not write to him, in order to avoid useless repetitions.

"I have urged my brother to go to Petersburg to carry on the discussion which, it is not difficult to foresee, that Thugut will find himself unable to decline. I know not whether I shall succeed in this request." Copy.

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE DON to W. HUSKISSON.

1799, September 4. Camp near Petten.—"I am directed by General Sir Ralph Abercromby to acquaint you that I was sent by him on Saturday last with a letter to the Batavian Directory. On my arrival at Schermershorn, the headquarters of General Daendels, he immediately sent an officer to General Le Brune desiring a passport for me. After various delays General Le Brune, this morning at Alkmaar, acquainted me that he had received orders from the Batavian Directory not only to prevent my proceeding to the Hague, but also not to receive any letter addressed to the Directory. From many circumstances which occurred while I was at the headquarters of Generals Daendels and Le Brune, I found that it was entirely owing to the latter that I was prevented proceeding to the Hague; indeed General Le Brune this morning very frankly told me that he would use his utmost endeavours to prevent any intercourse between the British army and the Batavian Directory." Copy.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 4. Headquarters, Schagen Brug.—"From the 27th of August to the 1st of September the troops continued to occupy the sand hills on which they fought, exposed to the inclemency of the weather which was uncommonly tempestuous, and labouring under the difficulty of a precarious subsistence from the want of horses to convey their provisions from the Helder; it became a matter, as much of necessity as of choice, to move forward.

"On the 1st instant the army marched and took post with its right to Petten on the German Ocean, and its left to Oude Sluys on the Zuyder Zee, with the canal of the Zuype in front.

"A better country is now open to us. We have found some horses and waggons and a plentiful supply of fresh provisions. The troops are in cantonments on the banks of the canal which abound in houses, and the men are in every respect more conveniently placed than if they were encamped without straw and on wet meadows. The enemy occupies Alkmaar and its vicinity. The Dutch troops are on the right at Scharmer Horn and Avens Horn, and the French in Alkmaar, Bergen and Egmont. The French may be estimated at six thousand men and the Dutch at nine or ten thousand men.

"On the 27th of August they had seven thousand men in the field and at the Helder, and they have since drawn from Friesland, Groeningen, Overysse, and Guelderland everything they could collect.

"The country between us and the enemy is entirely intersected with ditches and canals, except on the right, opposite to Petten, where the sand hills of Camperdown begin. In this situation I have judged it better not to seek an action until the arrival of reinforcements either from England or the Baltic, when the enemy will be forced to quit their present position, probably without fighting.

"The troops continue healthy and behave extremely well; no instance of outrage or even of plundering has occurred. The inhabitants seem to possess a perfect apathy, and our coming amongst them seems to have caused no surprise or emotion. The spirit of moderation which the Prince of Orange's proclamation breathes, gives satisfaction in the towns. The patriots even hope to be well received, and they already talk of a régence provisoire in which the moderate men of all parties expect to be included.

"I trust that the Duke of York, with all the force that can be spared, will arrive immediately; should that be the case, we may reasonably hope to penetrate to the Waal before the end of the campaign.

"Since the 1st instant, I have had no communication with Admiral Mitchell. I have repeatedly urged him, in the strongest terms, to fit out a number of gun boats and armed schuyts and even to threaten Amsterdam.

"Major General Don, whom I sent with a letter to the Batavian Directory, has not been permitted to proceed on his mission and has returned.

"We are in the greatest distress for the want of money, the Champion frigate not having arrived which had £200,000 on board. The 11th regiment of Dragoons are arrived, and have begun to disembark. The transports* have been ordered to return to the Downs, but Captain Woodruffe, the principal agent, informs me that they have received so much damage in the late gales of wind that they could not proceed to sea for a few days." Copy.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY to W. HUSKISSON.

Private.

1799, September 4. Schagenbrug.—“You will see by my letter to Mr. Dundas the situation of the army, and my determination. Send us all the force you can, that this business may be finished. I hear Brune and Daendels are on bad terms, and that the Batavian Directory are not free agents. Place no reliance on the good disposition of the country or of the army. We have had but fifteen deserters, and they are Germans. The transports* cannot, as Woodruffe informs me, sail for the Downes for a day or two, which I regret. We hear nothing of the Russians. The French force increases, they march from all parts of Flanders.” Extract.

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

Private and most secret.

1799, September 4. Dropmore.—“As Mr. Grenville’s proceeding to Petersburg or not is in some degree uncertain, and will depend on circumstances of which I shall probably not be apprized till his decision upon it has been taken, I think it necessary to desire of you, in this confidential manner, that if you shall not have learnt from him that it is likely he will arrive there soon after your receiving this letter, you would then take such preliminary steps as may be necessary to prepare the Emperor’s mind for an application which you will shortly be directed to make to him for allowing that a proportion, or possibly even the whole, of the army under General Herman should—if the counter-revolution in Holland takes place as speedily as may now be hoped—be employed this autumn, conjointly with a larger body of His Majesty’s troops, in an expedition to the coast of France, the particulars of which will be detailed to him in the greatest confidence.

“As Mr. G[renville] is apprized of the particulars of this subject, it would not be necessary for you to act in this matter without him, if he was likely to join you soon. If not, all that is wished in the present moment is, that you should prepare the way for a favourable reception of this proposal, but so as to preserve the utmost secrecy respecting it.” Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to W. WINDHAM.

1799, September 5. Dropmore.—“I send you Lord Minto’s last dispatches, and, when you have read them, I will thank you to return them to the Office. Wickham's I keep to work upon to-day, and will send them to you to-morrow, or the next day at furthest.

* (Marginal note)—They are arrived in the Downes.

"I own it seems to me that the moment is come for going much further than you propose in putting forward the Royalists. By profiting of the present pressure of the Directory, the Royalists might establish themselves in force sufficient to defy any attack from the present Government during the winter. If they do not do this, it is in vain to hope that they will be overlooked. Whenever the allied armies take their winter quarters, four or five months will be left open to the Directory for suppressing this spirit in the Vendée and elsewhere, and they will surely do it effectually if the Royalists are not in force to support themselves.

"Besides this, if we succeed in Holland we shall have a great disposable force (and possibly at no very distant period) to turn to the various operations that have been proposed. Whether these operations should point towards the Netherlands, or to any, and to what part of France, and with what immediate object of attack, it is I conceive now impossible to decide. I am not so wedded to my ideas of advantage in taking into our hands the arrangement of a counter-revolution in the Netherlands, as not to see many possible operations on the side of France to which we ought perhaps preferably to look; but if the Royalists are then still to be organized and raised, instead of being actually on foot and in great force, that may decide the question for us.

"I shall, however, wait without taking further steps on this subject till I receive the plan which Duthell is to give to Frere, and I will then state my ideas, not in general, but with reference to the particular things to be done." Copy.

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 5. Bifrons, near Canterbury.—"I have seen Dundas this morning, and on talking over your letter this morning respecting the Netherlands, we are both clearly of opinion that Malcolm is too young an officer for such a command as may be in question. The person whom we should, without hesitation, name as the best military man for the purpose is Colonel Maitland, and his talents would render him equally fit for the political management, without the necessity of finding any other assistant. Great advantage would arise from the conduct of the whole being thus united in one person. We would not, however, finally determine without knowing whether you see any objection to our choice. I very much hope you will not, as I am sure there is no ground for any jealousy on account of Maitland's former politics or connections, and I am much mistaken if his abilities are not such as to make it a fortunate circumstance to be able to bring him forward.

"I send this letter through Hammond, to be forwarded to you by a messenger, and, if you approve, be so good to desire him to inform Huskisson, that he may lose no time in settling with Maitland as to his own going, and in consulting with him respecting officers to accompany him.

"There will, I conceive, be no difficulty in giving him, and Malcolm under him, as well as any other officers, sufficient local rank; but we shall be able to settle this more precisely to-morrow after talking with the Duke of York. I have no doubt about giving either to Maitland or Malcolm credit to the extent proposed; and we must look out for some secretary or accountant."

Postscript. "This east wind must bring our Russians and our transports. The moment the latter come, all the troops here will embark."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 5. London.—"J'ai reçu votre billet; nous aurons le plaisir de venir à Dropmore dimanche, et d'y rester jusqu'à mardi matin.

"Mr. Hamond m'a lue votre dépêche à mylord Minto. Je vous remercie infiniment pour cette communication. Elle est trop longue pour ma pauvre mémoire, et trop importante pour je puisse, sans avoir un précis sous les yeux, en faire une dépêche pour ma cour. J'écrirai donc à Rastopchin pour qu'il parle à fond sur ce sujet avec le Chevalier Whitworth. Mais je ne manquerai pas de lui écrire en mon particulier tout ce que je pense sur la conduite de Thugut, d'après les informations que j'ai de Kalitcheff. Je vous envoie la copie de ma dépêche par le dernier courrier, du vingt-sept du passé. Vous verrez que j'ai étendu dans plusieurs points votre memorandum, que quand vous ne parliez que de la distance de Petersbourg, j'ai ajouté celle de Vienne et de Londrès, qui, toutes trois, sont hors du centre et peu propres pour un lieu de Congrès. Je l'ai fait pour qu'on ne puisse croire chez nous que c'est Petersbourg seul qu'on voudroit ici exclure.

"J'ai étendu aussi vos sentiments sur vos droites à quelques indemnités maritimes, en entrent dans les dépenses énormes que vous avez fais, et l'acroissement de la dette et de taxes qui s'en est suivi. Il [est] bon qu'on le sache chez nous. Je crois avoir été exacte, car mes calculs sont tirés de l'ouvrage de Monsieur Rose."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, September 6. Dropmore.—"Je vous renvoie les papiers que vous avez eu la bonté de m'envoyer, et que je ne dois plus espérer de pouvoir vous remettre d'ici à quelques jours. Notre hôpital va cependant mieux depuis que je vous ai écrit hier-au-soir, mais il ne faut pas que vous, ni vos enfants, vous exposiez au moindre risque.

"Vous avez supérieurement bien renforcé l'esquisse que j'avois tracé. Certainement mes idées y ont beaucoup gagné, et je trouve parfait tout ce que vous avez ajouté au sujet du congrès, et de nos dépenses. Sur l'article des vues possibles de l'Autriche en Italie, j'aurois peut-être plus de doute.

“Le meilleur arrangement de tous pour la paix de l'Europe auroit été celui qui résulte d'abord de l'application pure et simple de nos principes, qui sont aussi ceux de votre souverain ; mais il n'est pas difficile de prévoir que l'Autriche y repugneroit absolument, et qu'on n'aura jamais le moyen de l'y forcer sans réplonger l'Europe dans le cahos d'où nous voulons la tirer. Ne vaut-il donc pas mieux recevoir la communication de ses plans, les examiner, les modifier dans la discussion qui va s'ouvrir, les diriger s'il est possible vers l'intérêt général, plutôt que de les rejeter totalement, et de premier abord ? Une pareille exclusion ne pourroit-elle pas rejeter cette Cour de Vienne qu'on ne tient que par l'intérêt, ou dans une inaction totale, ou bien dans des négociations secrètes ? Et dans le dernier cas, le Directoire ne lui prodigueroit-il pas des concessions en Italie pour avoir une paix séparée, et rester par là en possession de la Suisse, de l'Allemagne, des Pais-Bas, et peut-être même de la Hollande, où on pourroit alors nous opposer toutes les armées réunies de la France ?

“Je vous prie de pèsér dans votre sagesse toutes ces considérations, et d'examiner ensuite la question si, en rapprochant les frontières Italiennes de l'Autriche, et de la France, on ne se procure pas un grand avantage pour la tranquillité future de l'Europe ?

“L'essentiel est sans doute de concilier tout arrangement à cet égard avec les principes de justice et de bonne foi, dont il ne faut pas se départir pour des avantages particuliers. Je ne le crois pas impossible, et, ne pouvant faire le mieux, il ne faut pas renoncer à l'espoir de faire le bien.

“Toutes ces idées demanderoient, comme vous le sentez bien, une discussion très approfondie. Nous en parlerons à la première occasion. Il y en aura bien le tems. Il ne s'agit aujourd'hui que de ne pas y donner une exclusion précipitée.”

Postscript. “Je vois que je ne vous ai pas parlé de la proposition Bavaoise. Il me paroît peu juste que nous devions payer les princes d'Allemagne pour s'acquitter de leurs obligations vers l'empire. Surtout le Bavière, dont la plus grande partie n'a rien suffert de la guerre.” Copy.

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 6. Duke Street, Westminster.—“I am much concerned at the cause that makes you wish not to see me at Dropmore, and very sorry on many accounts that I am deprived at this moment of the pleasure of seeing you. I send you by the Prince of Orange's desire the enclosed papers, amongst which there are some very curious. I am in possession of the Pensionary's mémoire on the Constitution. It is in Dutch, but I am going to translate it, and will send it to you as soon as I possibly can. I am sure you will read it with pleasure. I informed the Prince of Orange of the plan you mentioned to me yesterday morning respecting the Dutch fleet after their arrival here. He is extremely concerned and alarmed about it, and is very much afraid (I must say I think not without reason) that this plan, if immediately executed, will make a very bad impression upon our friends in Holland, and create much uneasiness and distrust there at a moment when it is so much to be wished that the good dispositions of the people may be conciliated and cultivated. I need not dwell upon the force of this argument. I am sure you will feel it as strongly as I do, and I therefore join my entreaties to those of the Prince of Orange that when the Dutch ships arrive here, the plan you mentioned to me may at least be delayed for some time, and the appearance kept up of this fleet being really at the Prince of Orange's disposition, and ready to be restored, in its present state, to the old and lawful government of the United Provinces as soon as it will be re-established. This re-establishment we must hope will take place within no very remote period, and in the meantime the expense of maintaining those ships in their present state cannot be much greater than that which would be incurred by paying the crews two months' wages. I should be very much obliged to you if you could send me some answer upon this subject, and enable me to say something satisfactory about it to the Prince, who takes it very much at heart. If I had had the pleasure of seeing you to-day, as I hoped, I should have been able to enter into more detail upon this subject than I think it necessary or proper to trouble you with in writing.

"I also enclose a note which I received last night from the Princess, and which I beg you will have the goodness to return me when you have perused it. You will find much in it that I stated to you in the different conversations we had upon one of the subjects mentioned in it. The Prince, who is in town, still promised to settle the business of M. de Rhoon in some shape or other to-day."

The MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 6. Stowe.—"I cannot say, whatever may be the urgency at Petersburg, that I shall be sorry (for the reasons I gave you) that Tom should refuse to abandon the object of Holland. Your proposition of six weeks at the Hague with him is different; and will, I am sure, be very useful to the cause; but still I am very much in earnest in wishing you not to leave England at moments so critical as those must be that are to roll over us six weeks hence. You take my proposition as I meant it. My blood burns to be useful, and when I talked to you of Russifying myself as your messenger, I exactly meant to offer one of the things the most unpleasant to me. On the militia subject I would, if possible, avoid the meeting of Parliament; and yet I do not see how it will be practicable to procure for you any considerable accession without the assistance of the law, unless (what I do not know from want of proper returns) a large proportion of the reduced new militia quota of 76,000 men (or in exact numbers 76,542) remain in service. From the few authentic documents in my hands, I cannot imagine that any very large proportion of these remain in petto ; for the return of the rank and file English militia was only 81,303 when the Bill passed, from which if you deduct 57,407 (the reduced $\frac{3}{4}$ of 76,542) the difference is only 23,896, from which are to be deducted the numbers already volunteered.

“If this statement is correct, the only choice is that of encouraging further volunteering of private militia into the line, or the voluntary offers of regiments or detachments to serve for a limited time ; or perhaps both these resources may be necessary ; but to either of them the consent of Parliament is necessary, and therefore I fear that this measure must to a certain degree draw into length.

“I do not like to make up my mind to any system or plan on this subject till I see the whole of the data ; but, from the best consideration that I can give to the matter, I should suppose that you may get 8 or 10,000 more volunteers ; but very many reasons that I could explain will prevent a further accession to the line beyond this number ; and unless some means can be devised to make this reduction fall more evenly upon regiments, jealousies will arise that will obstruct the service. The deficiency can only be made up by the voluntary offers of regiments, or of parts of regiments, to serve for a limited time, in such a manner as should make them most manageable ; and this sort of requisition, supposing it to be done by detachment, should extend to the Scotch and to the Irish militia. I should object very much to the idea of permitting whole regiments to volunteer, because I saw the very unpleasant difficulties of this measure (in the Irish business) both with respect to officers and men ; of whom, in every corps, there were very many who refused, and many more who went most unwillingly on service ; the high rank of our commanding officers would be a most serious objection. Such a body of detachments (if only one-tenth man) would give above 9,000 men ; and in the distribution of them the Crown would name the Field and Staff officers, by lending them from the skeleton regiments without expense to the public ; and, as they would be sent complete in arms and accoutrements, they would be ready to embark at a moment’s notice, instead of waiting with the hurry and confusion that has been seen at Barham Downs, for want of arms and accoutrements.”

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private and confidential.

1799, September 6. Schaffhausen.—“I think the remedy proposed in my public dispatch of this day’s date, if extended to the Russian commission, will even meet the evil pointed out in my last private letter to your Lordship, supposing, which I sincerely hope is not the case, that there should have been heretofore any little irregularity of conduct. I know that in the Mediterranean army the place of Commissioner of Accounts has been found to answer every purpose intended, and that the strictest purity of conduct pervaded every department, owing to the active superintendence of this officer.

"If, as I presume must be the case, the subsidies granted to Switzerland are to be regularly voted by Parliament, it seems that it would be better for all parties that the Commissary of Accounts should be appointed by a Treasury Commission; the more so as the military commissary, though appointed in your Lordship's office, is directed to draw his bills on the Treasury, who will be entitled to look after his accounts. Whether this custom of making a profit on the exchange, or on the commission of bills, be of old standing or no I cannot say. If it be, it would be hard to deprive any person of it who has accepted an appointment under such expectation. But that it exists I am certain; and your Lordship will see by the enclosed letter from Sir J. Craufurd that, as to the commission at least, it has even gained the corps diplomatique.

"I never was an enemy to profits arising from fees: but those which are made by handling of the public money are not less pernicious to the morals of the individual, than hurtful to the State. Secret service money in particular, in its very nature, forbids the deriving any profit, direct or indirect, from its employment; and, if such a thing were once permitted, there would be an end at once of that high sense of honour, and of what is due to his personal character and to his place, which can alone engage a foreign minister to undertake, and support him in the execution of that most unpleasant part of his public duty.

"I have given Sir J. Craufurd a very indirect and somewhat Jesuitical answer, as your Lordship will learn from the enclosed. Pray have the goodness to burn the whole correspondence.

"I do not think, myself, that Ramsay or any other person will be equal to the Russian mission and the Swiss commissariat together, unless by his Russian commission he has nothing to do but draw bills. But if he is to be running to headquarters, the thing will not do.

"Believe me, the place of Swiss Commissary, if well executed, will find a man full and sufficient employment. It requires he who holds it should be always to be found, that is always either in his office or riding to see the different corps; but he had better remain in his office, and, as much as possible, make them come to him to be inspected. But, above all, he must not be running about headquarters, or riding to look at every operation of the army as Craufurd was doing; to which I attribute, first, the neglect of his proper business, then dissatisfaction with himself which he was too proud to avow, and lastly, ill-humour and spleen vented on everybody that came near him.

"The business of the Condé army was neglected, and the most extravagant prodigality and disorder took place in the management of their funds from the moment that poor Charles Craufurd was appointed to attend headquarters. In one word, it seems to me quite impossible that the two places should be executed by the same person with advantage to the public service, unless Lord Mulgrave's residence at the Russian army would relieve Ramsay from everything but drawing bills; and, in that case, indeed, I do not know that there would be any great objection to his exercising the two functions.

"I do not know whether it [is] his Lordship that is intended for the command of the Swiss troops. I am sure that a better appointment cannot be made. But whether he is the person or no, it is most expedient and necessary that he should come and reside here without delay; and I most sincerely trust that no etiquette will prevent his remaining with the Russian army at least, even should he not be able to communicate with the Austrian.

"There is an absolute want of some one here having the real confidence of Government, and, at the same time, invested with authority without which, at this distance from home, and with the people you have to deal with, nothing can be done. Your Lordship will see from my last despatches by East that, with the best intention possible, Craufurd and Ramsay, from not knowing what was really passing at headquarters, or what was the intention and plans of the Court of Vienna and of the Archduke, were giving Korsakoff very bad counsel, which, had he followed, he would most undoubtedly have been in a very serious scrape. The same thing may happen to-morrow; and, unless Lord Mulgrave return, I am liable, with the real secret of Government exclusively in my possession, and precisely because I dare not venture to reveal it, to be counteracted by the opinion and advice which either of those gentlemen may give to M. Korsakoff. Your Lordship therefore must either give to them, or authorise me to give to them, more of confidence; or direct them to take no step when Lord Mulgrave shall be absent without consulting me.

"Certainly both these gentlemen misunderstand the nature of my place, because they sent despatches last night by Colonel Craufurd's servant to Cuxhaven without communicating to me even the nature of their contents; and that at a great expense to the public, as, at the same time, I had Ruff the messenger waiting here, meaning to send him to-day. Your Lordship will see also, by the enclosed note from Ramsay, that express directions were given to the man not to call here if he passed in the night, which he must necessarily do leaving Zurich in the evening, so that I could not send despatches by him. It will not be possible for me to take responsibility on myself if these things be not corrected. I am at this moment collecting every information for Lord Minto that may throw light on the conduct of the Austrians. Those gentlemen, who are at the source of intelligence, not only do not assist me, but they do not even let me know what they themselves communicate to Government.

"I am confident that this is not out of any disrespect to me, but from a mistaken notion of their own places as well as of mine; and perhaps because I do not think myself authorised to communicate to them what I receive from Vienna which they may have taken amiss.

"Recurring once again to the subject on which I have said so much above, your Lordship may be assured that neither the people of this country nor the Austrians will place any confidence in, or give any attention to any but a General Officer of rank, or the King's Minister duly accredited.

"Charles Craufurd was an exception to this rule, in what respects the Austrians; but you must find another Charles Craufurd (of whom the whole army even now speaks with regret) before you will find another exception."

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 6. Schaffhausen.—"I think it necessary to inform your Lordship that I have not written a word to Count Woronzow on the subject of what has passed here since the attempt to cross the Aar until to-day, when I have sent him five lines saying that your Lordship would inform him of everything that was worth knowing.

"Your Lordship is the only judge whether it would be expedient to inform him, what I am sorry to say is the case, that there is an intrigue in the Russian army against Korsakoff, who is generally considered among the superior officers as unequal to the command. In truth he appears to me to be of very second-rate abilities, and to have a degree of indecision about him that would prevent his doing anything great, were his military talents ever so superior.

"I mention this because there seems to be a personal intimacy between the two, and, from the constant questions which Korsakoff asks about Woronzow's daughter, I am inclined to think that there is a marriage in contemplation between the two families.

"I find that there is an intrigue in the Austrian [army] to take Colonel Vinerode away from Marshal Suwaroff. From all that I can learn Vinerode is the man of all others who ought, at any price, to be kept where he is. M. Thugut has left him at headquarters hitherto because the existence of a great portion of the Austrian army was at stake. But the moment that the Marshal shall find himself with Russian troops only under his command, I fear he will be deprived of all effective Austrian assistance; and all accounts agree in this, that the Russian army is unequal to many operations from the want of good staff-officers. I don't know much of Vinerode's history, still less of his fortune and connections; but, if he is accessible to offers of any kind, I think it would be well worth while that Lord Mulgrave or somebody should be authorised to make them, in case the Austrians should insist on removing him.

"The Archduke has left General Hiller with Korsakoff, who is a good officer, but thoroughly Austrian; and, in general, persons of this description only will be placed at Russian headquarters.

"The jealousy of the Austrians, and the manner in which they shew and express it, is so perfectly ludicrous that it would really keep one, if not in good humour, at least well amused, were it not for the very serious consequences with which it is attended. It is difficult, however, to say whether they are more jealous of the Russians or of Lord Nelson and Sir Sidney Smith. Of late I have observed that they are preparing their batteries against the Duke of York and Sir Ralph Abercrombie."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 6. Walmer Castle.—"I am so hurried all this day, and have been so for some days past, that I could not write to you. At present the Duke of York is here, and as this day is appropriated to the despatch of all business with him, I have only time to send you the only two private letters I have received from Sir Ralph Abercrombie. He clearly means Amsterdam and the Hague when he was in a state to move, which he probably was soon after the dispatch of his last letter, for he had got a regiment of cavalry which I had sent unknown to him, and I would hope the island of the Texel would afford him some horses and waggons, the enemy having removed all the others from the neighbourhood of the Helder. I have directed Huskisson to send you a copy of the Duke of York's instructions. I must send others from time to time.

"With all the exultation of our present brilliant success, it is impossible to look back without horror upon the risk our army run in hazarding a landing under such circumstances; and the steadiness and bravery they displayed under every disadvantage has seldom been equalled."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MULGRAVE.

Private.

1799, September 6. Dropmore.—"I send this letter to Switzerland by the messenger who carries my dispatches to Wickham, but I think it more than probable it will not find you there. I do not therefore enter into a long detail of the conduct to be pursued in the strange circumstances which the tergiversation and lies (for there really is no more diplomatic word to use on the occasion) of Austria have produced. I hope all this will not so far disgust you (though it is disgusting enough God knows) as to induce you to leave the thing while there is any hope of doing good. I have been struggling seven years together against this system of conduct, and though I have met with discouragements enough, yet I have always found that at the end the straightest road is the shortest, and that a little patience and perseverance bore one through, though neither as soon nor as well as the interests we are fighting for required.

"Not knowing where to write instructions to you, I do not know how to frame them, and must therefore content myself, till I hear from you again, with referring you to what I write to Lord Minto and to Wickham, and which will, I hope, be found sufficient for your guidance either in Switzerland or at Vienna."

Postscript. "I have received your letters from Berlin. All the ideas you state are precisely those which had also occurred to us when we came to the knowledge of the circumstances to which they relate. You will not have been in time to stop the Russians. If you had, that was unquestionably the best thing to do." Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 6. Hamburgh.—“I arrived here yesterday and was overtaken by dispatches from Wickham under flying seal, which he desired me to forward to Sir C. Whitworth. In the same moment Mason came hither with dispatches from Petersburg; I have therefore sent him back to Sir Charles with the letters from Wickham, which, as they relate to the retaining in Swisserland the whole of Korsakow's corps against the orders of Suwaroff, I thought it highly important to forward without loss of time.

“I perceive by the letters from Petersburg that my hopes of seeing Panin replace the insufficient Rozamowsky at Vienna are at an end, as the Emperor has destined him to the more honourable but more arduous task of replacing Kotchouby at Petersburg, with the function, though without the title of, Vice-Chancellor; a promotion which, by Panin's letter to me of the 31st ultimo, I perceive he then had no knowledge or expectation of. It is no doubt a great advantage to the objects which we are pursuing at Petersburg that they should be assisted by the good sense, good talents, and good principles of Count Panin. I know that his friends, and none more so than General Stamford, are so impressed with the dangers which he will have to encounter in the intrigues of Petersburg, that they would all have preferred for him at this moment a continuance of his services in the foreign line, rather than any confidential employment in the Russian Cabinet, where they think he will be exposed to great hazards from the advantage which his enemies will have in the personal disinclination which the Emperor is supposed to have to him. I fear this is but too true, and my regard for him makes me see this danger with uneasiness, but yet I must honestly confess that I cannot wish it otherwise; we live in times where so much is at stake that we must every day give to chance more than in human prudence we should be inclined to do; and in pursuing manfully this honourable struggle, we must pursue the advantage of the day, whatever be the risk or the sacrifice of ourselves or our friends. With this impression, as I see a present good in placing Panin where he can be so eminently useful, I rest entirely upon that advantage gained, and will not sully the gloss of it by any doubtful apprehensions for the future. I am to the greatest degree anxious, however, for the result of the effort which Wickham's letter to me of the 25th ultimo announces for the two following days. If that effort be successful, success may give a new shape and colour in that quarter, and may somewhat better conciliate the narrow and selfish views of the Austrian Cabinet to the pursuit of objects of common interest; if unfortunately any reverse should happen in this critical moment of the Archduke's attack, still one may fairly hope that the increased danger will force these clashing powers and authorities to agree at least in measures of common safety as of mutual preservation. I can easily conceive how much Marshal Suwarrow must have been teased and fretted by the contradictions which he has met with; but if, in these circumstances, he disapproves of Wickham retaining the troops of Korsakow, or remonstrates against Korsakow for acquiescing in them, I shall have less esteem for his judgment and temper than I would hope to have.

“ You will naturally suppose me partial to my own view of foreign politics, and to the general motives which I described in my last letter as inducing me still to think that I could be more useful to you in this quarter of the world than in the northern course which you had suggested, but all the reflection which I have been able to give to the subject since I last wrote to you has hitherto only confirmed me in that opinion; and I am not shaken in it by seeing that Panin’s assistance is no longer to be expected at Vienna, which was, as you recollect, a measure to which I had looked with good hope of advantage. If he is not there in person he will be there in correspondence, and from his new official situation at Petersburg he will shake a little energy into Rozamowsky at Vienna, or shake him out of the mission which he has rendered so ineffectual there; but, with the distance of Petersburg from the scene of action, it is hopeless to make that the point from which the military operations can be directed. I am aware it may be said that the plan may be arranged there liable to such alterations as may become necessary; but see only how ineffectual such a plan would be for the control of Austrian operations, when Thugut could himself create everyone of those cases which, in fair reasoning, ought to be left as cases of exception; with what hope or spirit would it be possible for us to be discussing nice points of military arrangements at Petersburg when one month at least must pass to procure a letter and answer between Petersburg and Vienna, and half as much more, if English correspondence is to be added to it; and these being the obvious and natural difficulties arising only from the local situation of Petersburg, see what they will become when they are to be made the instruments of delay in the hands of Thugut, and the means by which he is to render ineffectual a control which he cannot approve of, and which is so little consistent with the views and with the habits or practice of the Austrian Cabinet. If, instead of this remote and inapplicable control, there was given from Petersburg and from London a large power into the hands of able and active ministers, with proper directions to support each other, and to act promptly and immediately at Vienna, as the occasion should offer, that shape might furnish the control which you wish, and Thugut would have no means of escaping from it until he should feel safe enough and bold enough to quarrel with it. But after all, the objections of this nature are not so arduous as that of Thugut’s natural repugnance to this proposition of Cobenzel’s, a repugnance very naturally felt by him, very strongly expressed by him, and in itself becoming thereby an insurmountable obstacle to any real or solid negotiation being carried on there. Why does Cobenzel wish it ? In order to draw from Vienna to Petersburg the important discussions which seem to belong to the present state of Europe ; but is that a motive which Thugut will lend himself to, or will wish to encourage and assist the pursuit of ; is it not rather precisely the motive which will most powerfully weigh with him against giving to it any real effect, whatever may be the tone which, in prudence, he will assume concerning it. I believe I am repeating over and over again what I have already said to you more than enough, but, in truth, this latter difficulty arising from Thugut's avowed dislike of the proposition appears to me to be entirely fatal to it, and to leave us nothing to expect from it except the little and wearisome detail of Austrian intrigues to renew at Petersburg the dilatory nothingness of a Rastadt congress. Can Woronzow and you understand each other in the extent of Italian sacrifice which you can endure for the sake of obtaining a thorough good understanding with Austria ? If you can do this, does it not promise a better chance to open this fairly to them at Vienna, and try to hold Thugut to it by the joint influence of the two allied Ministers at the Court of Vienna who, having made their bargain with Thugut, will naturally overlook the due performance of it, and will see that the course of military operations on their side is justly and fairly executed. I own that there is no little difficulty in finding the exact quantum which you may be content to see stripped from the former governments of Italy to satisfy the avidity of the Imperial eagle. I confess there will be a good deal of delicacy likewise in the manner as well as in the matter of this proposition, but at least, when such a proposition has been made to Thugut and accepted by him, whatever has been lost, there will at least have been something effectual obtained ; whereas, at Petersburg and with Cobenzel, you will have all the same difficulty and delicacy in treating with the Austrian Minister there, and you will find, besides, that you have done nothing and advanced not a step as to any efficient purpose ; because you will either be continually referred to Vienna, which will protract your negotiation beyond all bounds, or, if you act independently of Vienna and trust to Cobenzel's conceit of doing the business independently of Thugut, you will find yourself thwarted in the course of it, or you will see Cobenzel unsupported in the conclusion of it. I would not have wearied you again with this repetition if I was not anxious to shew you how strongly I have at least conceived the objections which made part of the ground on which I thought myself obliged to demur to your proposal of my journey to Petersburg. The other and remaining ground of my objection was found in my desire to make myself useful to you in the United Provinces, and in the pressing necessity which seemed to me to arise for my giving myself entirely and absolutely to the assistance of the Hereditary Prince of Orange.

“ You know that the chief object of my latter stay at Berlin was to prevent the mischief of the apparent rupture, and perhaps the actual hostility, which was to be feared between Petersburg and Berlin; and a subordinate object was that of watching a little the course of the French negotiation with Berlin. I had the satisfaction of leaving these two points very much as I had wished to leave them, and I then hastened to this place upon my road to Lingen to join the Prince of Orange. When I received your letter at Kleitz, I was very much persuaded by all which I had heard that there would be some struggle in Holland, and although I had no doubt of the successful result of it, it seemed not unlikely that it would last some time before the event was entirely decided. In this view I had originally engaged the Hereditary Prince to approach the frontiers, and I had conceived with him the possibility of his penetrating into Friesland and Groningen and hoisting his standard there, while the English troops were fighting for him upon the coasts of Holland and of Zealand. If this had been the case, I had flattered myself that I might very probably have been of some little use to him by giving something of English assistance to an enterprise of a hazardous description. With this expectation I arrived here last night and received the welcome news from Captain Winthorp of the surrender of the Dutch fleet in the Texel, and of the dismay which this had naturally produced upon the enemy. Full of this good news I was this morning preparing to cross the Elbe on my road to Lingen when I suddenly heard that the Prince had passed to Embden on the 3rd instant to embark for the Texel. I instantly sent a messenger to Bremen to the Prince's correspondent there to know all that can be known of his intentions, but I have no doubt that he is already gone; although his last letter to me of the 31st from Lingen described his intention still to be that of penetrating from the German frontier. I have no doubt that he has done perfectly right in pursuing his course immediately from Embden by sea to the army, and I am hourly in expectation of hearing from him what are his objects and intentions; but till I know something more of them, it appears to me that it is to no purpose whatever for me to pursue my journey to Lingen, and therefore I shall wait here for better information, and for the direction of such new circumstances as may arise.

"Among these difficulties perhaps I should also state to you that I have some little doubt how far I am authorised in pursuing any separate journey to that country, now that the Hereditary Prince is no longer in question on this side of the Dutch republic. When my mission to Berlin was terminated in my audience of leave, I was directed to apply myself entirely to the subject of the United Provinces, and to give what assistance I could by my communication with the Hereditary Prince. As long as there was any chance of his entering Holland with a separate force of his own friends from the German frontier, I own I had good hopes of making myself useful to him. I have no doubt that he has judged rightly in quitting this frontier to take the protection of the English army, but this change in his situation makes it useless for me to proceed to the frontier, and I have great doubts whether, according to my present instructions, I should be authorised in the present circumstances to proceed into the country until I should have more distinct directions and authority to do so. You will, however, easily understand me by this to imagine that there is not either in this instant, as it seems to me, any great object in my doing so, because if there should be any such, I have always told you that I should do as well as I could in the pursuit of it, and trust to after-chances for reconciling what was done to the forms and to the routine of office. Another hesitation of the same nature arises, however, from the distant hope which you have held out to me that it might not be impossible for you yourself to come and turn this shapeless mass into good order and propriety; a hope which I really think so full of the best promises that I cannot help recurring to it from every motive public and private, and therefore I would fain measure my steps if possible to make them keep time with yours, and, as I said before, to write with you and for you instead of writing to you; yet, anxious as I am for this good promise, I would not let even that stand in the way of any real good which I could do if I saw any to be done. Upon the further consideration of your last letter to me I am, however, of the opinion that you have not completely and entirely settled your own wishes and arrangements, and therefore I feel still an additional motive for suspending on my part any farther step till I hear, as doubtless I very shortly shall do, what your ultimate resolutions are; and I know not where I can so speedily hope to learn them as by remaining here. Here then I shall remain until I either hear something decisive from you; or until I hear something in which I can be useful to the Hereditary Prince of Orange; or until some new event shall seem to offer so much advantage from my moving as to supersede the necessity of any new instructions to me, or of any new authority to be given to me: any such case I always shall consider as a new instruction, but without it I always feel a scruple to do more lest I should embarrass where I mean to assist.

“I do not write to you of the Dutch news here, because I have none except what is furnished from Sir J. Crawford, who writes it to you by this messenger. I am delighted at our having obtained possession of the Dutch fleet without any engagement, because the Dutch navy has been so generally well affected that I should have been grieved to have seen a sharp battle where there was no animosity.”

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 7. Duke Street, Westminster.—“I wish to lose no time in sending you the Pensionary’s mémoire, and as I have no time to make a fair copy of the translation I have made of it, I take the liberty to send you the enclosed brouillon as it is.

“I have the pleasure to tell you that Rhoon’s business is adjusted in a manner with which he is perfectly satisfied. The Prince gives him an instruction to settle the affairs of the Admiralties in Holland, without any reference to the fleet that is coming here. I hope to be able to communicate to you very soon a translation of this paper. Rhoon is now ready to go over to Holland, as soon as he has seen you. He is highly pleased both with what the Prince has done, and with the manner in which he has done it. He wishes that an armed vessel may be appointed to carry him over; that he may be furnished with the pecuniary means he is in want of; and he will be very much obliged to your lordship to give him a letter for General Abercromby. He should wish to have some sort of instruction or commission from you, which he thinks would be the means of protecting him against the danger he would incur if he had the misfortune to fall into the hands of the Batavians.

"I am fully aware of your disposition to settle the business of the fleet in the best manner possible, and you may be satisfied that I will do whatever lays in my power (as I have done already) to make the Prince of Orange sensible to the necessity of attending to the circumstances of the case, in order finally to arrange the matter agreeably to your wishes, which I trust may be done in some way or other so as to content him also. In this case I must say, in justice to him, that the uneasiness he expressed at what I stated to him yesterday morning proceeded much more from the fear he really entertained of the impression the thing would produce in Holland, than from any desire of seeing these ships at his disposal. I am fully sensible of the difficulty respecting the officers, and I shall write to the Prince on that subject to-morrow. More of this when I have the pleasure of seeing you.

"I am very happy to hear your patient is so much better. I very much wish to be able to come to you (agreeably to your kind invitation) to-morrow or the day after, but I am afraid it will not be in my power to be with you before Tuesday, as my presence in town is absolutely necessary. However, if you should wish to see me sooner, have the goodness to let me know, and I will come immediately, and defer what I have to do till it suits you."

Enclosure.

Mémoire by VAN DE SPIEGEL (formerly Grand Pensionary of Holland) on the project of uniting the whole Netherlands under the rule of the Prince of Orange. Translated from Dutch into French.

"Seroit-il avantageux pour notre République qu'au moyen d'un arrangement à faire à la paix générale, les 10 provinces ci-devant Autrichiennes fussent réunies aux nôtres, et ne formassent qu'une république ?

"A considérer la question superficiellement on diroit qu'oui ; car il semble qu'un pareil arrangement donneroit un grand accroissement de forces à l'état ; et si l'on fait dépendre uniquement de là le bonheur d'un pays, l'on a raison ; mais il est encore d'autres considérations qu'on ne doit pas négliger.

“En premier lieu la République changeroit par là entièrement de forme, et il faudroit conclure une ligue tout-à-fait nouvelle avec des contrées qui diffèrent de nous par la religion, par les moeurs, les intérêts, quelques-unes même par le langage ; or il est à peu près politiquement impossible d’espérer une réunion solide et sincère entre des élémens aussi discordans. L’Empereur Charles Quint a déjà énergiquement voulu cette réunion, mais il a été obligé d’abandonner son projet à cause des difficultés qu’il y voyoit. On le reprit pendant la guerre avec l’Espagne, et la pacification de Gand de 1576 semblait y paver les voyes ; mais on ne tarda pas à s’apercevoir combien il en résultoit peu d’avantages, et, trois ans après, les sept provinces se séparèrent des autres, et conclurent entre elles l’union d’Utrecht.

2. “Notre république est bâtie sur des bases toutes différentes de celles qu’il faudroit alors ; nous avons été une puissance maritime, et nous deviendrions une puissance continentale : la chaîne de fortifications qui avoit été construite contre des attaques qui pouvoient nous être faites du côté des provinces Autrichiennes, devra être placée ailleurs, et comme ces provinces n’ont point de forteresses, on sera obligé d’en construire de nouvelles ; notre politique a toujours été d’empêcher que le commerce ne se transportât de chez nous dans la Flandre et le Brabant, ce qui seroit certainement arrivé au moyen de l’Escaut jusqu’à Anvers, d’Ostende, et d’un canal qu’il auroit été facile de creuser depuis Bruges, si notre république ne s’y étoit constamment opposée par la force et par les stipulations de traités. Maintenant ces maximes devoient être changées, et n’en résulteroit-il pas bien vite que le Brabant et la Flandre redeviendroient ce que ces provinces étoient il y a 300 ans, savoir, le théâtre d’une prospérité sans bornes, tandis que la Hollande et la Zeelande rentreroient dans leur ancien état, et serviroient de nouveau de demeure à quelques pauvres pêcheurs ?

3. “Le voisinage de la France ne nous entraineroit-il pas dans des guerres continuelles ? La politique de nos ancêtres a toujours consisté à éviter ce voisinage, et à avoir plutôt une puissance intermédiaire entre la France et nous ; c’est pour cette raison que le Prince Frédéric-Henri d’Orange n’a jamais pu réussir à faire la conquête des Pays-bas, conformément au traité de partage avec la France, quoiqu’il les ait attaqués à plusieurs reprises à la tête des armées Françaises et de celles de notre république. Mais chez nous on voyoit ces projets avec déplaisir, et on les a toujours traversés. C’est encore pour la même raison qu’en 1701, lors de la grande alliance entre l’Empereur, la Grande Bretagne, et notre République, le Roi Guillaume stipula que les Pays-bas Espagnols serviroient de barrière pour l’état, mais ne cherche jamais à lui en procurer la propriété, ni en tout ni en partie. Le but de cette barrière, qui explique toute notre politique à l’égard des pays-bas Espagnols, étoit d’en assurer la souveraineté à une puissance dont il ne fut pas probable qu’elle devint l’alliée de la France, et qui, en même temps, fut assez considérable pour défendre ses états ; le tout cependant de telle manière que notre république conservât toujours une influence suffisante dans les Pays-bas pour pouvoir empêcher, soit que le souverain de ces provinces en fit une place d'armes contre nous, ou qu'il y protégeât le commerce au préjudice du notre. Dans ce but nous entretenions des troupes aux Pays-bas, et étions maîtres de la navigation de toutes les rivières dont la France auroit de se servir pour entrer dans notre pays (excepté du côté de l'Empire); pendant que nous étions en même temps en possession du commerce intérieur le long de ces rivières.

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 7. Wimbledon Park.—“Your questions about the Dutch fleet are not easy to answer, and much must depend on the situation of the officers and men when they arrive here. I do not find any very satisfactory information about this in the letters we have as yet received from Admiral Mitchell, and there will be no means of deciding till we know exactly what he has done.

“The thing most to be wished would be to let the people go home for the present, and lay the ships up in ordinary to be kept for the Stadtholder's use when he shall want them. I should be inclined to think that this measure, properly explained, would perhaps be the most agreeable to the crews, many of whom will not like to be kept here at a distance from their families.

“It is probable that some of the Dutch officers may be to be trusted, but I rather expect to find that those who are supposed to be of this description will have been permitted to go ashore in Holland on their parole; and, in that case, it will be necessary to have some British officers on board the ships here (especially if they continue manned) for the purpose of keeping order.

“As the wind has been fair for these two or three days past, I think we must be better informed on these points by to-morrow or Monday, and it would perhaps be advisable for us to meet for the purpose of fixing on something. I shall be in town all Monday morning, and if you could contrive to come, we might determine what is best to be done more easily than by writing ; or, if you like it better, I can call upon you at Dropmore whenever you please."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 8. Walmer Castle.—"I have ordered Huskisson to send you a copy of my despatch of this morning from Sir Ralph Abercrombie. I send you likewise a private letter to the Duke of York, and another to Colonel Brownrigg. They, of course, are for your own perusal, as he speaks without any reserve what he thinks of men, and must not be quoted. Return them to me, for I have no other copy.

"The transports are arrived from the Texel, and all the troops at Barham Downs will be embarked to-morrow and Tuesday morning. I wish the wind would change and allow them to sail. It is very high and adverse. The Duke of York gets on board this evening, and, as he is in a frigate, the captain will endeavour to force his passage; but, with so adverse a wind, it will be a bad passage. I suspect the Russian troops will be before him. I shall write to you again to-morrow; we are going to take an early dinner, as the Duke must take his boat at half-past five o'clock."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1799, September 8. Dropmore.—"I cannot have the smallest objection to the choice of Maitland for the purpose you mention. You have solved my only difficulty on the subject. Some management is due to Malcolm's situation, but that, I conclude, Huskisson will take care of. I will endeavour to draw an instruction as to the political part. I think the sum mentioned full large, but if it is in the hands of an economist, and not a schemer, that discretion may be left."

Postscript. "If there is any private letter from Abercromby stating his prospects, pray send it me. I am sure you feel with me that time is every thing." Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 9. Harley Street.—"Je suis tout-à-fait de votre avis que l'Autriche, voyant qu'on s'oppose à ses vues d'agrandissement, pourroit peut-être diminuer encor le peu de vigueur qu'elle met aux opérations de guerre là où les généraux sont dans sa dépendence; mais elle n'osera jamais faire sa paix avec la France, à cause du caractère véhément de Paul premier qui se lieroit avec la Prusse contre elle. Ce ralentissement est pourtant très fatal, et c'est une idée aussi malheureuse qu'impolitique que celle qu'on a eu chez nous, d'inviter les alliés à dire ce qu'ils veulent avoir; c'est, comme on dit, vendre la peau de l'ours avant que de le tuer, et c'est faire naître des discordes là où l'harmonie étoit déjà très faible. Il falloit s'en tenir à la sage réponse qu'on avoit donné chez nous au mémoire de Gallo, et ne pas reveiller tout d'un coup une question qu'on venoit d'écarter avec tant de prudence. Comme la Russie ne veut rien, et que vous ne voulez garder que très peu des conquêtes que vous avez fais sur vos ennemis, et que vous n'avez articulez rien de positif à cet égard, il ne reste donc que les prétentions Autrichiennes à entendre. Le meilleur seroit sans doute de ne pas les discuter ; de ne répondre qu'en termes généraux, sans trop encourager, ni ôter des espérance sur des arrangements convénables, effectués après le rétablissement de la monarchie Française, quand il sera question de régler la paix et d'assurer la tranquillité de l'Europe.

“ Rien ne peut être plus util à ce pays sans doute que de voir l'Autriche en contact immédiat avec la France, si ce voisinage pouvoit les rendre ennemies entre elles : mais malheureusement la Cour et le public de Vienne se sont perssuadés depuis la paix d'Aix-la-Chapelle que, pour posséder la Flandre et le Brabant sans aucun risque, il faut posséder aussi l'amitié et l'alliance Française. Tirer autant d'argent que possible de ces riches provinces, tenir le moins de troupes qu'on peut, et ménager de toutes les manières la cour de Verssaille, la quelle de son coté, sûre de n'avoir aucune guerre avec l'Autriche, diminueoit son armée pour augmenter sa marine. Ce système, inculqué par le Prince Kaunitz, lui a survécu ; il sera constamment suivi par l'Autriche.

“ La cour de Vienne a tenté de troquer ces provinces contre la Bavière, et, à présent, elle ne veut les ravoir que pour les échanger contre la Toscane ou tel autre pays qui se trouveroit à sa bienséance : mais celui qui les aura sans posséder les sept provinces-unies et l'évêché de Liège, sera un très petit prince, tout-à-fait dépendent de la France. On peut objecter contre la réunion des dix-sept provinces, la différence des religions qui y dominant : mais les Catholiques de la Flandre et du Brabant ont trouvé dans Joseph Second un ennemi plus acharné que s'il étoit Calviniste, et la domination sous laquelle se missent ces Pays depuis quatre ans, a détruit tous les cultes sans excepter aucun, de sorte que les Flamands et les Brabançons recevront un Stadhouder de quelque religion qu'il soit, pourvue qu'il leurs garantisse leurs archévêchés, évêchés, abbayes, couvents, et leurs chère université de Louvain.

“ Quand à l'Italie ; pour que l'Autriche puisse devenir la voisine de la France de ce coté, il faudroit dépouiller le roi de Sardaigne du Piémont, de la Savoye, et de Nice. Cela est-il faisable et juste ? Le roi de Prusse le souffrirat-il ? Si on ne veut pas dépouiller tout-à-fait ce malheureux prince, et ne lui otter que ce qui lui fut cédé par le traité de Worms, on le rendra plus faible qu'il ne l'a déjà été, et il ne pourra plus disputer aux Français l'entré en Italie. Au lieux d'être le gardien armé, capable, et prêt à disputer et défendre la porte de l'entré en Italie, il deviendra un petit page prêt à ouvrir poliment la même porte à l'armée Française toutes les fois qu'elle se présentera pour y entrer. Il n'y a donc pas de milieu ; ou il faut le dépouiller de tout, ou ne pas prendre un pouce de son territoire.

“ Pour ce qui est de la proposition Bavaoise, il ne faut pas l'envisager comme un contingent que l'Angleterre ne doit pas payer ; ce n'est pas un contingent, c'est 8,000 hommes qu'on vous offre. Si vous pouvez avoir 20,000 Suisses que vous vouliez lever, vous n'avez pas besoin des compatriotes du Comte Hasseland ; mais si au lieu de vingt, vous n'aurez que six à huit milles Suisse, les Bavaois avec les Wurtembergeois vous compléteroient le corp que vous vouliez lever, ce qui seroit d'autant plus urgent que les Autrichiens ou évacueront tout à fait ce pays-là, ou y diminueront considérablement leur armée ; tandis que le Maréchal Souvorow ne ramenera d'Italie qu'une poignée de Russes, reste glorieux, mais très petit reste, d'un corp que la victoire a constamment couronné dans les sanglantes batailles qu'il n'a cessé de livrer. Tout ce qui sera sous les ordres de ce grand homme est à vous en propre ; plus il sera fort et plus vous aurez d'influence dans le mode et la fin de cette guerre. Le Baron de Thugut, qui a designé vous permettre de vous meller seulement des affaires d'Holande, verat que c'est vous qui déciderez du sort de la France, et, par conséquent, de la paix ; au moins vous pourrez lui disputer la moitié de l'influence qu'il se reserve à lui seul. Rendez l'armée de Souvorow assez forte pour pénétrer en France, et reposez-vous sur son habilité, sur son activité, et sur la terreur qu'il a su inspirer au Français. Un grand effort fait dans une campagne peut décider la guerre. Vous épargnez ou une seconde campagne, ou une paix précaire. Je vous supplie donc de considérer la proposition Bavaoise sous ce point de vue. Vous devez connaître mieux que moi par les rapports de M. Wickham ce qu'il y a à espérer de la levée des troupes Suisses. Le tems presse, et la chose est trop importante pour ne pas l'approfondir ; après quoi, si on en voit la nécessité, on ne sauroit assez en hâter l'exécution. Excusez avec votre indulgence ordinaire, et votre amitié pour moi, la prolixité avec laquelle je vous accable ; c'est mon attachement pour ce pays et mon zèle pour la bonne cause qui m'enhardie à vous communiquer mes sentiments sur les affaires présentes.

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 10. Walmer Castle.—“ I cannot say that I am quite convinced even now that your brother's going to Petersburg would not have been still desirable ; as I think the chief difficulty remaining will be to bring the Emperor Paul to go as far as we may think right, towards satisfying the avidity of Austria. And he could have done this better than it can be done through Sir C. Whitworth, if for no other reason, because he might have had a discretionary power to conclude an arrangement between the three Powers, without repeated reference home. This, however, is now out of the question. The only thing which occurs to me, in order to take the best chance now in our power of settling some joint plan, is to direct Lord Minto to forward to Whitworth immediately (with proper explanations) the result of the confidential communications which you have authorised him to receive, and to give Whitworth such instructions as may eventually enable him to act upon them. He certainly can not have the same latitude which might have been given to your brother, but would there be any risk in saying to him that, if Austria agrees to giving the Netherlands to Holland or to such third power as shall be agreed upon with us and Russia, we are ready to agree in any arrangement of Italy which Austria desires, and Russia can be brought to approve, provided it furnishes a decent equivalent for the King of Sardinia? I believe you agree with me in thinking that the King of Sardinia has, in fact, no solid claim on the allies, and that the object in providing for him is chiefly to bring back to some established situation (if it cannot be to his former dominions) a dethroned and exiled Prince; and, next to that, to prevent Austria from obtaining a larger direct possession of Italy than Russia might think safe for its interests. It does not seem impossible to state our opinions on these points in such a manner as to enable Whitworth to make use of any opening for bringing the whole speedily to a point, if the Austrian views turn out to be such (and such only) as from Lord Minto's last letters one may suppose. In the meantime, and for a long time afterwards (at least if the war last) much will be done at Vienna, and the idea of getting Panin appointed Minister there (which I conclude is what your brother refers to) seems to promise great advantage. At all events Rosamousky (or whatever is his name) must be got rid of.

"On the subject of your correspondence with Monsieur, I can hardly state any opinion satisfactorily till I learn more exactly the amount of the expense which the plan should lead to. Taking it, however, at the sum you state, I should be much inclined to allow it, provided sufficient checks can be found to ensure that the expense shall only keep pace with the amount of the force brought into a condition for active service. On that supposition the force, if it is raised, will be more than worth the money. If it is not raised, no harm will be done. And it certainly cannot be raised in so short a time as to interfere with our grand scheme for that quarter, supposing we can realize it this autumn.

"I think it is clearly desirable you should write by the quickest conveyance to Peterburg, to ask the Emperor's concurrence in the scheme to which I allude. We shall certainly have no time to spare.

"The wind promised this morning very well for the sailing of our re-inforcement, but it has failed us. However, the oracles on that subject still assure us it is coming to the right quarter, and, in the meantime, what has been a contrary wind here, has brought the Russians.

"I am not sure that I agree with you in wishing Abercromby to have hazarded a forward movement when reinforcements were so near, though certainly there is great reason to think that with his present force he might have succeeded. His opinions about the disposition of the country, on the grounds he states, are certainly worth very little."

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 10. Stowe.—"All is going on according to my wishes. My good wife is recovering, and I am much better, having for some days been seriously unwell; and most happy shall I be to receive you on Wednesday next, when I hope that you will have got some of the militia papers on which I shall be glad to work with you, particularly as I see that your time is so short. After much consideration I abide by my project of giving you the right of receiving into the line more volunteers, and of receiving the voluntary offers of service from detachments not exceeding a given number, suppose a sixth or eighth of each regiment, which appears to me the only probable way of giving an efficient force, and in any number, and without inconvenience to the service. I fear that if battalions were authorized to volunteer, the service might be considered as a corvée, which officers were not at liberty to put by; and if so, much ill humour would creep into the measure, and probably great division of opinion; whereas, on the contrary, by permitting only detachments to go under the orders of captains, there would be in every corps some young officers to whom such a service would not be a grievance; but it would be necessary to give a very handsome allowance to induce the officers to go without expense, and the bounty to the men should be about two or three guineas. I observed to you that this arrangement would send the men complete, without any further expense, in arms, accoutrements, and appointments of every sort; and this plan would equally extend to the Scotch and Irish militia. On the latter subject, unless I am much mistaken, you have all the necessary powers; for when their Bill was drawn for 5,000 men, the Irish Attorney-General consulted me, and I altered our Bill so as to permit their militia to serve in any part of Europe. Whether it was afterwards changed you best know, and can learn at the Council Office; but I know that it was so drawn, and the offers of some of the corps were specifically pointed at Portugal and Gibraltar. If this should prove exact, the business is done. If not, you must employ more Irish militia in Guernsey, Jersey, and Alderney, and withdraw a proportion of the Fencibles from those islands."

"But hitherto I have put by a very important part of the question, and that is, the means of compelling by any means (and to what extent) the co-operation of those colonels or regiments who have hitherto resisted the voice of the charmer. It is clear that the consent of the colonel need not be considered for those who volunteer by detachment to serve for a time as militia men, and are to return to their regiments, of which they are always to be considered a part though detached from their colonel; but I do not see how it will be possible to put by that consent for those who wish to quit the regiment and to enter into the army; and yet the public feels severely the grievance of wanting the men whom they ought to send; the personal sacrifice of vanity (or whatever that sacrifice may be) falls only on the best intentioned officers; and, in a political point of view, it seems improper that the largest proportion of the only remaining national force should be in the hands of those who wish to obstruct the public service at such a moment, and upon a measure so essential.

“I should doubt, as you do, whether it might be wiser or not to define the exact service of Holland, or whether it might not be wise to enable the King to accept their services within the British seas, or any of the coasts or islands belonging to the same. This term would (I believe) carry them anywhere from Holland to Cape Finisterre. I am likewise very anxious (as we now recruit your army in toto) that you should enable us to recruit by bounty as fast as we can, for fear of any reverse that may make it necessary for you ultimately to look entirely to us, either at home or in Ireland.”

“Your Mr. Wyndham [Windham?] may be a very clever man, but he is the most indiscreet man I know. Imagine to yourself that the secret which you will not (because you ought not) tell me of the destination of your French expedition, he tells to a Frenchman, whom he will not consult because he tells him he is not to be employed; names the place of their debarkation, moots the question whether Government will be able to make up the number of the army to 30 or 35,000 men, exclusive of 5,000 cavalry; and tells him that it must be risked immediately for fear of the Emperor, qui a laissé entrevoir ses mauvaises dispositions, making his peace! Can you conceive such weakness? But remember this is a secret to all but you.”

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 10. Walmer Castle.—“By a copy of a letter from Colonel Malcolm to me, received here this morning, it appears to me that the business is in a very awkward situation. Huskisson informs me he has sent the original to you, and that Colonel Maitland will be here to-morrow morning. I wish he had sent Maitland first to you, as he would [have] been a very good messenger to have brought me your ideas. From the statement which Malcolm gives, I can have no doubt that the Court of Vienna is playing some underhand game connected with the conduct they have been pursuing all along relative to the Netherlands. The objection started against the Netherlands being brought under the sovereignty of the Stadtholder is a clear proof of it. Maitland and Malcolm, I suspect, will not do together; and I understand Malcolm is more eccentric than perhaps a person in his situation ought to be. My own idea is that the particulars stated by him are a very fair ground to send for him to return home and to wait a further decision. In the meantime Colonel Maitland might be sent to Vienna, to proceed to his destination or not according to the intimation he may receive from Lord

Minto, who will receive instructions from you to probe the business to the bottom, and we shall then know the ground on which we proceed. But it appears to me to be very idle to send Maitland or anybody else to the Netherlands, without knowing whether everything we are attempting is not counteracted by the intrigues of Austria. I throw out these ideas for your consideration. Huskisson writes to me that Maitland is to be here to-morrow morning. I shall keep him here till I have your answer to this. I shall have occasion to write to you again in the course of the day, but I have sent this off by express that I may have your answer as quickly as possible. I have no messenger here, and the post does not go till five o'clock.

"We have this morning a fine wind west-south-west, which, if it continues, will carry off all our troops. There is rather less wind than could be wished, but it will probably increase towards the evening."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 10. Walmer Castle.—"I received your letter enclosing the one you had wrote to Lord Spencer on the subject of the Dutch seamen. Mr. Pitt has expressed a wish at different times to have the Dutch ships employed as transports in the event of our standing as much in need of an aid of that kind as would be the case if all our wishes and prospects could be realised. Amidst the hurry which continues to occupy me here, I have not time to enter minutely into the discussion with him, but I own to you, so far as I can at present make up an opinion on the subject, I am inclined to think that the only use we can make of the Dutch ships is to lay them up in ordinary, and in deposit for the Stadtholder till he assumes the government of his own country, and has the power of government so completely established in his person as to enable him to wield the military strength of it with effect. Till that time comes, they ought to be kept in custody for him without being used at all. If we do use them to any purpose, I am afraid we will create jealousies of our ultimate intentions, and thereby weaken the Orange party in Holland. If my idea is thought to be the right one, the seamen, so far as necessary for the care of the ships, should be placed on board of them, and the remainder mixed in our ships of all kinds, and thereby rendered useful to the public service. The officers who are well disposed to the Stadtholder may remain with their ships paid by Holland, or, if they are prisoners of war, such as Admiral Storey, or disaffected to the Stadtholder, they may be sent home on parole not, directly or indirectly, to serve against the Stadtholder or any of his allies.

"I received the paper you sent to me from Monsieur Dutheil. I don't see any positive harm in what he wishes, but I should think the object he has in view could be much better executed by adding to the strength of the Jersey cruisers, or by putting the arms, stores, and other things requisite on board such cruisers as the Admiralty may appropriate exclusively to cruise on the coast of France; which I hope Lord Spencer means to do to a great extent; for I am positive unless that is made a separate system and service by itself, and not attached to the channel fleet, we never shall prevent the squadron at Brest from being supplied with whatever they want.

"The distant possessions of the Dutch and the commerce of such towns as may come under the government of the Stadtholder will require an early consideration, but I suppose that will be time enough when we meet in town at the meeting of Parliament.

"It was only this morning that I received the materials from the offices in London necessary to enable me to form a precise opinion upon what is proper to be proposed as to the militia. It will be the first thing I will do to-morrow morning, when I will write to you."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 10. Hamburgh.—"I believe it is fit that I should send you the Duke of Brunswick's letter, because it is a formal confirmation of the valorous achievements of the Court of Prussia, but yet, if it had not been tempting from my very near neighbourhood to Cuxhaven, I should not have felt very anxious to convey to you what has awakened such splendid expectations in his Serene Highness the Duke of Brunswick. I am really sick of all his little tricks and mysteries and reserves and confidences, and begin to think him not unworthily placed in the command in chief of the little plaything army of Prussian observation. Meantime you will probably have heard from Garlike that General Stamford having crossed from Berlin to Frankfurt on the Oder, to pass a day with Panin on his road, Haugwiz has likewise disappeared from Berlin and is supposed to have projected to add himself to their society. Such, at least, is the speculation of our friends at Berlin, and I own I think it highly probable.

"I am waiting with great impatience for letters from England and Holland, yet the English mail does not arrive, and the Dutch packet of the 7th from the Hague and Leyden announces nothing new of any sort in the relative positions of the two armies in North Holland, although the numbers of each are said to be considerably increased, on one side by the Russian division, on the Batavian side by French reinforcements. I hardly expect to hear from the Hereditary Prince of Orange; but till I hear from you I shall not stir from hence with any confidence, unless some great and powerful motive should present itself, for, in the uncertain state in which you appear to be in your own destinations and arrangements, I believe I cannot do better by you than to wait the result of them. I am, however, God knows, impatient enough, impatient in England, impatient in Holland, and to the last degree impatient for the important result which Wickham has held before my eyes in Switzerland.

"I cannot finish this uninteresting letter without scolding once again, that I have not to this moment either Abercrombie's instructions or Malcolm's, though your despatch announced them to me as already sent three weeks ago to me.

"I have written again to Lord Minto and to Sir C. Whitworth, but it is not worth while to send you all the repetitions of my lectures upon Austria."

SPENCER SMITH to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 10. Constantinople.—"I had hardly sent off my last private letter to your Lordship, in which I took the liberty to allude to some circumstances of my personal position, before I received such a distinguished proof of your benevolent recollection as the dispatch, my answer to which is annexed. I, of course, wished much of what is there expressed, upon the subject of pecuniary difficulties, left unsaid to a superior who thus shows the faithful servants of the King and their country que les absents n'ont pas toujours tort, and thus have left your Lordship every particle of the merit attached to the extension of His Majesty's bounty towards me, even to that of the original thought. As it is, I can only say that your kindness calls forth the most lively sentiments of gratitude; and in taking His Majesty's pleasure upon the subject matter of my petition, I hope you will vouch for my thankfulness in advance for whatever may be the measure of his gracious bounty; and make such my respectful thanks acceptable to our royal master."

VICE-ADMIRAL MITCHELL to EVAN NEPEAN.

1799, September 10. H.M.S. Isis, Mars Deep.—"I have not a moment to-day. What with sending off all the ships and prizes, getting above 3,000 volunteers from the Dutchmen, who have enlisted with the Hereditary Prince (who came from Embden two days ago) and landing all the marines from the fleet to assist in garrisoning the Helder. The General in want of every soul. There has been a severe cannonade this morning, the Shannon and some of the gun brigs have had their share of the village of Patten, where they are at present stationed to prevent the General's right flank being turned. No news from them, but as I must send another letter in a day or two, there will be plenty of letters by that time of information." Extract.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 11. Headquarters, Schagen Brug.—"Having fully considered the position which the British troops had occupied on the 1st instant, and having in view the certainty of speedy and powerful reinforcements, I determined to remain till then on the defensive.

"From the information which we had received we were apprised of the enemy's intention to attack us, and we were daily improving the advantages of our situation. Yesterday morning at daybreak the enemy commenced an attack on our centre and right, from Saint Martin's to Petten, in three columns, and apparently with their whole force. The column on the right, composed of Dutch troops, and under the command of General Dendaels, directed its attack on the village of Saint Martin's. The centre column of the enemy, under the orders of General de Monceau, likewise composed of Dutch troops, marched on Crabbendam and Zyper Sluys. The left column of the enemy, composed of French, directed itself on the position occupied by Major-General Burrard, commanding the 2nd Brigade of Guards.

"The enemy advanced particularly on their left and centre with great intrepidity, and penetrated with the heads of their columns to within a hundred yards of the post occupied by the British troops. They were, however, everywhere repulsed, owing to the strength of our position and the determined courage of the troops.

"About 10 o'clock the enemy retired towards Alkmaar, leaving behind them many dead and some wounded men, with one piece of cannon, a number of waggons, pontoons and portable bridges. Colonel McDonald, with the reserve, pursued them for some time, and quickened their retreat. It is impossible for me to do full justice to the good conduct of the troops. Colonel Spencer, who commanded in the village of Saint Martin's, defended his post with great spirit and judgment. Major-General Moore, who commanded on his right, and who was wounded, though I am happy to say slightly, was no less judicious in the management of the troops under his command. The two battalions of the 20th regiment posted opposite to Crabbendam and Zyper Sluys did credit to the high reputation which that regiment has always borne. Lieutenant-Colonel Smyth of that corps, who had the particular charge of that post, received a severe wound in his leg, which will deprive us for a time of his services. The two brigades of Guards repulsed with great vigour the column of French which had advanced to attack them, where the slaughter of the enemy was great.

"I continue to receive every mark of zeal and intelligence from the officers composing the staff of this army.

"It is difficult to state with any precision the loss of the enemy, but it cannot be computed at less than 800 or 1,000 men, and on our side it does not exceed in killed, wounded and missing, 200 men." Copy.

THE SAME to THE SAME.

Private.

1799, September 11. Schagen.—"It is possible that my determination to remain on the defensive until reinforced may not meet with the approbation of his Majesty's ministers or of professional men, yet I am certain that I have acted right. The difficulties of the country in a military point of view are such that to gain any advantage you must pay dear for it; but, independent of that, the risk of a check appeared so hazardous, and the hope of reinforcement so certain, that I trust my judgement is right. I believe I could not give a better proof of it than the business of yesterday—although the enemy had long made preparation for an attack, although they knew every inch of the country, and although they behaved in general with uncommon spirit, yet they were soon and severely repulsed.

“The enemy is certainly in great force; there could not have been less than 12,000 men in the field yesterday, probably more. The Dutch took every opportunity to desert, and, in a short time, near 300 made their escape. The troops behaved as well as I could wish; before the action was over they grew cool, reserving their fire, although full of ardour. The militia men are, I think, a superior race of men, and a great acquisition to the army at this time. I reckon that the troops I have with me are made for this campaign, and up to anything, if they do not receive an unforeseen check. The Hereditary Prince of Orange arrived a few days ago; he has many projects to which I listen, but follow what to me appears for our interest. He has organized 2,500 sailors and deserters, with which he wished to join this army and has solicited levy money and pay for them. My answer has been that they should be subsisted at the usual rate allowed to Dutch sailors and soldiers until I shall receive instructions from home. I have directed them to be sent to the island of Texel, there either to be cantoned or encamped. They shall have some arms, and they may either be employed on the armed vessels in the Zuyder Zee, or on the coasts of Friezeland in promoting a revolution. I really imagine the Prince has been deceived in thinking he had more friends than enemies in this country. If we can advance, everyone will be on our side, but there are few who are willing to risk anything.

“I am very happy the Admiral has been ordered to send to England all the line of battleships, British as well as Dutch—it has been my constant advice to him, but without any effect. Captain Oughton, his captain, has fortunately returned from England. He is a man of sense and alone can manage him. Captain Halkett, who was my brother's aide-de-camp and now mine, is an old officer. He received yesterday a severe wound which broke his jaw-bone. It would gratify my brother if he could get the brevet of major, to which he will be entitled in the first promotion. I shall ask this favour from the Duke of York, and shall be much obliged to you if you would be good as to mention him likewise to His Royal Highness.” Copy.

W. HUSKISSON.

1799, September 11. Schagen.—“I enclose a letter from the Hereditary Prince of Orange to me. I should be very sorry to have at this moment 3,000 renegade Dutch sailors and soldiers with me. I have ordered them to the Texel Island, and have directed them to be subsisted as Dutch sailors and soldiers are in Holland. We repulsed the enemy yesterday with considerable loss. Were the Dutch troops, who really behaved well notwithstanding their disaffection, at liberty, they would desert in great numbers, but they are strictly watched, and when any man is found deserting he is shot. Our people behaved wonderfully well, considering they never fired a shot in earnest. I long for our reinforcements. I know you will say why is Sir Ralph Abercromby so long inactive, but I am prepared for that. If no reinforcements arrive, and if I am no longer able to defend my position I must then fight. What an advantage would it be, what a saving would it make, if you had twenty 44-gun ships to act as transports; they would carry 10,000 men with their artillery and baggage." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, September 11. Dropmore.—“ Je vous envoie les dépêches que j'ai reçu par les dernières malles de la Suisse. Je dois croire que le Maréchal Souvarow n'avait pas lu le traité conclu à Petersbourg pour les troupes de Korsakow. Vous sentirez que je ne puis me dispenser de faire des représentations là-dessus à Petersbourg; mais je le ferai du ton qui convient à la conduite qu'on y observe à notre égard (dont nous ne pouvons assez vous louer) et aux ordres que je sais que l'Empereur avoit donné au General Korsakow de n'agir que de concert avec notre ministre.

“ Le Maréchal Souvarow aura, en attendant, reçu l'ordre de Vienne de se rendre avec son corps en Suisse. Son arrivée mettra fin, j'espère, à tout cet embrouillage, et délivrera la Suisse, comme il a déjà fait à l'égard de l'Italie.

“ Thugut consent aujourd'hui à ce que l'Archiduc et son armée restent sur la droite des Russes, et co-opèrent avec eux pour la délivrance de la Suisse, et même pour les opérations ultérieures.”

Postscript. “ Ce n'est qu' aujourd'hui que ces dépêches m'ont été renvoyées par le Roi, autrement je vous les aurois envoyées plustôt, pour vous mettre à même d'écrire dans le même sens que moi sur cette facheuse affaire.” Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, September 11. Dropmore.—“ I did not write to you by last night's post, because I guessed from the contents of your private letters, of which five reached me at once, that you would be before this time at the Texel. But this morning it has occurred to me that this may be doubtful, and I therefore write these few lines to say that, with the turn affairs have taken, I am quite satisfied that your judgment is infinitely better than ours on this point, and that you will be of ten times the use in Holland that you could have been at St. Petersburg. As I send this by an extra packet, I will not delay the messenger by adding anything more to this letter, but when I hear of you again I will write fully.

"On your arrival in Holland, or soon after, you will find the Duke of York instructed to consider and communicate with you as the person destined to be his Majesty's Ambassador there, and charged in the meantime to prepare the way for the arrangements which the King has in view; and you will also find instructions there for your conduct in that charge." Copy.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 11. Altona.—"In forwarding the messenger Lyell with his Petersburg dispatches, I have nothing to add to my letter of yesterday except that I learn from Garlike, by a letter dated 9th instant, that another courier has arrived from Paris to Otto; Otto has as yet made no communication to Alvensleben, but the language of the French party at Berlin and of the courier himself is, that the French Directory will comply with the demands of Prussia, and that the idea of Prussian war is very unpopular at Paris, especially since the exhausted state of their treasury is known. It is known to the courier himself, as he is said to have declared that they could not give him money enough for his journey to Berlin. This intelligence may make them feel something stouter at Charlottenburg, but will not, as I believe, yet make them act like men. I am disappointed in finding by Sir Charles that no minister is yet named from Petersburg to Berlin, but I have still some hopes of this being effected by Panin's appointment, and by the new demonstration of Prussia becoming more popular with Paul.

"I am harrassed here by the uncertainty of all the Dutch reports, and the total want of any authentic intelligence, but I trust that many hours will not elapse before I shall hear either from the Hereditary Prince or from Lingen. If there is any truth in the extent of the reinforcements sent to Daendels, those reinforcements must surely be made at the expense of what they had collected for the defence of Zealand, and in that case, the second Russian division might perhaps undertake with advantage that difficult attack instead of the more practicable disembarkation at Armeland. Is it not worth thinking of? I could, if I would, feel a little out of humour with the extraordinary apathy of the good people of the United Provinces; they seem to me to be content to stand by and see fair play, as if they themselves took no real interest in the struggle. If my Prince had remained upon the confines at Lingen, I should not have ceased to represent against this universal inactivity at such a moment, and I should have urged him to recommend among his friends in the interior to partake a little more of the dangers of the struggle which we are making for them. I comfort myself, however, with trusting that he is somehow or other employed to the same good purpose by Abercrombie."

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 11. Dropmore.—“I am really sorry to trouble you again about Sir Watkin’s regiment, but you will see by the enclosed letters that it is unavoidable.

“Sir Watkin, with his whole regiment, have volunteered for foreign service, and are eager to be allowed to go. This is refused them, and, in the same moment, his men are enlisted out of his regiment to serve in the regulars. He complains to Lord Cornwallis, and receives for answer ‘that this is done by express orders from England.’ I write to you at the same time upon it, and you tell me that the whole must be a mistake, and that Lord Cornwallis knows his business too well to do any such thing.

“While this is going on, and without any previous notice to him, an inspecting general is sent down to his regiment to draft the horses that are judged most fit for service, in order to mount the regulars.

“I leave you to judge whether this conduct can produce anything but incurable disgust, and a total disinclination to aid the plans of those who, instead of animating by encouragement and attention the zeal and activity of young men of this description, are studiously throwing in their way discouragement to which it is now acknowledged that even mere professional soldiers ought not to be exposed.

“Sir Watkin, I see, believes that Lord Buckingham’s Irish sins (for so it seems his efforts in the service of his country are considered at the Castle) are punished on him. I am willing to hope that a less unworthy motive has dictated a very unworthy treatment, but, be this as it may, I am sure that Sir Watkin’s claim to justice will not be disregarded by you, in whose particular department it lies to do him justice. I have therefore dissuaded him from coming to you at Walmer to state his case, because I really think that nothing can add to the impression which you will receive from the facts themselves, without any addition from his feelings upon them. He remains here to receive your answer to this letter.” Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 11. Walmer Castle.—“The best way I can convey to you the ideas I entertain respecting the further aid from the militia is to send you the perusal of a letter I have this morning wrote to your brother. It will save me the trouble of writing another to you which, in fact, would be only a repetition of what I have wrote to him. After perusing it you will forward it to Lord Buckingham.

“Colonel Maitland is come this morning. I have desired him to entertain himself the best way he can all the forenoon, as I can say nothing to him till I hear from you.

“Captain Popham came here yesterday morning, and it is my intention to send him to Holland. He knows every inch of the country remarkably well, and, besides that, I think he may be of great use to keep all things smooth and well with the Russians. Mr. Pitt showed me your brother's letter. I think it right in consequence of that perusal to mention to you that I am afraid you will find more trouble on the subject of the congress at Petersburg than your brother is aware of. Captain Popham says that of all the subjects he [Paul I.?] talked of, he conceived him more eager on that than any other. Independent of his superior hereditary Imperial rank, he thought that the predicament in which he stood gave him a right to the congress being at Petersburg in place of Vienna, for that he had nothing to ask, whereas Austria was grasping at everything; and that his character as umpire would enable him to check that spirit, and decide every difference agreeable to the wishes of England. I need not trouble you with all the details of our conversation, but I thought it right to give you this much. From all that I can collect from Popham he is blindly devoted to England, and it is difficult to tell whether he hates Austria, Prussia, or the Duke of Brunswick most.

"I shall write to the Duke of York this morning, and send him the papers you transmitted to me this morning, desiring him to take copies, and send me back the originals, for I have only one writing clerk here to copy anything for me, and I keep him fully occupied. My opinion clearly is that the provinces of Groningen and Friesland should be an object of immediate attention; but I don't like to give any positive instruction to that purpose till I hear that the Russians are arrived, or that our reinforcements can join them. They are all embarked and laying in the Downs, but, unless some wind springs up, they cannot stir. It is at present a dead calm. From the French papers they know exactly our strength, and, if they speak truth, they have already, and will have, a superior force to attack us. I don't believe it, and have no apprehension of the conflict; but the first thing undoubtedly is to beat completely that army which they have collected from all quarters."

LORD GRENVILLE TO HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 11. Dropmore.—"I lose not a moment to answer your letter which I have just received, and to entreat you not to think of losing the time that must pass in sending Colonel Maitland to Vienna.

"It is clear Malcolm must be recalled, and unless we mean to abandon the thing altogether, we must have an active and able man upon the spot to take the immediate direction of it. The intrigues of the Austrians are an additional reason for this. We must do the thing for ourselves. We know that Thugut does not mean that his Court should hold the Netherlands, for he has told Lord Minto so quite distinctly. He will therefore not openly oppose our measures, though he will certainly intrigue against them. But we may negotiate with him while we are acting, whereas, if we wait to act till our negotiation has succeeded, he will spin it out into endless length, and he will at last make a great favour of allowing us by our money and efforts to conquer the Netherlands which he neither means to conquer nor to hold.

"I had hoped to send you to-day the sketch of an instruction which I thought might be given to Colonel Maitland ; but all the mails are come pouring in upon me from Weymouth, and I shall not have time to-day. To-morrow I will send it you without fail, but, as it is very urgent that Colonel Maitland should go and take the business out of Malcolm's hands, perhaps you had best desire him to return to town, and make the preparations for his journey ; and, if he can come here any day that suits him, I shall be very glad to see him." Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 12. Harley Street.—"Je vous remercie pour la communication que vous avez eu l'amitié de me faire des papiers que vous avez reçu de la Suisse, que je vais remettre à Mr. Hammond. La conduite du Maréchal Souvorow m'auroit paru étrange hiér-au-soir quand j'ai reçu vos communications, si dès le matin, je n'avois pas compris la facheuse situation de ce grand homme, par les papiers que j'ai reçu de ma Cour par le courier du Chevalier Whiteworth.

"Lisez, je vous supplie, l'incluse que j'ai reçu, et vous verrez qu'il est réduit à l'état le plus facheux, graces aux infamies redoublées de Thugut, du conseil Aulique de guerre à Vienne, et des généraux Autrichiens en Italie, qui tous, dépendent du Baron, ne cessent d'intriguer et de contrecarer ce sauveur de l'Italie, des provinces que l'Autriche a dans ce pays ; et qui auroit sauver l'Europe si on l'auroit laissé faire, en ordonnent en meme tems à l'Archiduc de l'imiter. Emporté par son zèle, il n'a ménagé ni sa perssone ni ses braves compatriotes, qui, à cause de ça, étoient réduit à 6,000 à la bataille de Novi, et peut-être n'en reste-il pas 3,000. A mesure que les Autrichiens gagnent de pays, et voyent diminuer le nombre des Russes, leurs intrigues et leurs désobeissance contre lui doivent augmenter. Si à l'époque du six juillet ce grand homme étoit réduit à supplier son souverain de lui permettre de quitter un comandement d'une armée qu'il ne peut plus conduire, ayant les bras liés, et entouré de basse jalousie et d'intrigues, le mal empirent toujours, dans quel état devoit-il donc être quelque peu avant et surtout après la bataille de Novi ? Je le crois réduit à une poignée de ses propres troupes, les seules sur les quelles il peut se fier ; et je vois avec douleure la possibilité que ce grand homme, dont la vie est si précieuse pour l'Europe entière, succombera sous quelque trahison, dont il ne s'est garantit que par ses propres troupes, qui périront tous avec enthousiasme pour sa conservation perssonelle. Mais ils sont en si petit nombre qu'en vérité ce n'est que la Providence qui le sauvera. L'Autriche est déjà en possession du Milanais, du Piémont, et les légations de Ferare, de Bologne, et de Ravène. Souvorow ne lui est plus nécessaire ; il lui est même dangereux, car, s'il aide au rétablissement de la monarchie Française, cette même monarchie empêchera l'Autriche de garder ce qu'elle a envahie sur le Roi de Sardaigne et sur le Saint Siège. Je vous prie donc de considérer l'extrémité où il étoit quand il demandoit des renforts Russes à Korssakoff. Je voudrois déjà le voir avec le corp du Général Rebender en Suisse, et quitter cette Italie où, pour prix de ses glorieux travaux, il n'a rencontré que jalousie, intrigues, et contradictions de toutes espèces. Je vous envoie tout plain d'autre communications. Je les ai fais traduire et copier pour vous, ainssi vous pouvez les garder toutes.

"Mon ami Kotchoubei a quité; c'est une grande perte pour mon pays. Le Comte Panin, que j'aime et que j'estime, sans avoir sa place, fera les fonctions. J'aurois mieux aimé pourtant que le premier resta, et le second fut à la place de Razoumoukoi pour tenir tête à Thugut."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, September 12. Dropmore.—"You will probably receive with this a letter which I wrote yesterday, foreseeing the probability of your remaining at Hamburgh. I have little to add to it in consequence of your private letter (No. 57) of the 6th instant, which I received after dispatching my messenger to London. I heartily rejoice that you have judged so much better than we did about your Petersburgh journey, and I am impatient to reap the advantage of your presence in Holland, as while you remain at Hamburgh you are equally undergoing your exile, and we get no good from you.

"The Grand Pensionary has done much since he came out of the country, and his papers are full of good sense and energy. I am not sure that I go along with him in all the detail of what he proposes, but I am impatient to be there in your person (not in my own) in order to form a better judgment. Hammond will send you with this an order to any frigate to carry you to the Texel. You will find there instructions from me addressed to you as to the person destined by his Majesty to assume the character of his Majesty's Ambassador to the States General when restored, and a direction to the Duke of York to consider and communicate with you accordingly.

"Any ideas of my going are now far less important. We are going to meet Parliament in ten days, to get 20,000 more militia, and even after that is over, there can be little use in my coming where you are. If on the spot you really think otherwise, I must, of course, decline no duty that I can do.

"I say nothing of our Holland hopes. Abercromby waits the arrival of the reinforcements, and thinks himself then secure of doing without loss what might now cost some considerable sacrifice of men. I hope the winds will not make the interval long, for the loss of time is the only thing that can do us real mischief. We have now fairly 44,000 men there or on their way there. Undoubtedly this is more than enough to do the business.

"Malcolm has bedeviled his business already, and Maitland is going to replace him. He will be put in correspondence with you, and his instructions sent to you, I trust, with more punctuality than Malcolm's were, after I had given the order for that purpose.

"I mentioned to Fagel your wish about Stamford; but he gave me reasons, which I think quite satisfactory, for his not coming to Holland till the old Prince comes; and from what I have already seen of the priggishness of the latter, I am sure the longer he stays the better it will be for your comfort, and for the success of his business and yours."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1799,] September 12. Walmer Castle.—"You are so much better informed respecting the object of Colonel Maitland's mission than I am, that I have not the least hesitation in acquiescing in your opinion upon it. He has left me and will be with you to-morrow, and return the day after on his way to Emden, where he proposes to land. Be pointed in your instructions to him, and in explaining the full extent of your hopes and views, for I unaffectedly confess myself much a stranger to the subject; and if I am to take the superintendence of it, I should wish you to cause somebody in your Office collect together all the intelligence on which you proceed, that I may make myself thoroughly master of it. Without that I shall proceed very blindly in the business; and, of course, very unpleasantly both to myself and to the public service."

EARL SPENCER to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 12. Admiralty.—"No news yet of the arrival of the Dutch ships from the Texel, nor even, that I can find, of their making any movement towards coming away. It is so essential that they should come away that, if it were possible, I should think even now some intimation should be sent from the Prince of Orange of his wish to that effect; more especially as the Hereditary Prince (who, I believe, arrived there on the 7th in the evening) may have thrown some obstacle in the way. I understood from Fagel (or from you) that he had conceived they were to remain at the Texel, and if so, it is not impossible that his opinion may have interfered with the execution of our orders to Admiral Mitchell; and, in that case, I submit to you whether it might not be advisable to get the Stadtholder either to send an order, or write to the Hereditary Prince upon it; in doing which there may probably be little difficulty when he shall have been informed by M. Fagel of the result of your conversation of to-day respecting their ulterior situation.

"I own I shall not feel easy till they are safe on this side of the water."

Postscript. "I am afraid our hopes of the Spanish squadron are vanished, as Warren does not appear to have seen anything of them."

LORD GRENVILLE to HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK.

1799, September 12. Dropmore.—“Count Rhön, who will have the honour to deliver this letter to your Royal Highness, is charged by the Prince of Orange with two commissions, the one for raising any armed bourgeoisie in the province of Holland that may be necessary for co-operating with your Royal Highness's army; the other, for taking a provisional superintendence of the Admiralties of the different Provinces, he having been employed in that department before the revolution. His zeal and activity are, I believe, not unknown to your Royal Highness, and he seems animated, on the present occasion, with the strongest desire to be useful to the common cause.

“As from the circumstance of his birth he is strictly a subject of his Majesty, and not an alien, he has suggested to me whether your Royal Highness might not grant to him such a military commission as might serve as a protection to him, in case of his falling into the hands of the enemy. The fear of retaliation will, I trust, operate as an effectual security in every case of Dutchmen found in arms against the present government of that country. But if your Royal Highness shall not see any objection to comply with Count Rhön's request, it may gratify him, and afford to him a mark of attention and of distinction to which his attachment to his Majesty's interests, under all circumstances of the last twelve years in Holland, seems well to entitle him.” Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 13. Dropmore.—“Maitland has just left me. We agreed that he should go without delay and that his instructions should follow him. I stated to him that these would turn on four points principally.

1. “Our wish to see the 17 provinces united.
2. “That he was therefore to keep that object in view; but,
3. “To endeavour to inform himself of the disposition of the country respecting it, and
4. “To contrive, if possible, to keep these questions out of discussion, and to direct an immediate insurrection to the sole object of delivering themselves from France; shewing the reasoning men among them, that this must put them in a condition to do themselves justice according to events as they may arise.

“You must certainly recall Malcolm. You will, of course, contrive it with such managements for him as you judge best, but I am satisfied the thing is indispensable.

“I will send you the draft of instructions for Maitland as soon as possible.” Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 13. Walmer Castle.—“Mr. Pitt has mentioned to me your wishes that I should write to the Duke of York on the subject of your brother coming there. I shall do so at the same time that I send the official letter which, at your desire, Huskisson has prepared and sent me this morning for my signature. In truth, however, it is not necessary, for, before the Duke went from this, I explained to him your brother and perhaps you might ere long join him in Holland, and we all trusted a good deal to his known influence with the Orange family to forward all the ideas which your [brother] or you might have occasion to introduce. So far from jealousy, he expressed the greatest satisfaction at the prospect of it.

"The telegraph has this moment announced to me the glorious news from India."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 13. Walmer Castle.—"I hardly like to adhere to an opinion so opposite to yours, but, the more I consider the subject, the more I feel persuaded of the urgent importance of endeavouring if possible to reconcile the views of Austria and Russia, instead of leaving the former to settle with the latter as she can, or, in other words, leaving it to chance whether they are to agree at all, and whether the confederacy is to be dissolved, and the best prospects of the war defeated. Woronzow's manifesto seems to me, in fair reasoning, to prove that the very arrangement to which, by Lord Minto's dispatch, Thugut is pointing, is what we ought most to wish; namely, that the possession of the Netherlands should be transferred to Holland, and that Austria should hold the key of Italy. I see nothing in what is proposed that breaks in on our line of probity and morality, or bears the slightest resemblance to the scandalous treatment of Poland and Venice. In both those cases a neutral and unoffending power was sacrificed to a wanton plan of usurpation. Here, a country lost in war by the weakness of its own sovereign, and recovered without his participation by the arms of a third power, is proposed to be retained by that power to the advantage of the general system of Europe, and with an equivalent provided for the former sovereign, though not strictly entitled to any. If I do not deceive myself this is the real state of the case, and if it is, there is surely nothing in it inconsistent either with strict justice or sound policy. If the Emperor Paul cannot be reconciled to it, I admit that we ought not so to urge it as to risk the loss of his cordial friendship and co-operation, to which every other object ought to be secondary. But he cannot be offended by a fair statement of the arguments in its favour. If he is convinced by it, and accedes, we have, I think, a chance of securing something more like real concert with Austria than there is any hope of otherwise. If he refuses his assent, we must acquiesce in it, and make the best of it, and we shall then be no worse than if we now leave Austria and Russia to settle their clashing views as they can, without any attempt to conciliate them. This is the best view I can form of the subject, but I should like much to be able to talk it over with you fully, before anything further need be written. It is not, however, my present intention, if I can help it, to be in town before to-morrow sennight. Is it quite impossible for you to come down here for a day or two in that interval? If it should, and you want me, I can come at any time on an hour's notice.

"Your proposed instructions for Maitland seem exactly right. I hardly know how to reason on the march of the Prussian troops. It must, I think, do good, unless it creates fresh embarrassment about the Netherlands. I return your brother's letter, and am very glad you are desiring him to proceed to Holland, though I cannot yet rejoice that he is not on his road to Petersburg. Dundas has been working hard at the militia plan, as you have seen by this time from his letter to Lord Buckingham, and I have no doubt we shall digest it thoroughly before Parliament meets. The telegraph just brings us the account of the capture of Seringapatam, and carries one's thoughts to a greater distance than any other event could just now from the opposite coasts."

Postscript. "Dundas, to whom I have read this letter, agrees entirely in the sentiments I have stated."

CAPTAIN HOME POPHAM, R.N., to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 14. Helder.—"Although I did not arrive here before the Duke of York, yet I was so soon after him that he had no intercourse with the Russian troops beyond reviewing the seven thousand men who landed late last night, previous to their march to camp. Everybody is highly pleased with their soldier-like, hardy appearance, and I will be responsible to you their appearance is the worst feature in their character.

"If you look forward to a continuance of the war beyond next spring, I think you may procure a large army in Russia by that time, if the arrangements are made immediately, and if I am not mistaken. On the basis of those arrangements I believe the Emperor has the power of levying recruits in the proportion of one man in ten during a war, but I do not understand that he has exercised this power to any extent. His Imperial Majesty, if he has such power, might raise any given number immediately at our expense, and mix them with his garrison troops, and before the spring they would be very good soldiers, especially as every Russian is more or less a soldier by nature. This may be an object worth enquiring about officially from Sir Charles Whitworth, to whom I will immediately write on the subject."

Extract.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 14. Altona.—"The despatches from Mr. Garlike which are just arrived here to me under flying seal are forwarded by me to sail with to-morrow's packet. I enclose to you a copy of the letter which I wrote to Mr. Garlike, who desired from me my advice upon this occasion, and I add likewise his private letter to me in order to give you the sum total of the history of Mr. Yorke, of whose intentions there seem to be very strong grounds of suspicion, so strong indeed that I am uncharitable enough to rely more upon them than upon his penitence and conversion in Dorchester gaol; and I have accordingly sent back Garlike's courier advising, as you see, a very close attention to Mr. Yorke, and even his arrest if the suspicious circumstances concerning him should increase enough to warrant it. It is possible that if he has bad intentions, as I apprehend he must, they may be connected with Watson, whom Mr. Garlike expected to be able to find at Berlin. Sir J. Crawford knows nothing of Yorke's arrival except hearing that a man of that name had landed, calling himself a colonel in 2nd Dragoon Guards; he never saw him nor heard Mr. Cockburn speak of him, but I have desired him to trace what has passed at the house of Mr. Parish, and I shall desire Mr. Cockburn, by a line to Cuxhaven, to write instantly to you all that he knows concerning this man.

"We are still without any important intelligence from Holland; the Dutch minister here reports his belief of an attack on the English on the 10th in which our troops were defeated, and a battery taken near Pettun, but nobody in Hamburgh appears to give credit to this Batavian intelligence. The wind is now favourable enough to bring news from England or from the Texel; and I am the more impatient for it as the delay in sending to me Abercrombie's and Malcolm's instructions leaves me quite in the dark about all your last decisions respecting Holland and Flanders. I trust, however, that good use will be made of the Hereditary Prince of Orange in North Holland. Were he still upon the frontiers, I should think it highly necessary to urge, through him, more active and open enterprise in the interior of the country; for there is hitherto an apathy and inactivity among the partisans of the House of Orange in the provinces that requires all his influence and exertion to remove, and I cannot help still wishing that he was upon the frontiers or in the provinces to make his countrymen work a little for themselves.

"I fear, by the last papers from Germany, that the Austrian army had quitted Swisserland without making the promised attack.

"Every hour adds to my impatience; nothing from Lingen, the Texel, or England! The German-Hamburgh paper has just appeared with the Batavian victory of the 10th. I have not time to let Henry translate it. I trust it is not true, and certainly it is not believed. It announces a loss on our side of 8,000 killed and wounded in the defeat of the left wing, and says that our army retreated to Shagerboorg, quod Deus avertat!" 1799, September 14. Altona.—"I have just received from Street your two letters of the 11th instant, together with the two despatches to Lord Grenville, and the letter to Count Woronzow.

Enclosure.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to B. GARLIKE.

"I had heard Yorke was tried for sedition, was found guilty, and was sentenced to solitary imprisonment for a certain period. I have occasionally heard that he conducted himself in prison with every appearance of penitence and remorse, and, I believe, that he has written a pamphlet, during his confinement in Dorchester goal, in which he has made a public recantation of his former democratical principles. If I recollect right, the period of his imprisonment is expired, and I have some notion that he has latterly applied for a lieutenant-colonel's commission in some corps of yeomanry, which, however, as I apprehend, was not granted to him. Under these circumstances it might not unnaturally have happened that he was desirous of changing the scene, and of passing some time of purification in a foreign country. His appearance therefore upon the Continent would not much have surprised me, though I confess that his appearance at Berlin would have in some degree engaged my attention in whatever manner it had been accounted for. The manner in which it has been accounted for, in his conversation with you, is certainly very much made to create suspicion of a very unfavourable nature to him. I cannot think it probable that this person should in any shape be employed on business of so very confidential a description. I see no reason to believe that, if the English ministers had any desire to negotiate with the French generals in Switzerland, they would have employed Mr. Yorke for that purpose; still less can I conceive that it is possible that they would direct him to avoid all communication with Mr. Wickham; and, in truth, this latter circumstance is in itself so extremely suspicious that it gives to me an entire distrust of the truth of the whole of his narrative, and would certainly induce me, if I was in your situation, to delay as much as possible his departure from Berlin, and to take care not to lose sight of him till better information shall be obtained of his true and real designs.

"It is impossible not to be struck with the inconsistency of his conduct; he affects to have received orders in England to avoid the appearance of communication with the King's ministers abroad, and yet he claims, from former acquaintance, the protection of the King's Consul at Hamburg, and obtains money under that protection. In addition to this, he ostentatiously attaches himself to one of the King's messengers, who by the bye ought not to have conducted him. He comes to you at Berlin for a passport, which he might have had from Sir James Crawford if his story had been true; and he does not hesitate to draw upon the King's Under Secretary of State for money, at a moment when he professes to have to conceal his communications with the English Government.

"In addition to all this I cannot feel satisfied with the confidence which he expresses in obtaining a passport from Otto, and I cannot put by from my recollection the reason which you had to suspect Dr. Watson at Berlin, nor the possibility of some ill intention arising out of their intercourse, if they have met there. My advice therefore to you is to endeavour, by fair means, to delay his journey till his story is cleared up, to have him detained if increased suspicion should justify that; but, at all events, not to lose sight of him, nor to fail to give notice of him to Mr. Wickham, Lord Minto, and Lord Mulgrave.

"I hear Mr. Cockburn is at Cuxhaven; if he is I will write a line to him by the messenger who carries your dispatches, and desire him to write by this packet to Lord Grenville concerning Mr. Yorke."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, September 14. Dropmore.—"C'est avec la rage et le désespoir que je vous mande que l'Archiduc s'est retiré à Donaschingen, laissant l'armée du général Korsakow dans une position insoutenable, et abandonnant la Suisse à la fureur des régicides. Il s'excuse sur des ordres positifs de Vienne, et cela après que Wickham a reçu de Lord Minto l'assurance très expresse (que Thugut lui avoit donnée) qu'on avoit déjà envoyé à l'Archiduc l'ordre de rester.

"Ordinairement je ne suis pas prompt à me représenter des maux futurs—cette fois-ci, je vous l'avoue, je crains les suites les plus funestes, et pour l'armée Russe, et pour toute l'Europe.

"Quand les dépêches seront retournées de Weymouth, je vous les communiquerai. Je n'attends que la réponse de M. Pitt pour venir en ville, ainsi je crois que ce sera plutôt là qu'ici que nous nous verrons. Ajoutez à cette perfidie l'infâme mensonge par laquelle on attribue cette résolution à la demande, sine quâ non, de nos deux Cours, pendant qu'il y a trois mois que nous ne faisons autre chose que d'insister sur la nécessité de soutenir, et de renforcer, de ce côté-là !

"La prise de Seringapatam est venue bien à propos pour me consoler. Ce grand et brillant succès est d'une importance incalculable pour nos intérêts, et j'ai le bonheur de voir qu'il est principalement, je dirais même presque entièrement, dû aux talens et à la fermeté et décision de mon plus intime ami, avec lequel je suis lié depuis l'enfance.

"Vous vous en réjouirez et pour ma patrie, et pour moi."
Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 14. Harley Street.—"Je me réjouis avec vous, et je vous félicite bien sincèrement sur l'importante victoire qui, d'un seul coup, rafermi votre puissance dans l'Inde. Quel beau paragraphe de plus pour le discours du Roi le mardi, vingt-quatre du mois ! La Hollande et l'Orient vous couvre de gloire. Si nous n'avions que nos ennemis commun à combattre, l'Europe seroit bientôt tranquille, mais la conduite de nos perfide et prétendus amis est ce qu'il y a de plus désespérant. On croit que les Français veulent de nouveau tenter un débarquement en Irlande; je vous avoue que je le désire, suposent qu'on y est bien préparé à les recevoir à bon coup de bayonnettes; espèrent, en même tems, que ce sera une belle occasion à votre flotte pour battre la Française."

Postscript. “ Cette lettre étoit fermé quand j’ai reçu votre billet qui m’accable. Comment est-ce que l’Archiduc a pu manquer à sa parole, après avoir tout concerté pour une attaque en commun avec Korssakoff. Je vous avoue que je regarde l’Europe comme perdue si Thugut n’est pas chassé. Je vous attendrai en ville, et j’espère que vous communiquerez chez nous, in extenso, toutes les perfidies de ce maudit Baron Autrichien.”

LORD MINTO to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 14. Vienna.—“ It is literally true that I had concluded the dispatch which accompanies this, and that it was nearly copied fair, before Wiffin arrived. It is impossible for me to detain the India dispatches, and I must therefore confine myself to say that I have been able to give the dispatches brought by Wiffin a very hasty perusal. It is with the most unfeigned satisfaction that I receive such distinct instructions, accompanied by such powerful means of enforcing them; and I will not lose a moment in assuring you that I shall execute your intentions to the full extent, and in the spirit which you direct; observing only that, much having been already gained since the date of the dispatches which you had received when these instructions were framed, some modification in the remonstrances on those parts may be admissible. I flatter myself the Emperor may be brought, without approaching to the danger of a rupture, or to any public indication of such a danger, to the specific measures we may have occasion to demand, although I still apprehend any material change in the manner of feeling and seeing on the great interests of Europe now depending, in this very particular old man with whom alone the business of this empire can be transacted, must be the effect of a slower process. At the same time I should not despair of this, if his conduct should not continue to be such as to render it impossible, consistently with dignity, to preserve a footing of personal habits with him. But in this, as in everything else, I shall be guided by your instructions. I cannot speak positively to the extent of the Austrian views in Italy, but from the latest notions I have formed, it seems probable that, though their appetites and their wishes would be insatiable, their actual views have not extended distinctly beyond the Piedmontese barrier, and perhaps the Legation of Ferrara, if not that of Bologna also. But by their equivocal system of not restoring the old governments, their object is first to establish such a compulsory administration in those countries as to draw from them resources for the war while it lasts, and, secondly, to leave as much open for discussion at the peace as possible. I do not conceive there is any notion of depriving the Grand Duke of Tuscany of his dominions in the end. At the same time these alarms and doubts in the minds of both the countries concerned, and of the rest of Europe, concerning the use to be made by Austria of her victories over the former invaders of Italy, must be very prejudicial to the character and interests of the anti-gallican cause which we are maintaining. I am, therefore, still convinced of the great expediency of bringing this Court to a clear explanation and understanding with the Allies on these points, by the shortest and speediest course. Thugut often repeats his readiness to enter on this discussion, and expresses a concurrence in the desire which I always repeat to him of seeing every ground of diffidence and alienation cancelled. We shall see what he will do towards it."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 15. Harley Street.—"Je dois vous avertir pour votre propre information que Thugut, ingénieux et persévérant à entraver la vigueur des opérations contre la France, et diminuer le nombre des troupes qui agissent contre elle, s'oppose au traité que le Duc de Wurtemberg étoit sur le point de faire avec ce pays, et que ce faible Duc a envoyé un ordre secret à Mylius de trainer la chose en longueur jusqu'à ce qu'il ai pu avoir lue à Stutgarde la réponse de ce qu'il a écrit à Petersbourg pour demander conseil. Il auroit dû commencer la chose en demandant conseil chez nous, au lieu de permettre que Zeplin signa un traité à Vienne, sans savoir qui payera les troupes. S'il se seroit adressé chez nous, on lui aurait déconseillé de faire de traité à Vienne mais de ne s'engager qu'avec l'Angleterre. Vous voyez donc que les six milles hommes de Wurtemberg sont problématiques: qu'il n'est que trop certain, malheureusement, que vous n'aurez pas de troupes Suisses, et que c'est la France qui les aurat par des réquisitions forcées: il est, par conséquent, fort heureux que l'Electeur Palatin ofre dans ces circonstances dix milles Bavaois, qui joindroient le corp du Général Korssakoff. Hasseland a été ce matin chez moi; il est impatient d'avoir quelque réponse, et il m'a dit qu'il vous écrirait ce soir."

Enclosure.

M. DE KALITCHEFF to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, August 31. Vienna.—"Dans mes précédentes lettres j'ai informé votre Excellence combien le crédit du Baron Thugut influait sur les opérations des armées en général; cela continue encore et entrave à différentes occasions, plus ou moins, les opérations militaires; leur origine vient du genre d'intrigue que les instructions de ce ministre et sa manière de conduire les affaires y introduit par tout. Il aime malheureusement depuis longtems le métier qu'il n'a jamais fait, celui de la guerre. Il y a des anecdotes curieuses à cet égard. Celle entre autres où pour s'être trouvé à une affaire d'avant poste en se rendant en Turquie, il pria Joseph second de le faire Général-Major; c'est véritablement une faiblesse qu'il a indépendamment de l'envie de tout gouverner et diriger. Depuis qu'il est Ministre, il conduit le département de la guerre, et pour pouvoir le conduire à son gré, il en a éloigné à force de dégoûts le Maréchal Lascey, et il laisse ce département sans Président, sous la direction des Conseillers Turchheim et Tige, qui lui sont entièrement soumis. Dans toutes les armées dont le général ne lui est pas avenglement dévoué, il y forme un parti. Les gens qui le composent l'avertissent de tout, et comme ils connaissent ses goûts, pour lui plaire ils intriguent, blament tout, et font des cabales.

“C'est ce qui met au désespoir l'Archiduc Charles, qui déteste Thugut, et que ce Ministre n'aime pas non plus, et le contrarie tant qu'il peut. Le Comte Diedrichstein, qui est un créature de ce Ministre, a été envoyé en grande partie chez l'Archiduc dans cette vue. En Italie, il a choisi le général Mélas, officier de fortune mais distingué, habile dans son état, mais qui doit être borné sur tout autre objet. Pour suppléer à l'intrigue qui manque à Mélas, et aussi pour tenir sa plume, car il ne sait pas écrire quatre lignes, on a envoyé le général Bellegarde, homme de beaucoup de talent et d'esprit, très ambitieux, très immoral, dévoué au Baron Thugut, quoiqu'il doive sa fortune à l'Archiduc ; mais celui-ci le hait, parcequ'il l'a indignement trompé en se dévouant au Baron. Le Marquis Chasteler, connu pour avoir un grand talent, a été pris en affection par le Comte Souvoroff, et, malgré quelques nuages, cette affection se perpétue. Chasteler, dès lors, a perdu l'affection de Thugut, et a excité la jalousie de Mélas et surtout de Bellegarde. Chasteler a eu l'imprudence d'écrire ici par la poste à ses amis ; il leur exprime son estime pour le Maréchal Souvoroff, son opinion de ses plans, et ce qu'il pense des détracteurs ; ses lettres ont été interceptées : dès lors on a songé à lui donner des dégoûts. Au moment même où il fut blessé, on avait résolu de recevoir sa démission s'il la présentait. Il y a ici un général appelé Lavection, l'ami intime du Baron, et l'objet de la haine de toute l'armée. Ce Lavection est officier de génie et d'artillerie ; c'est lui qui, malgré les représentations de toute l'armée, poussa le Maréchal de Wurmser à s'enfermer avec les débris de son armée dans Mantoue. Ce Lavection est ici l'homme que le Baron consulte en tout et par tout. Il est l'ennemi de Chasteler, et lorsque le Baron veut discuter un plan militaire qui ne lui convient pas, il charge de ce soin Lavection.

“À présent on otera Chasteler de l'armée d'Italie, le Maréchal Sovroroff veut l'y retenir ; c'est pour ce moment en grande partie le sujet des divisions.

“Ces mêmes divisions existent, et plus vives encore, à l'armée de l'Archiduc ; elles sont de part et d'autre le résultat nécessaire de cet état des choses.

“Le Baron de Thugut veut diriger les plans de campagne où les généraux sont sans talents, et, alors, en se soumettant à cette direction, ils sont battus ainsi que l'ont été Beaulieu, Alvinzi, et Wurmser ; ou ce sont des gens capables qui veulent faire eux-mêmes leur métier, et alors l'intrigue du Ministre les environne, et ne cesse de les entraver et les tourmenter. Sans la bravoure, l'intrépidité des troupes Russes, l'énergie du caractère et le talent du Maréchal Souvoroff, les affaires de l'Italie n'auraient pas eu le succès brillant qu'elles ont eu. On est généralement d'accord que les avantages des armées d'Italie, et surtout de celle de la Suisse, seraient plus conséquents si les intrigues et les cabales du Baron de Thugut n'existaient pas." Copy.

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 15. Walmer Castle.—“Whatever I may continue to think as to what might have been tried with advantage some time since, I certainly feel that all I have been proposing is put at present quite out of the question by the atrocious, and perhaps fatal, policy which Austria has adopted. The only chance which seems to remain for avoiding the consequences naturally to be expected, is in the possibility that the effect of your instructions to Lord Minto may have produced some change of resolution, before it is absolutely too late. Of this, however, I have not much hope, and rather expect to see the treacherous system of Austria soon completed by another separate treaty with France. In that case we must consider how the war is best to be carried by us and Russia only, unless the new state of things should lead Prussia to come forward; a circumstance which from their want of all energy and decision I very little expect, but which is just possible from the desire they will feel of making use of the present situation to draw Russia to a connection with them to the exclusion of Austria. If any symptom of such a disposition should appear, it may perhaps deserve consideration whether we might not aid it by proposing to them some concert about the Netherlands, which perhaps they would like for themselves, and from which they will certainly wish to exclude Austria. On the other and more probable supposition of our being left to act with Russia only, our means of acting, and with them our plans, must necessarily be much narrowed, but I should hope it may be still possible that the French may not consider their armies on the Swiss frontier enough at liberty to make, for some time, such a new disposition of them as would prevent us from making the attempt on Brest; and, if that should be practicable and successful, we may afterwards look with security to a limited and defensive war, till some new order of things works itself out in the interior of France. We shall probably want much of the aid of Russia, if not all it can give, to keep our hold in Holland. Any solid operation on France, unless preceded by a greater certainty than I ever expect to see before hand of a very powerful co-operation from within, will, I fear, be out of the question. If we have any force to spare, we may probably strike some blow against Spain by a Russian force brought to act with our own in the Mediterranean; but measures of this sort, though fit to be tried as far as they will go, fall wretchedly short of the prospects which seemed so lately within our reach. I hardly know, however, why I have gone so far into these speculations, which will be much better discussed in conversation. I meant chiefly to say that I have deferred any resolution about returning to town till I hear from you again ; as I think it just possible from what you say, that my last letter may have since determined you to come hither. In that case, I should be very glad not to return to town till the end of the week, but otherwise I shall be ready to set out on hearing from you again, so as to meet you in town any day you name."

Postscript. "I return the papers from Woronzow, and Mulgrave's and Wickham's letters."

LORD MULGRAVE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 15. Verona.—"I shall proceed to Vienna, since you have officially directed me to do so, although I confess I do not understand what service I can render there. As the King does not pay any subsidy to the Emperor, our government, of course, can have no real influence at Vienna.

"You have made your option between being twice cheated, or a second time abandoned by the Austrian government ; and are no doubt prepared for the result of the alternative.

"I cannot say what foundation there may be for Suwarrow's intelligence about the objects of negotiation ; but as Thugut does not appear as strongly impressed as your Cabinet with the danger of French principles and a French Republican government, Austria certainly never can hope for a better opportunity of making peace upon mere territorial considerations. It is in this view worth while to advert to the pains which have been taken (in the direction of the latter operations of the armies in Italy and Switzerland) to leave the different territories in the hands to which they are destined by the plan of pacification mentioned by Marshal Suwarrow. Genoa is to remain in statu quo. Suwarrow is forbid to proceed after the battle of Novi, which laid that Republic open to him ; and the siege of Coni is to be the only remaining operation in Italy, as that will secure Piedmont, destined to Austria. Tortona, Alexandria, and Turin are garrisoned entirely by Austrians, when their army might have been considerably strengthened by throwing Piedmontese into the fortresses, which are covered by the main army, and not within reach of an enemy. The arms in the arsenal at Turin are refused to the Piedmontese, and claimed as Austrian property. Switzerland is to remain in the hands of the French. The municipality of Zurich has never been removed, and the French army is allowed to become double the number of the allies by the removal of every Austrian out of that country. Suwarrow's movement is very hazardous, and he seems himself to be aware that it is so, by an expression in the minute he delivered to me. Had the removal of Hotze taken place, it would have been impossible to undertake any offensive operations. Should Suwarrow's good fortune carry him through that which he has now undertaken, it will be impossible for him afterwards to maintain himself in the country with the Russians alone (after Hotze shall have been removed, which he certainly will be) against the army of Massena, increased by the additional force which may be collected from the army of Italy, and perhaps still further assisted by enemies created in the country by the plunder and outrage of the Russian soldiery. The popular conduct of the Archduke, and the particularly rigid discipline with respect to plunder which he maintained in Switzerland, will form a striking contrast to the conduct of the Cossagues, which will (I fear) be such as to reconcile the people of the country to the return of the French. We can do nothing in Switzerland without the concurrence of Austria. It is melancholy to think that the gallant poor fellows in the little cantons, who have exerted themselves with so much spirit, should be delivered to the mercy of their oppressors. Yet that seems at present to be the fate to which they are destined by the Court of Vienna.

"I suppose Lord Minto will be entirely cured of the frankness of Thugut's communications, upon finding that the order to the Archduke to return to Switzerland has so entirely changed its shape in transitu as to have arrived in the form of an order to Hotze to withdraw. Thugut reminds me of Gay's fable of Vice and the Juggler. In point of ingenious invention and quickness of deception Comus and Breslaw are bunglers to this intellectual juggler.

‘But now and then they cheat the throng,
He every day, and all day long.’

Here Milor Minto, I give you an Archduke and his army on the right of the Russians; hold him fast; you see he is there; presto pass! Where is he? in Swabia! Now feel on the left; Hotze gone! The Austrians all conveyed away; the corps which were placed between removed; the Austrians withdrawn; the Russians left alone! The great King of Prussia said, Quand les Souverains jouent les provinces, les hommes sont les jetons dont ils se servent pour les payer; but he never thought of escamoterie with the same counters. Try Thugut, Lord Minto, and the four corps of troops, with a conjurer, a countryman, and counters, and it will make as good a sleight-of-hand trick as ever was exhibited at a fair. Je me presse de rire de tout, crainte d'en pleurer."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 17. Walmer Castle.—"I send you a copy of the private letter I have this morning received from Sir Ralph Abercrombie along with his public despatch, and also one to Huskisson. It is vastly comfortable to observe how soon our troops are getting into such a steadiness as to give the confidence in them to the general which he states."^{*}

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 17. Harley Street.—"Je vous envoie la traduction d'une lettre que je viens de recevoir de l'Empereur par votre courier arrivé de Petersbourg. Vous verrez sans doute avec le même plaisir que je sens, comme dans toutes occasions l'Empereur de son propre mouvement imagine et saisi tout ce qu'il croit être utile ou agréable à ce pays-ci. C'est, en vérité, une bonne alliance que la notre. De part et d'autre on est franc, bons amis, et on ne cherche qu'à se rendre service cordialement."

^{*} For the letters here referred to, dated September 11, see pages 386-387.

Enclosure.

PAUL I, EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, August 17. Petersburg.—"Désirant dans toutes les occasions de donner à Sa Majesté le Roi de la Grande Bretagne de nouvelles assurances de notre amitié sincère, nous offrons que si, en conséquence de quelques tentatives du Gouvernement François sur les côtes Britanniques ou sur celles d'Irlande, il existe la nécessité d'augmenter ses forces, dans ce cas on y emploie toutes nos troupes destinées pour l'expédition d'Hollande. En conformité de quoi on a envoyé des ordres au Général Herman."

Postscript. "Ceci est ajouté de la propre main de l'Empereur. 'Proposez aussi, en cas que l'expédition en Holland n'ait pas lieu, d'entreprendre quelque chose sur quelque point des côtes de France, entre Brest et Olonne, avec le secours surtout des Chouans ou des Royalistes.'" Copy.

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 18. Park Street, Westminster.—"Whatever our views are respecting the Royalists, all proceedings about them must be at a stand if some new powers are not given to the Ordnance to procure a supply of arms, of which the amount disposable at present, and for a long while to come, is limited to 10,000. Something must be done also to quicken the zeal of the Admiralty, who refuse to send any vessel to the Morbihan upon the ground of danger to be apprehended from the French fleet. 'The sluggard saith there is a lion in the way.' I have not talked again to Lord Spencer, who is gone for a few days to St. Albans. But, if such objections are to prevail, it will be in vain to hope that anything can be done. The case of the Ordnance is, as Lord Howe explained to me yesterday, that the effect of the deficiency left by the Duke of Richmond still continues to be felt, and that, with all their hands employed, they do not expect to get, for a long while, of serviceable arms more than is necessary to supply the home demand; that, of consequence, the only method is to purchase foreign arms which are easily to be had, should they be authorized to send anyone to Hamburg for that purpose. Sir J. Craufurd has, I understand, written to say that he has had offers to the same effect; but the most regular way would be, I apprehend, to send some officer on the part of the Ordnance, as was done a year or two ago.

"The desperate course already begun by the Court of Vienna, with all the suspicions belonging to it, puts one upon the necessity of new plans and expedients; and calls up the question which I have hitherto hardly been willing to take into contemplation, of what it may be possible to do by the force of the discontents in the interior, with the aid only of England and Russia. Many points must, to be sure, be previously settled, namely, the extent to which we will suffer ourselves to be engaged by operations in Holland and in Flanders; and the security that we can have of the continuance of a force even upon the frontiers of France, so as to prevent the Directory from making any large detachment from the regular armies now employed there. If regrets were of any avail, I should now regret the time which we have lost in putting the Royalists into that state of defence, which on every supposition is agreed to be necessary, and which, I fear, they will hardly attain before the Directory, whether it may be desirable or not, will compel them to act.

“There seem to be two distinct systems that may be followed for the employment of the force existing in the Royalist provinces; either the inhabitants may be considered as a mere body of insurgents, rendering the country in which they are, useless and difficult to the Directory, and facilitating the operations of regular armies that may enter France from without, in which case little more would be necessary than to supply them with arms, and such sums of money as might answer occasional and incidental purposes; or they may be considered as a body of people capable of themselves of furnishing a regular army, and fit to be treated by this country on the same footing in respect of expense as any power which we might subsidize. I have never considered them in this way in anything that I have said upon the subject, because I never saw any prospect of their being so considered by others, and was too happy to get such little assistance as might prevent the cause from absolutely falling to the ground, and the individuals from perishing. But it is a way in which they may very properly be looked at; and all the representations that I have heard from Puisaye’s time down to the present, give me reason to think that such a view of the subject, should we adopt it, or should we [be] driven to it, will not be found to deceive us.

“There are certainly many points of the coast, the Clos-Poulet, the Cotentin, a point not far from Brest, and others, of which with an army of 20,000 men we might be sure to get possession, and in which we might be sure to cover ourselves with an army of twenty or thirty thousand more before the enemy could bring any considerable force to act against us. Recollect that at Quiberon the troops were on shore for eight days before any enemy whatever appeared; and that the whole collected at last, in circumstances more favourable to the Directory than the present, was only 18,000. I can hardly entertain a doubt that a landing of 20,000 English and Russians, with a proper proclamation and a French prince, would throw the whole of the west of France into insurrection, and give more soldiers than you would know what to do with. Out of these it would not take long to select an army of twenty or thirty thousand, useful, serviceable, and capable of immediate operations.

"I am not checked in this hope by any slowness of operation that may as yet have appeared in Holland. Besides that, as yet, the question has not by any means been tried, the Dutch are a people from whom the same alacrity is not to be expected. It will be as much as we can fairly look to if they should declare in our favour, as soon as our superiority shall be clearly ascertained.

"Whatever is looked to, either as an object purely of hope, or as connected with anything that we are to do, it seems to be agreed that the first step to be taken is to supply the Royalists with what is necessary for their defence; and this, as you will perceive, cannot be done unless measures are taken for providing a supply of foreign arms.

"One word more upon a subject not immediately connected with the above, but very much connected, in my opinion, with the credit and character of the country. The foreign regiments now in our service, namely, Mortemart, Castries, and La Chatre, after having escaped a danger with which I am afraid they were threatened, of being stripped of all their Germans in order to recruit the new battalion of the 60th lately given to Brownrigg (I state the fact not upon any certain authority) are to be sent, as I hear, to join the Duke of York in Holland. If this is so, and that the Duke, as I likewise hear, means to employ these troops upon the outposts, a situation at once implying the greatest trust, and exposing them to the greatest danger, do we mean to leave them in a state of not being protected by the laws of war, but to be liable, in case of falling into the enemies' hands, to be put to death as rebels? It seems to me that our having done so heretofore has left no small reproach upon the country, which, I hope you will agree with me, ought, as much as possible, to be done away by a change of our practice in that respect in future."

Postscript. "Will you send back to the Office, as soon as you have done with them, the last dispatches from Lord Minto and from Switzerland. I cannot but think that, with the recall of Lord Minto, the threat should be held out to Vienna of an appeal upon their conduct to all Europe. Surely the grossness of the falsehood respecting the causes that compelled, as they say, the evacuation of Switzerland, and the flagitiousness of the measure itself, will bring a degree of reproach upon M. Thugut which he will not care to face. At all events the character of governments, good or bad, forms, in the present times above all others, a great part of their strength or weakness; and ours can never appear to so much advantage as when set off on the dark background of Austria. The exposure will deprive Austria in the last extremity of some of the means of mischief, and give to us and Russia some additional means of doing good."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 18. Duke Street, Westminster.—"I send you, at the Prince of Orange's request, the enclosed extract of a letter from the Hereditary Prince, and I add to it the letter I received myself from M. de Heerdt. I can easily imagine that as they advance they will experience a very great want of money, and will be in great distress on that account. To-night the Prince of Orange has sent me two letters he has received to-day from my brother who is at Lingen, together with one from Stamford. My brother's letters (which the Prince desired me to return to him immediately that he might order copies of them to be made for your Lordship's use) contain a general account of the efforts made in the provinces of Overijssel and Gelderland to make the inhabitants rise, but which efforts have not yet been successful, as no hopes of any assistance could be given to the well-disposed people. My brother also sends the copy of a letter of the Duke of Brunswick to the Hereditary Prince; this I have made a copy of, which you will also find enclosed. The Prince earnestly requests that it may be kept secret, in order that the Prince, his son, may not be committed. I therefore beg you would have the goodness not to let this paper come out of your hands. I don't think it contains much more than we already knew, and it confirms me in the opinion that this measure is meant for nothing more than a mere demonstration. M. de Stamford writes the same thing, and that he is the more willing to believe this, as he is informed no orders have been given to reinforce this corps, nor even to provide it with the necessary field artillery.

"A letter has been received in the city to-day, supposed to be written by a Jew who is in the municipality at Amsterdam, in which he says that if there was any possibility of coming to some agreement with the other party he would willingly contribute to it, that the present rulers would make great sacrifices for the preservation of tranquillity, that perhaps they might even go so far as to resign their places, and consent to the re-establishment of the Stadtholder as chief of the Republic; but that it seems that a complete restoration of the ancient form of Government is in contemplation, which they will not easily consent to. This letter is of the 7th instant; I don't think it signifies much except that it shews they begin to feel some embarrassment.

"The two enclosed letters from Yvoy contain some details on the subject of the attempts made to execute some movements in Gelderland and Overijssel. When you have looked them over I beg you would be so good as to send them back to me, that I may return them to the Princess."

Enclosure 1.

THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK to the HEREDITARY PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, September 3. Brunswick.—"J'ai l'honneur d'avertir votre Altesse que je viens de recevoir l'ordre de faire avancer M. le général de Schladen avec dix bataillons, et quinze escadrons sur Wesel, pour se cantonner entre cette place et Rees; mes ordres ne disent que cela, et de réunir un peu d'avantage les troupes qui demeurent sur les derrières. Le Roi recommande surtout de ne rien compromettre; la réponse du Directoire doit avoir été négative, cependant on continue à négocier avec ces faquins. Si votre Altesse peut quelque chose sur Mr. Grenville, qu'au nom de Dieu il ne se hâte point de quitter le Continent; je crois que le Directoire forcera le Roi à prendre un parti."

Enclosure 2.

[J. FAGEL to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.]

1799, September 11. [Lingen.]—"On est sûrement mieux instruit par les nouvelles directes de Son Altesse Sérénissime de tout ce que se passe dans le Nord Hollande, et de la positions respectives des armées que je ne puis l'être ici sur les rapports, souvent inexacts et presque toujours incertains, des voyageurs qui passent, ou par les lettres particulières que je recois moi-même, et celles qu'on me communique. Les notions que j'ai recueillies, et que me paraissent les plus vraisemblables sont que, depuis le combat qui a suivie immédiatement le débarquement, le General Daendels a transporté son quartier à Puzmeren, qu'il y tenoit à la gauche de sa ligne la ville d'Alkmaer, et couvroit de sa droite celle de Horn. Les Anglais occupaient déjà les villes de Medemblick et d'Enckhuysen avant l'arrivée des 6,000 Anglois que le général Dum [Don] a amenés au général Alberkrombye [Abercomby] et qui faisoit partie de la seconde division attendue incessamment avec le Duc de York, et le reste de la généralité Britannique.

"Ce que j'ai trouvé de plus intéressant dans les rapports que j'ai vus, c'est qu'un officier Anglais s'étoit présenté au quartier de Daendels auquel il avoit demandé un passeport pour se rendre à la Haye, où il avoit de la part de general Albercombye des ouvertures à faire au Directoire; que Daendels n'avoit rien voulu prendre sur lui sans avoir reçu l'ordre du général Brune comme commandant-en-chef les armées des deux nations; qu'en conséquence, Brune s'étoit rendu de sa personne au quartier de Daendels, qu'il y avoit parlé à l'officier Anglais auquel il avoit demandé quelles étoient les ouvertures dont il étoit chargé, et que, sur la refus qu'avoit fait cet officier de lui faire part de ce dont il n'avoit à parler qu'au Directoire même, ce général Brune en avoit écrit sur le champ à la Haye pour y donner formellement à connaître au membres du gouvernement qu'ils ne devoient rien écouter sans en communiquer avec lui avant de répondre. Si cette nouvelle est telle qu'on la détaille, il y auroit des inductions favorables à tirer de la circonspection mesurée avec laquelle Daendels en use avec Brune, et de la precaution de méfiance que ce dernier a prise avec le Directoire Batave.

"L'ordre subit qui est arrivé hiér à nos officiers rassemblés sur l'Ems de se porter sur le champ à Savanaer, vis à vis d'Arnheim, sur le fondement ou le prétexte qu'ils ne pouvaient pas rester plus longtems dans l'intérieur de la ligne de démarcation Prussienne, donne beaucoup à penser sur l'usage qu'on veut faire de ces officiers, ainsi placés à portée des deux provinces de la Gueldre et de l'Overyssell, où le peuple est mal-disposé contre la gouvernement actuel, et où on pourrait assez aisément, sous le conduite de ces officiers, former dans cette partie un rassemblement de gens armées qui, de concert avec les insurgés et insurgents

Brabançons disséminés sur les différens points de la Meuse, pourraient par une utile diversion accélérer rapidement l'affaire des Hollandais, et préparer très avantageusement celles du Brabant, où on me marque que les mécontents de tous les ordres, indépendamment des conscripts, ont l'oeil fort au guet sur tout ce qui se passe, et va se passer chez leur voisins, pour régler d'auprès eux leur marche, quand le moment favorable se présentera. Sans doute alors on se prononcera avec eux de façon à lever dans leurs esprits toute espèce de doute sur la pureté d'intention qu'on aura en les mettant en mouvement; et j'ose assurer qu'on aura alors aussi tout lieu de se louer des efforts et de l'empressement avec lequel ils se déclareront contre le gouvernement tyrannique qu'ils ont tant de raisons d'abhorrer.

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 19. Walmer Castle.—“As the points you mention do not seem absolutely to require my being in town on Friday, I shall indulge myself with another day, and not come till towards dinner-time on Saturday. We sent the militia bill to town yesterday evening, as we think very complete. A copy of it is to be sent to you immediately, which will explain fully our ideas. I imagine it would clearly be best to have translations of the treaties prepared, as they ought to be laid on the table, even if nothing is done upon them. I had thought it would be best to exclude absolutely all business but that of the militia. I find, however, that our money would barely hold out to the end of December, and that we should be obliged to meet again before Christmas to provide for the latter part of that month and the beginning of January. It seems therefore much better to take the opportunity of voting the sugar and tobacco (ci-derant land) and malt; we then need not interrupt the next recess till the beginning of February, and we shall not add more than three days on this account to the length of the present session.

“We received accounts last night of the arrival of the Duke of York and our reinforcements, as well as the Russians. The army was to move forwards on Tuesday, or Wednesday at latest. We can hardly expect to learn the result till Sunday, or perhaps Monday, or even Tuesday, and, of course, the terms of the Speech cannot be well settled till the account arrives. As the Speech cannot be read till just before the King goes to the House, and as there can be no cockpit, this will be no inconvenience.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 19. Altona.—“I received yesterday from Higgins your three private letters of the 5th, 11th, and 12th instants, and am relieved from very great uncertainty by the satisfaction which you express in my opinions respecting the Petersburg negotiation. I share with you in all possible impatience to be where I can fancy at least that I am doing something, and therefore I saw with some disappointment that the order for a frigate, which your letter of the 12th announces as being enclosed, has not been sent; under these circumstances I am endeavouring to press into this service either the Pylades or the Discovery, both of which ships are arrived at Cuxhaven to convoy some meal for our army in the Texel; I have applied to Captain Dick of the Discovery, who is to take the orders of his superior officer Captain Mackenzie of the Pylades, upon it, and I go on to Bremen to-day on my road to Emden, where I hope to find one or other of these two ships. If they fail me, I must then try my influence with Admiral Mitchell, but that will be a great loss of time. All our successive accounts appear to announce so much desertion in the Batavian army that I should imagine your 44,000 men will be as amply sufficient as you can be inclined to consider them; and, in addition to this, I have received from Fagel at Lingen an account of a visit there from Mollerus, commissioned by Van der Goens to announce to the Hereditary Prince of Orange that the Batavian Directory had sent to Berlin to negotiate through that Court with the French Directory for the evacuation and the neutrality of Holland, a negotiation which they profess to be equally ready to open with Great Britain for the same object. You know enough how much I had foreseen this course of events, and I have only thought it necessary to write one line to Mr. Garlike to remind him of the insidious complexion of this offer, because I am persuaded that he will be as much upon his guard against it at Berlin, as you will doubtless be at London; but I mention it now chiefly because it furnishes a strong additional proof how sensible the patriot Batavian government begins to be to its weakness and danger. Under all these circumstances I do not hesitate to take Henry with me to North Holland, partly because I do not believe in his being exposed to the chance of any danger there, partly because, if any such arises, I shall have frequent opportunities of sending him by sea from the Texel, and partly because, until some manifest danger should arise, I think his mother must rather wish him to remain with me than that he should incur the inconvenience unnecessarily of returning to England alone. You will, however, easily believe that although I rather recommend eventful scenes of life as the best lessons to young men, I think, however, there is a just measure in the choice of them, and it cannot be either fit or reasonable that I should expose him to any risk or hazard where he is not called upon by any duty or necessity; and where his only function is to be a spectator, I must take care that he is so no longer than while he can look on in safety. I repeat this the more to you because, being a good deal pressed in time, I shall not probably be able to say all that I would about it to his mother, though I certainly will write a few lines to her to satisfy her that I have not the smallest idea of letting Henry see anything in North Holland that is more military than the illuminations of Amsterdam when the French shall retire from it. This cannot and must not be the moment of Prusso-Batavian negotiation.

"To you I may venture to say that I should have been better satisfied if Fagel's letter to me from Lingen, in announcing this mission to Berlin, had spoken of it with more decision and more marked disapprobation. I tell myself that I am, perhaps, unreasonably jealous upon this subject, but I cannot by that reflection entirely do away the whole of the uneasiness which I feel when I miss upon this subject a single note of that tone in which our friends should, in my mind, always speak of it. I trust, however, that I shall find no traces of this weakness in the Duke of York nor in Abercrombie, and that it shall not be found to have grown upon the Hereditary Prince in the last month in which I have been absent from him. It will be blame enough to the inhabitants of the United Provinces if their unmanly panic shall prevent their assisting the exertions which we make for their deliverance; but, though their fears may make them inactive, their fears must not enable them to make us so. I rejoiced to hear last night from Captain Dick that Mitchell was on the 10th preparing to accompany a flotilla of sloops, bomb-vessels, and gun boats across the Zuyder Zee before the city of Amsterdam; this is the true course of negotiation and the only one which, in my conscience, I can approve of as long as one French soldier is left within the territory of the United Provinces. I do not know how far you agree with me in this, but I feel that it is so true that I am confident of your assent to it. Judge then with how little patience I am likely to read a letter which quotes the threat of General Brune as an inducement to treat with France for the evacuation of Holland.

"I will not, however, add to this letter; I shall have probably enough to say to you whenever I receive from you the letters and papers which you announce to me at the Texel, but do not forget that, until I know what are the instructions given by you to your general, it will be impossible for me with any advantage to communicate with him upon the political objects which are to be assisted by them.

"I hope I shall be able to see Stamford at Bremen, or rather at Emden, if I am delayed long enough to invite him there from Brunswick, where he now is. His zeal and his talents are too precious to slumber at the Court of the Prussian generalissimo."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE

1799, September 20. Walmer Castle.—"I have perused the recent despatches from the Continent contained in the box which you sent to Mr. Pitt. They are certainly as discouraging as possible, but I cannot help thinking that, whatever other epithet may belong to the conduct of Austria, they will never be so foolish as to leave Switzerland ultimately to fall into the hands of France, as they must be conscious such an event puts into the most precarious tenure their own favourite project of Italy. Perhaps, however, it is best to look for the worst, and, in that view, I wish you seriously to turn your eyes to another view of the business. Even if Russian troops form a junction and keep themselves safe in any part of Switzerland, the season is too far advanced, and every part of the campaign so disturbed and distracted as to render quite hopeless any further vigorous operations in the course of this year, and therefore we must turn our thoughts to the spring. And, in that view, why should we not from this time look on Russia as our only true ally, and bestow upon them every shilling of subsidy we can afford to give for men; and, on the other hand, the Russian Emperor would, I should hope, be disposed to give us every soldier he can spare from his present army, or any other he can collect. These troops might be gradually and successively brought down in the course of the winter, and rendezvous either at Minorca, or in Sicily, or in Malta if it falls; and with an army so collected we might make a serious movement into the south of France as early in the spring as we pleased; and, in that case, I should wish to make up in Minorca a force of our own, or partly our own and partly Russians, who might act under Sir Charles Stuart on such parts of France on the coast of the Mediterranean as might be concerted with a view to distract the attention and harass the army of France which would be, of course, collected by them in the South to oppose the progress of the allied army. This plan of campaign would of itself go far indirectly to relieve Switzerland, as the French would then find business enough at home. But if, in addition to this, we shall be able at the same time in the spring to form an army large enough (of which there can be no doubt) to operate against Brest, or from the Seine and Somme, or both successively, we shall then be in a very promising situation, due pains being taken in the course of the winter to prepare insurrections both in Brabant and the interior of France, all of which, if well-directed, to operate to one result. I throw these ideas loosely out as they have occurred to me in the course of my ride yesterday. I mentioned the same generally to Mr. Pitt last night. He is out all day, meaning to leave this to-morrow; and I thought I might as well mention them in this general way to you. As connected with part of the subject, and that a very material one, I send you an extract of a letter I received from Captain Popham by the last despatches from Holland.

“ Upon the subject of insurrections in the interior of France, I have read the recent communications from M. Dutheil, and I confess myself most exceedingly alarmed by them. If those kind of speculations are not checked and kept back, every idea of any good to arise in due time from any good dispositions which exist in any part of France is at an end. I hope after my return to have an early opportunity of conversing with Mr. Pitt and you upon the subject, and some arrangement must be made on an intelligible footing on which one can act. A despatch, as a matter of course, came to me a few days ago for my signature directing the Transport Board to put two vessels under the direction of the Secretary at War. I returned it without my signature, because how little disposed I am to grudge my own labour, and however much disposed to act upon the confidence to be reposed in other branches of Administration, it cannot be reasonably expected that, on one of the most delicate points in which Government can act, I should blindly proceed and take upon myself a very serious responsibility, without knowing either the objects or the extent of it."

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK TO
HENRY DUNDAS.

Secret and confidential.

1799, September 20. Schlagen Bruch.—“You will receive in my public dispatch the general account of the events of yesterday, in which I am sure that you will join me in admiring the bravery, courage and good conduct displayed on that occasion by both officers and men of his Majesty’s British troops, and in regretting that they were not ultimately crowned with that success to which they were so justly entitled.

“I have as much as possible avoided in my dispatch saying anything against the behaviour of the Russian troops, knowing of what consequence it is to keep the Emperor in good humour, and even if you think that there is now in the letter any expressions too harsh or that may give offence, do me the favour to alter them before it is published. But it is owing to their conduct only that we were obliged to give up the advantages which we had gained, and almost the whole of the poor fellows whom we have lost fell in covering their retreat. I enclose to you a report which I have received from captain Taylor, my aide de Camp, whom I had ordered to attend general Hermann, of the conduct of the Russian column, as likewise from general Knox, whom I sent in the latter part of the day to endeavour to bring them on again. I need add nothing to them, as they detail fully everything. I do the Russians full justice for bravery; nothing could behave better than the three Russian battalions in the storm of Warmenhausen, and during the time they were attached to general Dundas’s column, but their discipline is terrible. General Hermann, though a willing, well-disposed, and, in some degree, well-informed man, kept up no discipline; he was likewise very anxious to make himself a name in Russia, and to be as much beloved by the soldiers as Suwarrow is said to be; and, certainly, I am convinced that the affection and confidence that the officers and soldiers had in him was one of the principal causes of their retreating upon his being taken.

"I am very glad to be able to inform you, however, that the Russians (both officers and men) are beginning to recover themselves, and are exceedingly ashamed of their conduct; and I have no doubt if Major-General Essen, who is now the senior officer, will exert himself, which he has promised to do, to restore discipline, that they will behave very differently the next time. With regard to the British I am happy to say that they are not the least depressed by what has happened, and that they are thoroughly sensible of the advantage which they had gained, and which they were alone obliged to give up from the failure of the Russian column.

"In general, I consider this, though unfortunate, as no serious check, at least not difficult to repair. There are five British brigades, making nearly 10,000 men, who were hardly if at all engaged, and who therefore may be considered as fresh troops; and the rear-guard of Russians, consisting of three thousand men, are now at the Helder, and are expected to join this day. Under these circumstances, as soon as I can furnish the Russians with the different articles of which they are in want, we all agree in the determination of making another general attack, which I trust will be attended with success. Before I conclude I must say one word about myself. I send you enclosed the original disposition for the attack, as likewise the separate reports of each general officer commanding a column, in order that you may possess every information, and I shall now wait with patience and resignation for the opinion of his Majesty and his ministers upon my conduct. I can only say that no effort has been wanting on my part—that the plan was thoroughly canvassed, and unanimously agreed to by Sir Ralph Abercromby, Lieutenant-General Dundas, and General Hermann, who were all sanguine in their expectations; and indeed, in my opinion, the event has proved that these expectations were well grounded, as the success must have been very complete and decisive had it not been for the mismanagement of the Russian column." Copy.

Enclosure No. 5.

CAPTAIN HERBERT TAYLOR to H.R.H. FIELD-MARSHAL THE DUKE OF YORK.

1799, September 20. Headquarters. Schagen Brug.—
"About 2½ o'clock on the morning of the 19th, Lieutenant-General Hermann told me that Major-General Schutorff with the Russian Jägers and one battalion of grenadiers from Petten had already crossed the canal and was moving forward upon the right. In an hour after a few shot were heard, and although it was still quite dark General Hermann said that as General Schutorff had begun the attack, it was necessary that he should be supported. The first line, therefore, consisting almost wholly of grenadiers, which had for some time been drawn up under the dyke, was ordered to advance along the Slaper Dyke, and to commence the attack upon the work which the enemy had constructed, as soon as the signal should be given. Lieutenant-General Hermann directed that Major-General Mannern's brigade should move from Petten to its left, and remain in reserve upon the dyke, as well as the four pieces of horse artillery which he observed could be of no use until daylight, and the country became more open. Two squadrons of the 7th were ordered to support Major-General Schutorff on the right, and the others to move with the horse artillery when ordered. The first Russian battalion was formed in a column of divisions, and appeared in the first instance to move forward in very good order, as did also the second. The signal gun was fired when it was still impossible to distinguish any object, but Lieutenant-General Hermann said that although the attack was certainly beginning too soon, the impatience of the troops was such that he could not delay it. When the front reached the enemy's work, they gave a great shout, which was repeated by the whole of the Russian troops, and succeeded by a most violent and irregular fire, which appeared to be as much from the rear division as the front. I am confident that not more than three or four musket shots were fired by the enemy at their first breastwork, and was not a little surprised when General Hermann moved forward (which he did with the second battalion) to find that 30 or 40 of the Russians were lying dead or wounded, in front as well as in the rear of the work. I observed to General Hermann that the troops in the rear must have fired upon those in front, which he admitted was more than probable. The Russian artillery was immediately brought forward and began to fire towards the front, and the fire from their corps upon the right appeared also to be advancing very rapidly. The second work of the enemy upon the same dyke, and in which they had one gun, was attacked in the same way and carried with apparently as little resistance from the enemy, although the number of killed and wounded of the Russians appeared to increase as we advanced. Notwithstanding it was still much too dark to derive the least benefit from the fire of artillery, the Russians loudly and constantly called for their guns, as they moved forward, and these were fired without a possibility of pointing them at any object.

"General Hermann had now reached nearly the head of the column of which the troops, when they had arrived at the extremity of the Slaper Dyke, in part turned to its left towards the village of Groete, in part extended to the right upon the sand hills and joined the corps which had advanced in that direction under Major-General Schutorff, and whose fire incessantly crossed our line of march. To this circumstance and to the fire from the troops in the rear I must principally attribute the very great loss which the Russian troops sustained, and I was confirmed in this impression at the attack of the village of Groete, where the resistance of the enemy was by no means obstinate, but where the shot were flying in every direction. As far as I could judge in so enclosed a country, the enemy appeared to me to be chiefly upon our left. From that quarter a very heavy, though irregular fire of small arms was kept up; and as it was returned both by the troops who advanced through the villages and enclosures under the sand hills, and those acting upon them, the fire of the latter fell as much upon their own troops, whom they could not distinguish, as upon the enemy. Lieutenant-General Hermann's horse was wounded by a shot from the left after we had forced the village of Groete, and as he seemed to think my red coat drew the enemy's fire upon him, I left him, when he turned to the sand hills on the right above Groete, and went forward to the troops in advance upon those hills. At this time the Russian Jägers had expended all their ammunition, and were of no further use during the remainder of the day. The second line of the Russians had, in the meantime, been brought forward; but not being, unfortunately, kept in reserve, they very soon joined the first and mixed with it.

"The troops continued advancing upon the sand hills in a most irregular manner, regardless of danger, and the loss of a number of their men, and continuing to fire indiscriminately from all quarters. Such was the confusion which prevailed that more than one officer, and among the rest the commanding officer of a battalion, told me they could not find their regiment. I observed repeatedly to those who understood German and French, that their troops were firing upon each other, and that if those of the rear could be formed with some degree of regularity, this would be remedied, and a reserve established in case it should be required. This they admitted, but took no step towards effecting it, except occasionally calling to their men to cease firing, to which, however, no attention was paid. No general officer was with them, and they repeatedly expressed their anxiety for the presence of one who might have some authority over the troops, which they themselves certainly neither had, nor pretended to have.

"In the meantime the troops who were advancing under the sand hills had attacked and carried the village of Schorel, and I went down to them from the sand hills in the hopes of finding Lieutenant-General Hermann, or Major-General d'Essen, but could not see them, or learn where they were. I therefore proceeded with the troops along the road which lay through houses and narrow enclosures of very thick underwood, with a ridge of sand hills close upon the right, and, occasionally, a few openings between the enclosures, which were of much greater extent on the left.

"The fire from the left was very heavy, and we could at times plainly distinguish the French troops in the openings. I pointed out to several officers of the grenadier battalion forming the advanced guard the necessity of extending a little to their left, in order to cover that flank as they advanced, and to establish a communication with the English troops whose fire we begun to perceive considerably to the left. This they appeared willing to do, and actually halted part of the battalion; but their commanding officer not appearing, they gave up the measure and proceeded in the same manner as before, namely, in a confused irregular column without anything to protect their left, and firing indiscriminately to their front and flanks; while I could plainly perceive their own troops upon the sand hills directing their fire into the road and enclosures through which we advanced towards Bergen. About a mile from Bergen an avenue of trees (flanked on both sides by thick underwood enclosures) commences, which is continued in the same direction as far as the hills above Bergen, where it turns short to the left, and leads into that village; a great number of houses are scattered on each side the avenue, and, about 200 paces before you arrive at the entrance of Bergen, there is a considerable opening to the left, whence we could plainly perceive the Koedyck and the village of Schouldam, with the whole of the country beyond it as far as the Lange Dyck. Here the French had established a battery of several pieces of cannon, at a windmill about 400 or 500 yards distance from the avenue, and they had also drawn up a body of cavalry and some infantry. As we advanced through the avenue to this opening, the fire of musquetry from both our flanks and the village in our front was extremely severe, and we were also exposed to the fire of the battery upon the left. The troops, however, proceeded, and reached the opening, but here they were checked by the fire of the French Artillery which was now directed against the head of the column, and by the appearance of their cavalry and infantry drawn up upon the left. The troops were crowded together in a most confused mass, and were very clamorous for artillery, which was at length brought up with great difficulty, as the horses were hardly able to move. The appearance and fire of our artillery checked the progress of the French corps which was advancing and the Russian troops again proceeded in the same irregular mass, under a most heavy and galling fire which, from the nature of their disposition, proved extremely destructive to officers and men. All was confusion, and no officer who was able or who attempted to get the troops into a little order, was at all attended to. At this moment Major-General d'Essen arrived, and immediately ordered the troops to halt and form; two pieces of cannon were placed at the before-mentioned opening, which might extend about 200 paces from one enclosure to the other nearest to Bergen; and another was advanced upon the road as far as the latter enclosure, and its fire directed against Bergen. One battalion of grenadiers was moved forward in line upon the left through the fields, whilst the remainder of the troops advanced in column along the road. No precaution was at that time taken to secure the right. More troops kept coming up from the rear and with them Lieutenant-General Hermann.

“From the severity of the fire which the enemy kept up from the enclosures upon our left, and that of the infantry and artillery between us and the Koedyck, the grenadiers upon our left were forced to retreat to the avenue, and we again fell into the same confused mass from which we had for a moment been extricated. Every exertion was used by Lieutenant-Generals Hermann and d'Essen, but the former repeatedly told me that he had no longer any authority over the troops, and they would not obey him.

"We nevertheless continued gradually advancing and got possession of the village of Bergen, where (having at that time the enemy's fire upon our front and left flank only) General Hermann, under cover of the houses, succeeded in forming a battalion of musqueteers in front of the church towards the Koedyck, and one of grenadiers in a street in our front but a little to the right. The remainder of the troops were distributed between the houses and at the extremities of a number of lanes and avenues which led to the centre of the village and the church.

"In this situation we remained about 20 minutes, losing men very fast, and apparently quite at a loss what steps to take, when the Russian troops on the sand hills in our rear having given way (from what cause I know not) the enemy appeared in our rear, and we received their fire upon the right. Almost at the same time the enemy were penetrating through the opening upon our left into the avenue, and the battalion of musqueteers which was formed in front of the church, was ordered by Lieutenant-General Hermann to move to the rear and left, to defend the above entrance into the avenue.

"The enemy continued advancing upon all sides, and every spot in the village was exposed to their fire. Of the three guns in the village two were entirely without ammunition, the third was placed at the entrance of the street in our front, Lieutenant-General Hermann was gone into one of the lanes upon the left, whilst General d'Essen remained near the church. At this moment the enemy penetrated into the village upon the right and front, and the Russian troops, after firing two rounds from the gun placed as aforementioned, gave way and fell back in the greatest confusion into the avenue. Lieutenant-General Hermann was taken prisoner. General d'Essen, having collected the troops which remained, forced his way back through the avenue, and very fortunately, the Russians having again advanced a little upon the sand hills, he succeeded in reaching them and in forming upon the ridge such of the officers and men as could be prevailed upon to make a stand, to which the rapid advance of the British upon the left contributed not a little.

"I came out of Bergen with General d'Essen, and was sent by him to His Royal Highness to report what had happened, and to apply for support. Major-General Manners's brigade was immediately sent by His Royal Highness, but when we arrived near Schorel, the Russians were in full retreat, and had actually abandoned the village of Schorel, which was, however, immediately attacked and retaken by Major-General Manners's brigade under a very heavy fire of cannon and musquetry from the enemy."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1799, September 20–25. Harley Street.]—"On m'a apporté la boîte que je vous renvoi à neuf heures. Je vous rend mille graces pour les communications très intéressantes que vous avez eu la bonté de me faire. La conversation du maréchal avec le colonel Clinton, est bien remarquable. Elle peint l'homme de génie. Il se pourroit bien qu'il n'eut pas fait tous ces détails d'une manière suivie à ma Cour, mais les auroit écrit à fait mesure que les contradictions lui arivoient de Viéne, ce qui ne présente pas un plan complète de l'absurdité et de la mauvalse foi de Thugut. C'est pour quoi il seroit bon d'envoyer une copie au Chevalier Whiteworth, à fin qu'il le comunique à Rastopchin et Panin à Petersburg.

"Vous voyez combien il est urgent de finire au plus tôt l'affaire avec les Bavares; plus vous augmentez la force du maréchal, plus vous lui donnez les moyens de chasser Massena de toute la Suisse avant l'hiver."

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 25. Schlagen Bruck.—"I take the earliest opportunity to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's letter of the 12th instant, which has been delivered to me by Count Rhone Bentinck. I have no doubt that his zeal and activity will be of material use to our affairs in this country, and I do not see the least objection to give him a temporary commission upon the continent of Europe, as he seems to think that it will be some degree of protection to him in case of misfortune; and, at any rate, an honourable mark of his Majesty's approbation."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, September 26. Cleveland Row.—"Lord Spencer assures me that, from the state of the winds, the dispatches I send to-night are likely to be in Holland nearly as soon as you can be expected there. I trust it will be so. I was very desirous of sending my No. 1 sooner, but it could not go without passing through the form of a Cabinet, though I do not think my colleagues are able to give me much aid on this subject. My No. 2, I am afraid, you will think throws it all very open again, but after having clearly explained to you what we think best, it seemed necessary not wholly to preclude the possibility of treating with the present people for an arrangement a little more to their fancy. I do not however expect from such a negociation anything more than to distract and divide the councils of our enemies, for it seems very little likely that they should have the power to do anything in despite of Brune and Dandels.

"A number 3 and 4 I had planned, but on mature consideration thought them best deferred. The first would have related to a renewal of our alliance with the new Government, including the consideration of terms of peace with Holland ; the second to the Netherlands.

“As to the first of these objects it lays, as I conceive, in a very narrow compass—restoration of the Spice Islands (except Ceylon) and of Demerary, and guarantee of their constitution and territory, on condition of (1) offensive alliance ; (2) actual co-operation in this war till peace be made by common consent ; (3) express renunciation, and under very strong conditions, of claim of neutral commerce when we are at war ; and more than this, I think, we have not to ask of them.

“Negapatam might be thrown into the bargain as a factory only, but subject to our paramount jurisdiction and control—Ceylon, the Cape, and Cochin would not be heard of.

“The 3rd of the points above-mentioned would be most contested—but in truth it is as necessary to our alliance with them as it is to our interests in war, for while they had the bait of immense gain by our wars, it was in vain to look to the stipulations of treaties to insure their assistance.

“As to the Netherlands, quid dicam, aut quid non dicam, nescis. Malcolm’s instructions are obsolete and not worth your reading now. He had but little to do, and that little he has bedeviled. Maitland is gone to replace him. He has no written instructions. He goes in the first instance to enquire and learn. The object must be, if possible, to raise the country in order to facilitate and secure our Dutch operations. All other questions are put almost out of sight by the infamous perfidies of Austria. If the country itself rises they will look to us and not to Austria for aid, at least they will receive it from us alone ; and we must take our chance to direct the future course of the business as time and occasion may prescribe.

“God bless you—send us a good victory, for the affair of the 19th has made no good impression here.” Copy.

Intelligence communicated by the Prince of Orange.

J. FAGEL to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, September 26. Lingén.—“J’ai l’honneur d’envoyer ci-jointe à votre altesse sérénissime une lettre que M. de Suideras m’a prié de lui faire parvenir, et dans laquelle je suppose qu’il lui rend compte de ce qui s’est passé dernièrement sur les frontières, et des tentatives faites pour exciter des mouvemens dans les provinces de Gueldre et d’Overysse qui pussent accélérer le rétablissement du gouvernement légitime. J’ai déjà eu l’honneur de mander à votre altesse, et elle aura sans doute été informée par Monseigneur le Prince Héréditaire, que les essais n’ayant pas répondu au but qu’on s’étoit proposé, avoient été abandonnés ; il m’a paru que M. de Suideras lui-même étoit convaincu de cette vérité, et j’ai tout lieu de croire que son zèle et sa grande activité ne l’entraîneront pas dans des mesures qui seront infructueuses, tant qu’elles ne peuvent être soutenues par des troupes, qui ne serviroient qu'à faire des malheureux. Je me flatte que l'époque n'est pas éloigné où l'on pourra mettre à profit les bonnes dispositions des habitans des provinces voisines, et je ne doute nullement qu'elles ne secondent très efficacement les opérations militaires qu'on sera dans le cas de diriger de ces cotés.

“ Une partie des troupes Prussiennes, qui ont reçu ordre de se mettre en marche, s'est déjà avancée entre Wesel et Rees ; on assure positivement que ce corps ne tardera pas à passer le Rhin et à occuper le pays de Clèves. Il ne paroît point que cette démonstration ait fait grande sensation dans la République, et que l'opinion que le gouvernement a taché de repandre s'accrédite que la Cour de Berlin alloit prendre un part active à l'ouvrage de la restauration de l'ancienne constitution. Nous sommes encore dans une ignorance complete de l'issue de la journée du 19, que les gazettes Hollandoises representent comme ayant été très favorable aux troupes Françaises et Bataves.

Ce qui suit étoit en invisible.

“ Votre altesse est sûrement instruite par le Prince son fils des ouvertures que M. Mollerus étoit chargé de faire de la part du gouvernement Batave, et dont j'ai eu l'honneur de lui donner connoissance dans ma lettre du 16 de ce mois. Elle sera donc déjà informée que les lettres que Mollerus attendoit ici, et qu'il avoit autorisé M. van de Spiegel à ouvrir, s'accordent sur le grand désir qu'on a de se défaire des François, mais qu'elles n'indiquent point d'inclination à entrer en négociation avec l'Angleterre, ou avec le parti Stadhouérien. La dernière, du 21 de ce mois, dit positivement que l'on est assuré que M. Vos de Steenwyk, que le Directoire a envoyé à Berlin, y sera bien reçu, et qu'il réussira dans l'objet de sa mission, celui d'engager le Cabinet Prussien à insister auprès du Gouvernement François sur l'évacuation de ses troupes, et l'abandon de la Hollande. M. Vos est déjà parti, et a passé le 20 dans ces environs pour se rendre à Berlin. J'en ai prévenu Mr. Garlicke, et je me flatte de recevoir dans peu des informations sur la réussite de cette mission, et sur le succès de ses négociations.”

COLONEL ROBERT BROWNRIGG to W. HUSKISSON.

Private.

1799, September 26. Schagen Brug.—“ Since my last letter to you of the 20th, every exertion has been using to put the army in a situation again to move forward, and which would have taken place by this time, had not the tempestuousness of the weather and constant rains very much impeded our supplies reaching the army from the Helder. The last division of Russian troops under Major-General Emmé arrived in the Texel on the 21st, but they, with three troops of 15th Light Dragoons, could not disembark until the 24th, and the former will not arrive at their place in our line before this evening, consequently our attack will not be until Saturday—it was intended for to-morrow. Many projects for proceeding against the enemy have been agitated and taken into the most serious consideration, and it is the joint opinion of Sir Ralph Abercromby, General Dundas, and Sir James Pulteney, that the first object is to endeavour to defeat the enemy in his position between Bergen and Alkmaar. There the principal force of the French (estimated at about 14,000 men) is. They are very advantageously posted, and every possible obstacle presents itself to us in our approach, but I believe a determination to conquer prevails throughout the army, and the most sanguine expectations are entertained by our chiefs, and a perfect understanding subsists between us and the Russians; all their generals express themselves sensible of the misconduct of their troops on the 19th, and admit that, had there been any system observed in their attack, they must have been victorious. Even General Hermann acknowledged to Major Dyer of the Guards, who was sent to Alkmaar with a flag of truce, that his defeat was owing to too great hardiesse on the part of the soldiers, and that he himself was not aware of the sort of troops he had to act against. At the same time we understand that he has written a letter to the Emperor imputing his disaster to a want of support from the British, and that the Russians were in consequence sacrificed. This letter, it is said, General le Brun lost no time in despatching to Russia. Supposing Hermann to have adopted this mode of exculpation, I do not think it will have any weight with the Emperor, as his assertions will be contradicted by the reports of his brother generals; and the fact that the principal loss the British sustained was in supporting his column, cannot be controverted. Popham has sent Sir C. Whitworth a copy of the Duke's public letter to Mr. Dundas giving an account of the action, for the Emperor's information, and I send you a copy of H.R.H.'s letter to His Imperial Majesty, which I hope will be approved. Should we unhappily fail in our attack, there is little prospect of our being able to make an impression on the enemy with our present force on this side of Holland; therefore, in case of the worst, you must be prepared with instructions for us how in the event to proceed. The Helder point is fortifying so as to make it tenable by 2 or 3,000 men. The provinces of E. Friesland and Groningen present themselves as the objects the army should proceed to in case of failure here. The horse transports are ordered to England, but we shall detain all other vessels until after the business of Saturday. The plan of attack accompanies the Duke's private letter to Mr. Dundas; it has been made with the full concurrence, and indeed at the suggestion of Sir Ralph Abercromby and General Dundas, and in this place I wish fully to explain to you that H.R.H. takes no steps without their being consulted.

"Late last night a mail from England arrived, by which I had the pleasure to receive your letter of the 20th. Be assured that our disappointment at not having had it in our power to send home the accounts you expected has far exceeded yours, and that the event of the 19th has been one of the most mortifying circumstances of the Duke of York's life. The enemy have not carried their threat into execution of inundating the country between us and Amsterdam, nor is it at present believed that they will. When we are in a situation to approach that place, your ideas will be attended to.

"By the papers sent home by this opportunity you will perceive that the Dutch troops, forming under the Prince of Orange, may shortly be expected to be in a state for service; there is, however, at present no means of sending them to Friesland or Groningen, nor can a British force be spared at this moment to accompany them. The Duke heartily wishes your measure of procuring a further supply of troops from the militia success: before you form new corps, do not forget that those here composed of militia volunteers are very deficient in numbers.

"It is intended to send the Russian wounded to Yarmouth, in the transports that are to return to Russia with admiral Tchitchicoff; our wounded will be forwarded without delay to Harwich, according to a memorandum of yours delivered to me by colonel Brinley. Some supplies in clothing and necessaries have reached the army, and our men begin to look a little more like soldiers than when we first arrived. The Batavian troops desert in the proportion of from twelve to twenty every day, and I have no doubt but that the whole of the Batavian troops are disaffected, and only wait an opportunity of declaring themselves. The French do not reckon upon them in the least; about a thousand of the Batavian soldiers that were taken on the 19th have engaged in the Prince of Orange's service; I do not recollect that I have anything further to trouble you with at this moment. I shall conclude by earnestly trusting that my next will be dated from Alkmaar, and that I shall have the happiness of giving you an account of brilliant success." Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799 [September 26].—"The enclosed is the private letter I have from Sir Ralph Abercrombie. If you are to make any confidential communications to Woronzow it seems the best I have received, and either you may shew it yourself, or, if you please to return it to me, I will send it with a letter from myself, such as he can send to his Court."

Enclosure.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY TO HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, September 20. Schlager Bruck.—"You will receive with this an account of an action that took place yesterday between the allied army under the command of the Duke of York and the troops of the French and Batavian republics. As it was not my lot to have any share in it, I shall not enter into any detail. The plan of attack was, I am persuaded, the best that could be devised; it was laid by H.R. Highness before General Hermann, myself, and General Dundas, and it met with our united approbation. General Hermann declared that it contained all his ideas, and I heard of no difference of opinion on the subject.

"I think it necessary to say so much as General Hermann, who had a great share in the execution of the plan, is prisoner, and cannot write to his Court on the subject. The event of a battle is at all times doubtful, but in this country the difficulties that an attacking army has to surmount are not to be equalled in any country in Europe. The history of the Dutch republic proves this in general, and I am convinced that the account of the action of yesterday will remain a prominent example. From the knowledge I have of the ground, as much was done, and as great advantages were gained as could have been expected. Victory was already in our hands, when, from one of those unfortunate accidents to which the best generals are exposed, it was lost. Having only returned to headquarters this morning at two o'clock, I know nothing of our loss, or of that of the Russians. Some of the best brigades of the army and who had no share in the action are fresh, our numbers are not much diminished, and we are ready to try another attack. The same plan must be followed nearly, I hope with better success, and free from those circumstances which prevented its being more complete yesterday."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 27. Emden.—"I am mortified to find myself still at Emden from the utter impossibility which Captain Winthorp has hitherto found of sailing from Cuxhaven to fetch me; we had yesterday, however, a rather more favourable wind, and I am not without better expectations of his arriving here in the course of this day.

"From the garbled and mangled accounts which arrive here from Delfzyl it is not easy to distinguish the true history of what is passing in Holland, but it seems evident that the general result of the actions of the 19th, 20th, and 21st has been to drive back the enemy to Amsterdam and Leyden with the loss of 3 or 4,000 men.

"It was high time that our numerous troops should have a larger field for action than could be found in the neighbourhood of the Helder, and strongly as I am impressed with the necessity of our making a diversion, I rejoice to hear of our having landed some troops at Staveren. In passing through Leer I found M. Van der Haar and Charles Bentinck earnest in their solicitations for the execution of the promise made to them by General Don; as I knew nothing of that detail, I have satisfied myself with assuring them that nothing but an alteration in the points of our attack could have delayed the execution of General Don's promise to them that they should have a body of English troops upon some part of the coast of their province, and if the Staveren expedition has not taken place, it shall be my first business, in landing at the Texal, to endeavour to bring about that measure. Bentinck and Van der Haar engage for the immediate co-operation of those provinces as soon as any English troops are landed there, and that co-operation may tell powerfully on the Overysse side of Amsterdam while we are threatening it from Alkmaar and from the Zuyder Zee. Charles Bentinck has told me that he has now vessels enough in the Ems for carrying 2,500 men to any part of the coast of the Zuyder Zee; they have long been engaged in the service of the British government, at the cheap rate of £200 per fortnight, and he was in some doubt whether he should not dismiss them, as he has heard nothing upon the subject since Don was here; but I have desired him to make no change till I have got to the Texel, because it is very possible that these means may be wanted for the attack of Amsterdam.

"I do not yet understand what has prevented the progress of the expedition of bomb-vessels against that city, which sailed from the Texel on the 10th instant, and I am not without some apprehensions that there may be too much disposition to abstain from vigorous measures and to trust to amicable negotiation. As far as I am yet informed, I have no good hope whatever from any such course; it is evident that there is no general principle of enthusiasm in the country, nor any prevalent motive except that of fear; they are afraid of the French, so afraid of them that the country does not stir more now that we have 40,000 men landed than they did two months ago when we had not a soldier there; if this is so, if they can be governed only by fear, we must not let them through that principle serve our enemies by negotiation, instead of assisting the general cause by manly and open action; if they are sensible only to fear, they must be frightened into a better course of conduct, and in this view I had rather trust to one bomb thrown to alarm Amsterdam, than to all that Mollerus can say at head-quarters, or that their Dutch agent can say to Haugwitz at Berlin.

"I must not however go too fast in my speculations till I have good information, and here I have none good or bad, or rather such a mixture of both as serves to perplex more than to inform. The Amsterdam and Haarlem papers of the 23d are arrived and say nothing of any action on the 20th or the 21st, nor do the Lingen letters of 26th at night speak of any such report. M. d'Yvoy writes to me on the 17th to say that Comte d'Aremberg has received a letter from Thugut to tell him that the Emperor has renewed his pretensions to the Low Countries for the sake and for the advantage of his faithful subjects there; d'Yvoy adds that Malcolm is with him waiting for answers from Dundas."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 28.—"I lose no time in sending you the enclosed copy of a letter the Prince of Orange received this morning from my brother who is now at Lingen. It throws a little more light on M. Mollerus's message."

Enclosure.

J. FAGEL to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, September 16. Lingen.—“Depuis la dernière lettre que j'ai eu l'honneur d'adresser à votre altesse sérénissime en date du 9. de ce mois, il ne s'est rien passé dans ces environs qui méritât son attention. Elle aura vu que tout projet de révolutionner partiellement quelques villes et villages des provinces de Gueldre et d'Overysseel a été abandonné pour le moment, où la difficulté, pour ne pas dire l'impossibilité, de se soutenir, et le danger réel auquel on auroit exposé inutilement un grand nombre de bien-intentionnés, qui ont donné à cette occasion des preuves de dévouement et de zèle qu'on ne sauroit assez louer. Toute entreprise de ce genre a donc été suspendue jusqu'au moment où l'on apprendra avec certitude qu'un corps de troupes Angloises se portera sur les provinces de Gueldre et d'Overysseel, et où l'on pourra tirer parti des bonnes dispositions des habitans pour réunir les bien-intentionnés, et coopérer à la délivrance générale. Je me flatte que ce moment n'est pas éloigné, et que les premières lettres de Monseigneur le Prince Héritaire donneront plus de jour sur les projets ultérieurs du général Abercrombie, et sur les opérations futures.

Ce qui suit étoit en invisible.

“M. Mollerus est arrivé ici avant-hier au soir, croyant y trouver M. le Prince Héritaire et désirant l'entretenir sur un objet de la plus grande importance, puisqu'il ne s'agissoit de rien moins que d'ouvertures de la part du Gouvernement actuel relativement à une capitulation. M. Mollerus, n'ayant pas trouvé M. le Prince Héritaire, se decida sur le champ à partir pour le Texel, après avoir communiqué au Prince de Hesse-Darmstadt, au Conseiller-Pensionnaire, à M. de Grovestins, et à moi le motif de son voyage. Il commença par nous dire que tous les membres du Directoire, à l'exception de Van Hoof, étoient très-portés à entrer en négociation, que cette disposition étoit fondée sur la conviction intime qu'il étoit de toute impossibilité de se soutenir, et de faire une longue résistance, ainsi que sur leur désir de prévenir que la République ne devint le théâtre d'hostilités qui finiroient par ruiner totalement tout le pays; que quoique les deux conseils ne fussent pas animés des mêmes sentimens, plusieurs des membres ne demandoient cependant pas mieux que de faire une bonne fin, mais que le Général Brune seul s'opposoit à toute idée de négociation, et étoit décidé à défendre le pays à toute outrance, et à ne rien épargner pour parvenir à cette fin; que c'étoit uniquement lui qui avoit mis des obstacles à l'admission des parlementaires Anglois, et qu'il étoit à prévoir que si la force des armes l'obligeoit de céder le terrain, il mettroit en exécution la menace qu'il avoit faite de traiter la République en pays conquis. Ces dispositions avoient engagé le Gouvernement à envoyer quelqu'un à Berlin pour sonder les dispositions de cette Cour, et savoir si elle ne seroit pas disposée à traiter avec la République Francoise dans le but d'obtenir pour la Hollande l'évacuation de ses troupes et une parfaite neutralité. On étoit également disposé, pour peu qu'on en vit le moyen, à traiter avec l'Angleterre, et on ne demandoit que d'être mis sur la voye pour y parvenir. Telles étoient les dispositions du gouvernement Batave ainsi qu'elles avoient été manifestées à M. Mollerus par l'organe de l'agent des affaires étrangères Van der Goes, le seul avec lequel il étoit entré en matière sur cet objet, mais dont la manière d'envisager l'état actuel des choses s'accordoit avec celle de la majorité du Directoire, et de quelques-uns des meneurs du Gouvernement actuel. A cette occasion M. Mollerus dit que le voeu de ceux qui désiroient entrer en accommodement se portoit vers une constitution semblable à celle de l'Angleterre, en rétablissant le Stadhoudérat dans toutes ses prérogatives. M. Mollerus, s'étant décidé (comme j'ai l'honneur de le mander à votre altesse) à se rendre au Texel pour exécuter verbalement auprès du Prince Héréditaire la commission dont il avoit été chargé, on a jugé qu'il importoit que nous eussions quelqu'un à Berlin qui fut prévenu de l'arrivée de l'agent Batave, et du motif de sa mission, et qui put nous mettre au fait des réponses qu'on pourra faire à ces ouvertures. En conséquence j'ai écrit à M. Garlicke pour l'en informer, en le priant de me communiquer ce qu'il seroit dans le cas d'apprendre; et j'en ai également informé M. Grenville, qui est toujours à Hambourg."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 28. Harley Street.—“Eu rentreut chez moi j'ai beaucoup réfléchi sur notre conversation à l'égard des troupes Bavaraises, et je me suis souvenu que vous doutiez qu'elles fussent prêtes, et qu'il falloit encor les léver. Il m'est venu dans l'idée d'éclaircir ce fait, et j'ai écrit au Comte Hassland pour le prier de me dire franchement si les dix milles hommes, que son souverain offre, existent, et sont prette, ou doivent être levés encor. Je vous envoie sa réponse, et come il a une écriture peu lisible, je l'ai fait copier au bas du billet même. Vous verrez que ces dix milles existent, et qu'il ne s'agit que de l'équipement pour entrer en campagne. C'est à dire acheter des tentes, des cheveaux pour leur transport, et pour charier les canons et les munitions de guerre; ce qui se fait dans moins de trois semaines; ainssi ces troupes peuvent joindre Korssakoff avant même celles que le Maréchal Souvorow amènera de l'Italie. Considérez, je vous suplie, toute l'importance politique et militaire de cette mesure, et combien la célérité de l'adopter est utile. Nous sommes dans une époque; en grâce aux perfidies autrichiennes, il faut regarder comme un bonheur et un efet de la Providence qui nous offre un moyen prompt et facile d'améliorer nos affaires si derengées par Thugut.”

Enclosure.

COUNT DE HASLANG to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, September 28. Harley Street.—“Le Comte de Haslang présente ses complimens à M. le Comte Woronzow. Comme l'état de l'armée de l'Electeur doit être bien plus fort que 10,000 hommes, il n'a pas de doute qu'ils existent effectives, et qu'il ne s'agit que de l'équipement et autres choses nécessaires pour entrer en campagne."

LORD GRENVILLE to THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, September 29. Cleveland Row.—"In addition to the packet which you will have received from me, I send you the inclosed, which may be of some but not much use to you. Return it to me, for I have no other copy.

"Fagel has mentioned to me a letter from the Hereditary Prince of Orange, which shews how much you was wanted there. He desires his father to press us for money, and talks of our advancing a million, as Sir F. Wronghead was to have his thousand pounds 'to be doing something.' I have answered drily enough that if our enterprise succeeds at all it will do so only by our acquiring immediate possession of the two richest cities in Holland, which must at once supersede the necessity of all such demands. To have to fight in order to restore them without any exertion of their own is quite enough for us, without having to pay their Government afterwards in order to prevent their being taxed. But it is exactly in their nature to make such demands, and I wish it was more in ours to refuse them steadily.

"We are all in an uproar to-day at receiving letters from the Helder of the 25th, without one word of or from the army. I have no apprehension of their being either surrounded or cut off, because I well know that with common exertion they ought to be now at Amsterdam. But really their being Burgoyned is the only excuse they can make for leaving us five days after their defeat without telling us where they are or what they are doing; when you are within ten or twenty miles of them I well know this will not happen, but that does not excuse them.

"Suwarrow is by this time gone from Italy to Swisserland by the Mount St. Gothard, with all the Russians that were left there. Some people think the march a very hazardous one. I hardly know how to judge of it, but I think it will be so unexpected to the French that they will not be prepared to oppose it with all their means. Thugut has now beau jeu in Italy. How came you to escape falling in love with him when you was at Vienna? Eden's successor is ten times more enamoured than he was. Simul obligavit perfidum votis caput, enitescit pulerior multo? I have however tried to put a little spirit into Lord Minto, and he promises to be very stout next time.

"All your projects for this autumn are, as you will easily suppose, destroyed by these cruel delays in Holland, and we now look only to the spring.

"Spain has intimated something about wanting to talk very privately about peace, but I believe it is only a wretched intrigue in that most contemptible of all governments, without the least serious intention of extricating themselves from the net in which their fleet is caught.

"Do not you like the man in the Convention who is very angry because the Dutch fleet was not also brought to Brest?"

W. WINDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 29. [War Office.]—"I send you back the Duke of York's papers. I cannot say that I have received from them all the satisfaction that I had been led to expect. A main link of the chain is wanting, that, namely, of the column immediately contiguous to the Russians. The report I conclude was not made in consequence of the Duke of York having been there in person; but it is material, as the question will be asked whether, though the Russians might have been too fast, that was not too slow.

"After all was the plan of attack good? I cannot but suspect that it was not. I do not mean that the Duke of York is to be blamed, or that anyone could be blamed for acting on a system sanctioned by so many great authorities. But I have always thought that the system to which this belongs is wrong; for reasons which I will explain at any time that we may happen to talk upon these matters.

"The immediate failure was clearly owing to the irregular conduct of the Russians, growing I fear out of the bad constitution of their armies; and it is equally clear, or seems to be so at least, that our troops acted everywhere with the greatest spirit. This at least is consolatory in point of national credit."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 29.—"I send for your confidential perusal a letter I have received from Admiral Mitchell. The latter part of what he says respecting the army renders it impossible to communicate the letter to anybody. There is a short letter to the Admiralty, dated on the 25th, but it does not even mention the army. I wonder they have not wrote to explain why they don't move, as even that would be some satisfaction. My own conjecture is that the badness of the weather has put the country into such a state as to render it impossible to move artillery or anything else. Not only the delay itself, but all those other circumstances are too much in favour of the enemy; and, if the weather does not quickly mend, it will affect the health of the troops very rapidly."

LORD GRENVILLE to WILLIAM WICKHAM.

1799, September 29. Cleveland Row.—"I have several of your private letters to answer, but I shall hardly have time to enter fully into all the points of which you speak.

"You recommend some mark of attention from the King to the Archduke, but this was before the last events; and although the whole blame is not his, yet the relative situation of the Courts is not such as will admit of these civilities towards one of whose conduct (if not of his intentions) his Majesty has so much reason to complain.

"I shall press Lord Mulgrave to accept the command of the Swiss, but I am not very confident of success. If he refuses, I shall be much puzzled to find any other English officer equally [competent] for it, or nearly so.

"I had never an idea that the Commissary for the Swiss levies should act in anything of importance but by your advice, and his own sense ought to tell him so. I write by this messenger to Ramsay to explain this to him quite distinctly. A general in the command of that army (and particularly if that general is Lord Mulgrave) will be entitled to greater latitude; but I believe Lord Mulgrave is fully sensible of the assistance he could derive from your knowledge of the country and its people, and would be very desirous to avail himself of it without any paltry jealousy, of which I think him incapable.

"The particulars mentioned in your private letter of the 2nd were, as you will easily imagine, quite new to me. Had I known or suspected any part of them, my conduct would have been different. As it is, I am, on very deliberate reflection, satisfied that no more can be done than is now doing; but that must be quickly done. If you hear more, you have too much friendship for me, as well as too much regard for the public; not to tell it me immediately and without hesitation, and I will then act accordingly.

"If Mulgrave comes to the army, mention to him what you write to me about Venerode, and he will know that he may rely on being approved in any step that he thinks necessary in order to retain him with Suwarow. If he does not come, act for the best yourself, and do not doubt of being supported. The only point of difficulty would be the transferring a foreigner permanently to our service in that rank, which you know is impossible.

"I am uneasy at the state of things in Switzerland. Lord Minto has not yet learned to receive Thugut's promises with the distrust with which seven years of painful experience has inspired me. Write to him frequently, and in a style to inspire him. Write also to Whitworth, for almost every thing at Petersburg depends on first impressions. If Austrians enough are left to prevent any great calamity befalling the Russians before the winter, my idea will be to negotiate at Petersburg for reinforcing them in the spring with 25,000 more troops, which, with Bavarians, Wirtembergers, and Swiss, will put 100,000 men under Suwarow's orders. This force might be sufficient to act independently of all Austrian co-operation, beyond the mere defence of the Rhine and the Alps. And, by moving forward, Suwarow might quickly obtain a footing in France, and there give one fair chance to the experiment of Royalist armies.

"If our Dutch business succeeds, it is very probable that we may be enabled to co-operate with this movement by an attack in the same moment on the Royalist provinces in the north-west. Keep this plan in your mind, and see what you can do or suggest to facilitate its success, without letting anybody suspect it.

"Some present account, and future successive statements of the amount and distribution of the French armies would, with this view, be very useful to us. I know that the confusion in the administration of the military department is such that it would not be easy for a French Director to have quite accurate information on this point; but try [to] get what you can get, and that as soon as possible, and as often afterwards as you can." Copy.

LORD MULGRAVE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, September 29. Vienna.—"I had scarcely quitted Verona before it occurred to my mind that the nonsense which I wrote at the end of my last private letter (sent by Captain Foster) might appear to involve in it some imputation by want of vigilance and penetration on the part of Lord Minto, though I really do not recollect whether it can lead to such a construction. I do not, however, like to incur any risk of the appearance of doing injustice, however innocent it might be in its effect, as you certainly would judge of his conduct from his own correspondence and not from mine. I beg, therefore, to assure you that it never did appear to me that Lord Minto had been further deceived than any wise and honourable man might easily be by a person capable of using a temporary fallacy, which would be the less liable to suspicion and mistrust from the certainty by its being unveiled by the time it had served the turn. I write this at the moment of my arrival, from impatience to prevent any false impression I may unintentionally have made. I do not yet know whether letters from this place go unopened at the Post Office. I shall, however, enclose this to my porter to be delivered at your house, as less likely to raise curiosity than a letter addressed immediately to yourself."

H. FAGEL TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[1799, September 30.]—"I have just received the enclosed letter, which I send to you, agreeably to what I take to be the writer's wish. His present situation is really very delicate, and I am afraid he is not quite aware of it. You have no idea to what extent the jealousy and suspicions on his subject are carried."

Enclosure 1.

COUNT BENTINCK-RHOON TO H. FAGEL.

1799, September 25. Helder.—"Je reviens dans ce moment du quartier-général du Duc de York et du Prince Héréditaire, ainsi que ma lettre ne sera pas aussi détaillée que je l'aurais désiré, parceque la frégate qui m'a menée part demain matin de bon heur, et que j'ai cependant voulu vous donner de mes nouvelles. C'est aussi pourquoi je ne puis pas écrire à milord Grenville, et que je vous prie de lui communiquer.

“ Nous avons eu un bon passage de 14 heures, étant partis le jeudi à 5 heures de la rade de Yarmouth le 18, et arrivé le lendemain, 19 à 7 heures, devant le Texel ; mais obligé par le gros temps de retourner trois lieux en mer. Le temps étant venu plus clair, nous sommes entré avec un assez fort orage, et jeté l'ancre le soir vers les 5 heures à une portée de canon, mais le temps est devenu si mauvais, que bien loin de pouvoir aller à terre, nous avons chassé deux fois sur nos deux ancres, de même que plusieurs transports dont plusieurs se sont abordés, et deux à trois vaisseaux de guerre ont été obligés de se mettre sous voile, et de remonter plus haut pour ancrer autre part. Le 20, nous sommes arrivés à terre vers les midi, le temps ne l'ayant pas permis plutôt. Alors nous avons appris les détails précurseurs de l'affaire du 19, qui étaient assez alarmants. On disait le général Russe en chef, Hardman, et son second prisonniers, et le 3rd blessé, et 6,000 Russes pris, et tués, et blessés ; et l'on craignait que l'aile droite, à Petten, tournée. L'on disait le 35^{me} régiment Anglais taillé en pièce, à l'exception de cinq hommes et d'un garçon ; et le 9^{me} régiment Anglais, 800 hommes tués et blessés ; de sorte que notre pied-à-terre n'était pas fort gai. Mais les choses sont améliorées, et voici le résumé le plus impartial de tout ce que j'ai pu rassembler à la hâte.

“ Les Anglais sont marché au centre et à l'aile gauche, et ont emporté toutes les batteries avec la plus grande valeur, la bayonnette au bout des fusils ; et ce sont emparés de quinze à vingt pièces de canon, ayant fait 2,000 prisonniers que j'ai vu défiler avec près de 60 officiers Bataves, et l'adjutant-général de Daandels, qui lui-même ne s'est échappé qu'avec la plus grande peine, son cheval ayant été tué. Il était déjà entouré lorsqu'il s'est élancé sur un autre cheval. Les prisonniers sont bien intentionnés, la plus part ; et il y en a beaucoup qui sont arrivés ici avec la cocarde orange sur le chapeau. Beaucoup sont passés, et se sont rendus dès qu'ils ont pu, et il y en a déjà plus de 400 qui ont pris service. Il y a parmi eux près de 200 canoniers, et 60 Français. Tout a été placé le soir sur les vaisseaux. J'en ai trouvé plusieurs de ma connaissance ; et ils m'ont dit que la plus grande partie des troupes Bataves, si non toutes, passerait de notre côté dès qu'ils en auraient l'occasion.

“ Pendant que ceci se passait au centre et à l'aile droite, [gauche ?] le général Abercromby, avec une colonne de 12,000, s'est porté sur Hoorn, où il est entré sans résistance, et a fait 200 prisonniers que j'ai rencontré aujourd'hui, et qui sont déjà sur les vaisseaux. Tout allait bien jusqu'ici ; les drapeaux oranges flottaient, et il y avait mis un garnison de 200 à 300 hommes lorsqu' il reçut la nouvelle que les Russes, qui avaient fait leur attaque sur l'aile droite avec 6,000 hommes, après avoir chassé les Français de trois batteries et pris trois villages, la bayonnette au bout du fusil, s'étaient rendu maître du village de Bergen, à deux heures d'Alkmaar. Mais les Français ayant reçu du renfort, et les Russes ne connaissant pas assez le terrain, et manquant de munitions, furent entourés et chassés à leur tour, leur général-en-chef pris dans le village de Bergen, et le second aussi, et le 3^{me} blessé. La confusion s'y est mise. Alors les Anglais ont dû abandonner leurs avantages, et aller dégager les Russes, ce qu'ils ont fait avec la plus grande vigueur et bravoure, surtout le 9^{me} régiment qui y a perdu près de 500 hommes ; de sorte que tout a été redressé, mais tous les avantages des Anglais inutiles quant au terrain, puisqu'ils ont dû rentrer dans les anciennes positions, et abandonner leurs avantages, n'ayant ainsi pu prendre l'artillerie prise sur l'ennemi faute de chevaux. Cependant on compte la perte des Bataves, d'après le rapport des prisonniers, à près de 5,000 hommes tués, blessés, et pris, ce qui ferait une grande brèche. Et d'après ce que l'on m'a dit au quartier-général, la perte des Russes serait moindre qu'on ne l'a cru, et ne pas sera guère les 12 à 1,800. Le pire de tout est la prise des deux généraux Russes, pour le bruit et les gasconnades dans l'intérieur. Sans ce malheur Alkmaar était à nous.

“ Du reste, l'armée Anglaise se conduit exemplairement, et l'on est aux nues de leur bravoure, de leur conduite militaire, et particulièrement de leur discipline qui est de plus rigide. Voici mon cher ami les détails militaires ; à présent un petit détail du reste.

“ J'ai été reçu, on ne peut plus honorablement, par le Duc de York, et il m'a promis de m'expédier tout de suite une patente de Colonel, ce que je crois sera suffisant. Chez le Prince Héritaire j'ai été fort bien reçu, et fort amicalement, et lui ai fait lire ma pièce, qui ne lui a pas trop plus je crois, car il m'a dit que j'avais plus de pouvoir que lui, et d'un ton à lui propre, m'a dit qu'il était mon serviteur puisque j'étais le représentant de son père, et qu'il ne pouvait, dans plusieurs des articles de la pièce où j'étais renvoyé à lui, me donner son approbation, puisque c'était des choses qui passaient ses pouvoirs, et qu'il devrait, le cas existant, lui-même avant avoir les ordres de son père. Il m'a cependant chargé de prendre sous ma direction, et de lui faire le rapport du magasin et des vaisseaux ici, ce que je ferai demain ; mais il n'a pas encore voulu mettre sous ma direction (quoique sous ses ordres) les officiers et matelots qui sont à terre à l'île de Texel, et avec lesquels il a déjà fait plusieurs fausses démarches (ceci cependant entre nous et milord Grenville). J'espère de tout redresser avec un peu de patience. Votre frère François viendra demain chez moi, et j'espère de le garder alors. Il me sera plus facile de vous donner régulièrement nouvelle de tout, car je suis excédé.

“ Le Prince Héritaire m'a fait une sortie assez désagréable sur mes connexions avec les Anglais, surtout de ce que j'avais une patente et un rang, et a voulu me prouver que cela ne se pouvait pas. J'ai tenu bon, et je vous en dirai davantage dans ma suivante ; il a dit qu'il en écrirait à son père, et comme je ne suis pas sûr de l'avoir dit au prince, quoiqu'il me semble de lui avoir dit, je vous prie de la lui dire. Si vous voulez, si toute fois vous préférerez que non, je le lui écrirai encore d'ici. Je ne puis vous envoyer aujourd'hui le compte que je vous ai promis, je l'enverrai la fois prochaine; en attendant, j'espère que M. Hammond ne fera pas difficulté de me donner de l'argent quand je tirerai sur lui, ce qui sera bientôt, car tout est au poid de l'or ici, et enfin il faut vivre. Du reste j'observe la plus grande économie, et retranche tous les superflus.

"J'ai déjà soigné pour la navigation aujourd'hui, et donné les ordres nécessaires pour remettre les tonneaux qui manquent, et rétablir l'ordre parmi les pilotes, afin que la navigation soit aussi aisée que possible, et le tout de concert avec les officiers Anglais.

"L'Amiral Mitchel est devant Medenblick.

"Guillaume et Robert se portent fort bien."

Enclosure 2.

COUNT BENTINCK-RHOON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, September 20. Helder.—Some short reflections on the present state of affairs in Holland.—"In general there is a great want of horses in the country now occupied by the combined English and Russian army, principally such which are necessary to transport the artillery or provisions of every kind. These articles are of such a great importance to the success of the military operations, that it is to wish the English Government would take them immediately in any consideration. Besides this is Nordholland, a country where every kind of food for horses is infinitely scarce, and which is quite completely hungered out; so that in case the army could not immediately proceed forward, there will be very soon a great distress in everything. It is certainly not by want of troops that the last action of the 19th was not completely successful to the combined army; but attacking always on a point in such a small and difficult country like Holland is till Haarlem, and quite near Leyden, the enemy can always collect all his forces on one side, and putting only some small garrisons in the interior, he can always, knowing the ground and making use of its difficulties, face the army of His Royal Highness from one position or the other to stop her progresses, till the rainy season and the winter coming on, every further operation will perhaps become impossible. But to prevent all this, I suppose the best mean would be to make at the present moment one or two diversions, which should divide the enemy's forces, open the way to the grand army, and awake the good dispositions of the interior in the United Provinces. The first diversion could very well (with a ten thousand man) be made on the side of the islands, Walcheren, Schouwen, and Goeree, or with part of these forces on such points of South Holland which should be judged the most favourable to finish at our advantage the great and bloody struggle in North Holland.

"This seems to be so much easy that we know the enemy's forces to be less considerable in Zealand than we thought at first; and that, concerning the expedition against Friesland, England finds here the greatest facilities of every kind; as ships and man, only employing to this a body of three thousand men of foot, and any horses, which could consist at first in the brigade of General Don, who took formerly notice of everything concerning the said country; or such other troops which could be found convenient to join more to him who was already designed once for this expedition."

W. WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Most Confidential.

1799, September 30. Ravenspurgh.—"I reached this place late last night after having been obliged to abandon successively Zurich, Wintherthur, Frauenfeld, Constance and Moespurg. The enemy entered Constance yesterday at 10 a.m., and before I left Moespurg, had repaired the bridge of Petershausen, passed over into the peninsula between the two small lakes, and secured a number of boats that had been left at Stadt to carry away the Russian and Austrian magazines.

"On Tuesday, the 24th instant, the Russian force under General Korsakoff was stationed nearly as follows:—

"On the side of Baden, or rather below that place, seven or eight battalions.

"On the banks of the Limmat, between Baden and Zurich, about three battalions.

"At the camp of Seebach, either eight or nine battalions.

"In and before Zurich from six to seven thousand men.

"At Rapperschwyl two battalions, which had been detached to cover General Hotzé's right. At Eglisaw and Shaffhausen a small reserve. The cavalry was distributed among these different corps, but in what proportion, I don't know exactly.

"The camp of Seebach was at the distance of about three miles from Zurich, to the left of the road from that place to Kloten, and between the hill which runs from Zurich to Baden and the Glatt.

"From this point the whole force of the camp might easily have been carried in two or three hours to any part of the Limmat above Baden, where the French should have attempted an attack.

"According to the plan of operations proposed by General Hotzé and approved by Field-Marshal Suvarrow, six battalions were detached from the camp of Seebach, about 9 o'clock of the night of Tuesday the 24th, towards Rapperschwyl. These battalions had not left the place above an hour when intelligence (false, and fabricated for the purpose) was received that the enemy meditated an attack on Zurich during the night, in consequence of which General Korsakoff ordered (I believe) two battalions from the camp of Seebach to march to Zurich, so that the whole line from Baden to Zurich was left to the protection of three battalions dispersed along the Limmat.

"Not knowing the exact number of battalions in the camp of Seebach on the 24th, I cannot say with certainty whether any force whatever remained in it on the morning of the 25th. But there probably could not be more than a single battalion.

"About four in the morning a heavy canonade was heard on the side of Höng, a village about a league below Zurich, on the road which leads from that place to Baden along the right bank of the Limmat.

"Being lodged at a country house on the same road about a mile from the town, and being unable to learn anything from Zurich, I mounted my horse at half after six and rode towards Höng. At the distance of about half a mile on this side the village, I overtook General Korsakoff riding very slowly forwards.

"At this time there was a thick mist on the river on the other side of Höng, but the plain before Zurich, the Albis, and the whole of the French position on the hills, was clearly to be seen, and there was not the least appearance of any extraordinary movement in any part of their line excepting that a regiment of dragoons had left the camp and was drawn up on the left bank of the Limmat opposite to the village of Höng.

"The hill on the right was also perfectly distinguishable almost as far as Baden, and certainly at that moment no troop of either army had taken any position on the heights on this side of the river.

"Below the village there was a very heavy canonade and a weak fire of musketry. I could distinctly see the flash of every gun and hear the ball pass so as to judge of its direction; and I am perfectly confident that the enemy had not, at a quarter before seven, one single piece of cannon in battery on this side of the river.

"I could learn nothing from General Korsakoff who appeared not so much alarmed as confused, and uncertain what measures to take; nor can I say at this moment whether he had then received any information of what was going on or no.

"In a few minutes we were met by Colonel Lambert, a French officer in the Russian service, who informed the General that the enemy was not in force, that with his regiment of Dragoons alone he had attacked and driven them back to the point where they had crossed, but that, having received a reinforcement, they had returned to the charge and forced him to retire after he had had his horse killed under him, and had been wounded in the leg; he added, that he did not doubt but that the enemy would be easily driven over the river as soon as any reinforcements should arrive.

"To my utter astonishment General Korsakoff neither questioned Colonel Lambert as to any particulars of the enemy's force, of that which was assembled to oppose them, or of the manner in which they had passed the river.

"At the entrance of the village of Höng we met General Hiller of whom, tho' returning from the side of the enemy, and acknowledged to be an excellent officer, M. de Korsakoff neither asked information or advice, but continued riding forwards after the common salutations had passed between them.

"I immediately rode up to General Hiller and begged he would give me his real opinion of the state of things. He said that he had been very near the enemy and that he was persuaded they were not in force, but that he saw nothing to oppose them; that he was afraid the battalions dispersed along the river had been either surprized or defeated, as they came up in small bodies, and that it was probable that the enemy had passed in greater force somewhere below; that, in either case, the place where we were was unsafe, as the hill above us was not occupied by the Russians and the enemy might cross it, get into the Kloten road, and cut off our retreat to Zurich; adding that he himself was returning to town to send off an express to General Hotze for the six battalions that had been detached in the evening, with which a position might be taken on the Zurich Berg to cover the town.

"I returned with General Hiller to Zurich, and on our road we observed a column of the enemy (about half after seven) attack the Russian position at Wollishoff between Mount Albis and the lake. Tho' the fire in that quarter became immediately very violent, yet it was evident that it was only a false attack. Unfortunately, however, Monsieur de Korsakoff thought otherwise, left the real point, rode through Zurich without asking the opinion of anybody, and took up his station in the neighbourhood of Wollishoff from whence nothing could remove him till two in the afternoon; when he went to the gate of Kloten and remained there till the enemy was actually firing into the ditch of the town of Zurich from the glacis and covered way, of which they were in possession.

"At 10 o'clock, being informed that General Saacken, who commanded the Russians on the side of Hông, had been driven back into that village, that he had sent successively four aides-de-camp and the Honourable Captain Proby to bring M. de Korsakoff back, or at least to obtain some succours from the left bank of the Limmat, and that Colonel Ramsay and the Baron de Roll had also gone upon the same errand, but without success, I determined to go with General Hiller in search of him, in the hope that our joint representations might have a better effect.

"I believe I have omitted to mention to your Lordship that General Hiller is the officer appointed to reside at the Russian head-quarters by the Arch-Duke Charles.

"When we arrived about half after eleven o'clock, on the hill a little beyond Wollishoff, we saw the Russians who had repulsed the French attack, actually at the foot of Mount Albis on the great road leading from Zurich to Lucerne, their chasseurs half way up the mountain, attacking the French camp, which seemed nearly abandoned, and a French batallion under arms on the top of the hill ready to receive the Russians.

"We could see nothing however of General Korsakoff, and had no hope of finding him, as he had entered the thick woods which run from the point where we were standing to the foot of the Albis.

"The hedges and vineyards all about the village were full of wounded and dead Russians, tho' I don't recollect having seen five dead Frenchmen on the whole ground.

"This is easily accounted for from the nature of the country, which is particularly well calculated for the French manner of fighting, and from the mode of attack of the Russians who appear to trust wholly to the bayonet which the French never attempt to stand.

"The firing in our rear having become by this time very serious and approaching very near to the town, we found it necessary for our own safety to return without loss of time, after General Hidler had sent another officer in search of Monsieur de Karsakoff.

"Before we entered the town we rode, however, for a few minutes into the plain of Zurich in front of the Russian camp (which was still standing) and were there witness to a sight, which I will endeavour to describe whilst it is yet fresh in my recollection. Certainly nothing like it was ever seen before.

"The Russian camp, as I have said before, was standing, the whole of it greatly within the range of the French cannon in their entrenchments on the mountains, from which however not a shot was fired, evidently that they might not risk the bringing back the Russians (who were running on the road to Lucerne and up the Albis), until the town of Zurich should be carried.

"Before the camp a very fine regiment of hussars, a battalion of infantry and a corps of Cossacks with eight or ten pieces of artillery were drawn up in a line of battle, with no enemy in front; the French batteries on the mountain ready to take them on their left flank whenever it should be thought advisable, and the enemy on the opposite side of the Limmat advancing almost on a line with their right flank. Behind us, at the distance of about six miles, were the Russians running like madmen up Mount Albis, actually in possession of the French camp, and apparently inattentive to everything that was passing behind them.

"On the opposite side of the river was a battalion and some detached companies of Russians, supported by a regiment of dragoons, and some Cossacks retiring slowly before the French, and already within about a mile and a half of Zurich. They were firing without knowing at what, and occasionally charging with the bayonet though they could not see their enemy.

"In the vines and hedges before them were two battalions of French chasseurs dispersed in such a manner that you could not see two of them together, and never showing themselves but at the moment when they fired.

"Behind them, along the great road, marched a very strong battalion, formed in a close column, towards which the chasseurs retreated when the Russians charged into the vineyards with the bayonet.

"The regiment of Russian dragoons attempted once or twice to charge this battalion, but before they had gone forty yards, they were exposed to so severe a fire from the chasseurs in the vines on each side of the road, that it was impossible for them to get on. There was every appearance that the Russians whom we thus saw engaged, were all that remained of the camp of Seebach and of the three battalions stationed on the Limmat.

"The troops on the side of Baden were completely cut off. They appeared, besides, to be occupied in their own defence, as we heard a very heavy cannonade from that side.

"On the Zurich Berg and on the ramparts of the town there was not a man to be seen, so that there was every appearance that the town would be carried in half-an-hour by assault.

"At this moment I observed a regiment of French chasseurs, some squadrons of hussars, and a piece of artillery turn the top of the hill about a mile from the village of Hông and almost on the flank of the Russians. This gun, which was the only one I had yet seen over the water, was immediately unlimbered and began to fire with astonishing quickness on the Russians, whilst the chasseurs and hussars, leaving only a small detachment for the protection of the gun, descended the hill on the other side by a narrow path that leads into the road from Kloten to Zurich.

"The fire from this cannon having obliged the Russians to fall still further back and to come lower down the hill, three pieces were run down by the French to the banks of the Limmat on the left side of the river, within five hundred yards of the point where we were standing close behind the line of Russians and French redettes, which your Lordship will find described in the little plan I sent in one of my earliest despatches.

"They immediately opened across the river a very heavy fire on the left of the flank of the Russians, and obliged them to fall back almost to the gates of Zurich and within the protection of their own line of redettes on our side of the water.

"Had the hussars and Cossacks charged this artillery they must inevitably have taken all the three pieces, but they were under positive orders not to quit their position.

"It was now evident that the French were not yet in force before the town or they would have risked an immediate attack on Zurich. It was equally so that they had detached their whole strength over the water within the last two hours, and that it would be in a very short time before Zurich, or they would not have sent these three pieces of cannon unguarded in front of a regiment of hussars and a battalion of infantry.

"I left things in this situation at one o'clock, rode thro' the town and went out at the Wintherher gate where I found the hussars and chasseurs who had turned the hill, actually on the Kloten road skirmishing with the regiment of dragoons which I left retiring along the banks of the Limmat.

"The two roads are separated only by a common field not five hundred yards over, so that the enemy would unquestionably have been in the town before I left it had not the regiment marched to the Kloten road, for the gate of Wintherhur was open, not a piece of cannon near it, and guarded only by some militia of the town.

“ It was to the judicious conduct of the Honourable Lieutenant Colonel Stuart that the town owed its safety at that moment, the Russian officers having entirely lost the faculty of observing what was passing round them. Colonel Stewart took upon him to conduct the regiment there with General Saachen’s consent, and to place it in a position where it covered the town effectually till the arrival of some of the regiments from Rapperschwyl.

“ I have been thus full in stating to your Lordship what I observed myself, not only because from some of the facts I have related your Lordship may learn the nature and causes of the calamity that has befallen us, but because a number of detailed and contradictory accounts will reach England as well as all parts of the world, this day being certainly one of the most extraordinary and memorable of which we have any account in history.

“ What passed after two o’clock I cannot speak with any certainty. I believe the whole was one general scene of disorder.

“ The regiments as they come in from Rapperschwyl and from the Albis, instead of being made to take a position on the Zurich Berg with their artillery, in which case the enemy would never have dared to have entered Zurich, were led successively through the town against the French, who were hourly receiving reinforcements and bringing up artillery, and sacrificed one by one in attacks which were fruitless only because they were made with insufficient force. Without having seen it, it is not possible to have an idea of the manner in which the Russian infantry behaved.

“ In the course of the morning I had an opportunity of conversing with military men of different services, who all agreed in saying that nothing they had ever seen was at all to be compared to it, either for steadiness under fire, or boldness and rapidity of attack.

“ It was a melancholy thing for those who could understand them to hear the poor soldiers on every side repeating the name of Suvarow, and calling on him to come to their assistance. They really expected every moment that he would have appeared on the top of the Albis, on which side they knew he was approaching.

“ About nine in the evening all the surviving troops were shut up in the town with the baggage and the wounded, in a state of the most horrible confusion and disorder.

“ In the morning, the French having brought up some heavy artillery, began firing upon the place.

“ About eleven or twelve o’clock all that remained of the Russians forced their way out of the town and retreated towards Eglisaw ; but under what circumstances, and with what loss, I have not yet been able to learn, nor do we know what has happened to the town, and its unfortunate inhabitants.

“ At the same time that the enemy crossed Limmet, another body of troops passed the Linth at the head of the lake of Zurich; surprised a party of general Hotz’s corps and penetrated to the general’s head-quarters where, the Austrians having rallied, and being supported by two Russian battalions from Rapperschwyl, the enemy was repulsed and finally driven back over the river.

“But General Hotze and Colonel Plunket having fallen in the early part of the action, and the enemy having effected another passage near Wasen, the Austrians retired in considerable disorder, and by the latest accounts had actually repassed the Rhine at Rhunich.

“The Russian corps at Baden appears to have effected its retreat to Eglisaw, and to have formed a junction with the troops which escaped from Zurich.

“General Nauendorff and the Condé army are also in the neighbourhood of Shaffhausen to-day, and the Archduke is expected in person.

“I have also learnt by an express from general Hiller that Field-Marshal Suwarow had reached Schweitz after having carried the St. Gothard; unfortunately all his magazines were formed at Rapperschwyl, so that I fear, unless he can take some of those belonging to the French, that he will be obliged to retreat for want of subsistence.

“Nothing is yet lost, and if the Archduke will take upon himself to act with becoming spirit and vigour, this business may yet turn to the disadvantage of the French. . . . I am afraid, however, that the loss of the Russians cannot be estimated at less than 10,000 men, so that reinforcements must be obtained from some quarter or other.

“Upon this subject I have already written to Lord Mulgrave and Lord Minto.

“I humbly trust that his Majesty will excuse me if I have sent your Lordship nothing but this hasty and imperfect report. I had hoped to have obtained a moment of leisure (the first since I have left Zurich), but General Hiller has sent a second express to me, to beg most earnestly that I would join him immediately at Lindaw, from whence he is in hopes to be able to march forward upon St. Gaul.

“All the English who were in Zurich are safe, and have joined me. Lieutenant-Colonel Ramsay is gone to Eglisaw to see Monsieur de Korsakoff; and I shall proceed myself to Field-Marshal Suwarow’s head-quarters, after having seen General Hiller.

“Your Lordships dispatches by Basset, the messenger, were delivered to me on the 24th. I shall pay due obedience to the commands they contain, and will write to your Lordship very fully on their important contents by the first messenger.

“The Advoyer de Steiguer was saved, but not without great difficulty. He refused for a long time to leave Zurich, nor would he stir till the greater part of the Swiss hospital had been removed.” Copy.

LA PRINCESSE DE BRUNSWIC to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, October 1. [Brunswick.]—“Stamford me charge de vous dire qu’il s’est occupé ici à concerter avec le Duc un dernier moyen d'engager le Roi de Prusse à prendre le seul parti qui puisse convenir dans les circonstances actuelles au bien-être présent et futur de ses états et de son peuple ; le Duc a envoyé à ce sujet un mémoire à sa majesté qui n'a fait jusqu'à présent aucun effet ; et elle n'a fait avancer son armée en partie sur le Rhin que pour prendre possession de Clèves si les François se déterminent à le lui céder. Mr. Grenville, en s'embarquant pour se rendre au Texel, lui a envoyé un courrier pour le prier, non de l'y joindre, parcequ'il sait que l'état de sa santé s'y oppose, mais pour le prier de se rapprocher de lui pour la célérité de la correspondance ; il s'est, en conséquence, déterminé à se rendre à Emden, où, en cas d'indisposition ou de maladie, il n'est pas privé des secours de la faculté, et où il est également à portée de correspondre avec Panin qui l'en a prié."

Extrait, en chiffre.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 1. Harley Street.—"Je viens de recevoir un exprès de notre Général Essen de la Hollande. Je ne veus pas vous écrire officiellement sur la lettre qui est en Russe, mais je vous supplie de permettre que le Reverend Smirnov, notre aumônier, vous traduise quelques passages qui méritent l'attention la plus sérieuse, et les arrangements les plus prompts. C'est lui qui vous remettra celle-ci."

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 1. Downing Street.—"I send you a paper from Lord Castlereagh on the subject of representation, which points out difficulties rather than remedies. Pray return it when you have read it. Have you heard anything more from Lord Buckingham on this subject?"

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 1. Emden.—"The date of this letter will sufficiently express to you my impatience under the continuance of the south-west winds which make it impossible for Captain Winthrop and his Circe to stir from the river Ems ; in truth, besides the adverse direction of the winds, they have been so violent as not yet to allow me to get any of my baggage on board, but they are quieter to-day and I trust that we may hope at last for the beginning of more favourable weather. Having heard nothing authentic here of the Prince of Orange or of the Duke of York other than the public reports of the loss on both sides in the battle of the 19th, I cannot feel that I am competent to express any other opinion than that which arises from general observation, and therefore I do not unprofitably waste your time and mine with writing public despatches which cannot be worth reading. It is, however, certain that whatever may have been the prudence which in a military point of view may have restrained the progress of the English army, the cause of which is totally unknown to me, a good deal of inconvenience has arisen from it, and if there was any feeling of enthusiasm in the people of the United Provinces which could have led to any active and vigorous exertion, it has certainly been a good deal discouraged by observing the English army to continue so long in the same uncommunicating position; I presume that this disadvantageous situation must be owing to the disappointment on the 19th from the confusion which took place in the Russian corps on the right, and I trust hourly that I shall hear of some new or more successful effort by which we shall have obtained a larger scope for the operations of so very large a force. To me it has certainly appeared from the first, that whatever was the advantage of landing all the troops at the Texel, the moment that they were landed, there would be many points of the coast of the Zuyder Zee where they might have operated a diversion with much more advantage than could arise from their acting en masse in a narrow neck of land where there was hardly room enough for them to stand and move. This remark is, however, so obvious that I take for granted there is some solid military principle which has dictated a different course of operations; I cannot, however, conceal from you that I see with very serious apprehensions this long continuance of a position which has more the appearance of a blockade of our army in North Holland, than that of a march for the deliverance of the United Provinces.

"Much as I had laboured with the Hereditary Prince of Holland upon the subject of interior movement, and uniform as all our accounts had been of the necessity rather to contain than to excite any active efforts in the interior before the arrival of the English troops, I did, however, flatter myself that when they once had landed the good affection and disposition of the people would show itself in one great convulsion, and that the Hereditary Prince would be perplexed only to choose in what course he himself would personally march with the people of the United Provinces to drive out of the country the usurped authority of the French Directory. No movement, however, of any sort has taken place yet, and I see by a letter from the Hereditary Prince to Colonel Bentinck at Lingen of the 23rd, that he had made daily applications for some diversion on the coast of Overysse, but without success, and that he did not expect to see any such diversion take place till after another general battle had been tried. Meantime, I am sorry to observe that the Hereditary Prince is entirely thrown away in his present position, and now that I have no hopes of seeing him heading a considerable diversion, I regret extremely that he has moved from Lingen, and am at a loss to know what was the immediate object of moving him from thence. I have not neglected in my course hither, and during my residence here, to endeavour to promote more active movement in the provinces of Groningen and of Friesland, and I have for that purpose communicated with Charles Bentineck, Van der Haer, and Humalda. I find from these persons very strong general assurances of the means which they possess to create a general rising there, and of the disposition which the inhabitants have towards it; but I find them all claiming the specific promise made to them by General Don that English troops should be sent to the coast in order to act with them, and they repeat that this condition is considered by their friends as a sine qua non, although they do not demand a larger force than 1,000 or at the most 2,000 men. I have done all I can to urge them both by letter and conversation; I have endeavoured to pique them by stating the insignificance of the force which keeps them at check; I have endeavoured to give them confidence by shewing that, with the communication of the Zuyder Zee, they have the benefit of the support and countenance of the whole English army; but although my reasoning is acquiesced in, I cannot flatter myself that my unremitting endeavours will produce any effective movement without the actual present protection of the English troops which they ask for. Now if the Hereditary Prince would put his organized Dutch into some light vessels, and assisted by 1,000 or 1,500 English and Russians would come to Wattum or to Stavener or to any point upon the coasts of those two provinces, I really think, as far as I can trust to the assurances of these gentlemen, the immediate possession might be obtained, and with them both the means of subsistence and of winter quarters for the army, if the military operations in North Holland should be unsuccessful. If, as I rather hope and trust, our army should succeed in advancing, it will still be a great point gained to have cut off from the enemy the resources of Groningen and Friesland, and that diversion might spread to Guelderland and Utrecht in powerful support of the efforts which our army is making on the other side of Amsterdam. Count Charles Bentineck is now with me, and I have desired him to go on immediately to Lingen in order to concert there for a fair prospect which is opening, of engaging the Waldeckers in garrison at Delfzyll and at Nieuschank in the service of the Stadtholder. He has applied to me for money to buy arms, and I understand that he has given an order for 2 or 3,000 muskets to be bought, for which he desires me to direct payment to be made; upon this subject I must refer him in the first place to Lingen, because my course hitherto has been to refer all such demands to the Hereditary Prince of Orange, and to furnish money to the Prince, only leaving to his discretion the application of it; in his absence from Lingen I presume that he has entrusted that subject to Fagel and to Colonel Bentineck, and therefore I shall desire Charles Bentineck to endeavour to put it in that course; and I shall at the same time tell him that, if any difficulty arises at Lingen, I will give him a draft upon you for the value of those arms, if he will undertake for the fair purchase and the proper application of them.

“As to the demand for men, all I can do is, as soon as I arrive at the Texel, to endeavour to impress upon the commander-in-chief the extreme importance which seems to me to belong to this diversion, and the great advantage which can probably be obtained by it at very small cost of numbers, and, as I have reason to think, at very little hazard. In truth, I am so much impressed with this object that, if I did not know that you depended upon my immediately going to the Texel, and if I was not anxious to learn what you have already written to me there of new instructions in my new functions, I should have been tempted to have written to the Duke of York and to the Prince of Orange to urge as powerfully as I could this separate expedition; and I could easily have imagined that I should have been of more use in concerting those measures with His Serene Highness than I am likely to be in the narrow circle of the headquarters of Martin's Vonck. It cannot have escaped you, I am sure, how delicate and how difficult is the ground on which you place me when you put me in English headquarters, where naturally I cannot hope for any influence in military opinions, and should not perhaps allow myself to look for any. Whenever the scale of military operations is extended enough to give scope to any political questions in the country, whenever we approach to the semblance of a Stadtholderiat government, I know in some degree how I can make myself useful, and the good disposition of the Hereditary Prince towards me gave me great means of being able to work with him, to which I still look with good expectation; but in a narrow point of North Holland, where there can be no questions except as to the military operations which the commander-in-chief may pursue, you cannot avoid seeing how little I can expect to have or to exercise any influence whatever. I know enough of the difficulties which English ministers have always found at the headquarters of a combined army; but there at least they could speak with authority to powers whom they subsidized, or to Courts with whom their Sovereigns were in alliance; but in this instance the difficulties are increased a thousand-fold, because to the commander of an English army who corresponds with the English Government, it is not easy for an English minister to hope that he can speak with influence and effect. Having, however, allowed myself to state to you the strong sense which I have of the awkwardness of my situation, while things remain as they are, I must add that I am nevertheless anxious to get there, because I trust they cannot long continue as they are. If I was a better seaman than I am I should go to the Texel only in the hope of bringing the Prince of Orange away with me to the neighbourhood of this place; but sick and helpless as sea makes me, I still think that so much real advantage is to be gained by this expedition, that I believe I would make more than one or two such voyages to bring it about, if I could feel confident that my voyages would produce it.

“I have written to Stamford to pursue the project of a correspondence with France as proposed by La Palue. I do not know your Fagel's reasons for wishing Stamford at present to be kept back, but I acquiesce, though very unwillingly, for I think at this moment he could be of infinite use. The last time I heard from him, he talked to me in his letter of the inutility of his services, and recommended that the English government should no longer put themselves to that unnecessary expense ; I assured him for answer that I would recommend no such measure, and that the opinion held of him would not allow of any such decision. I wish he was employed more actively and more prominently, and whatever may have been the jealousy entertained by the Prince of his governor, I do not fear the consequences of it.

"The weather is milder, but the wind south-west, and I am still grumbling and fretting at seeing 40,000 troops, such as are at the Helder, still blocked up by the Gallo-Batavians."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 2. Harley Street.—"Je vous dois dire avec ma franchise acoutumée, et pour vous seul, qu'ayant parlé avec le secrétaire du Général Herman, qui a été présent à l'affaire du dix-neuf, et cet homme m'ayant expliqué le tout avec beaucoup de sincérité, j'ai vue, à mon grand regret, que tout le désordre dont parle le Times a existé vraiment sans aucune exagération. Je vous supplie donc de supprimer ma plainte officielle, et de la regarder come non avenue. Je dois rendre la justice au Duc d'York qu'il a menagé dans sa relation la réputation de nos troupes, parmi les quelles bien d'officiers devroient être punis."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, October 2. Cleveland Row.—"J'ai bien reconnu dans votre billet cette franchise et droiture que j'aime, et que je respecte du fond de mon âme. Je crois certainement que le désordre ne peut être attribué qu'à la faute d'une partie des officiers ; mais j'espère que cette faute aura déjà été bien réparée. Des lettres reçues ce matin annoncent que l'attaque aura eu lieu le vingt-huit, le tems orageux l'ayant nécessairement fait remettre jusqu'à ce jour. Nous en saurons le résultat aujourd' hui ou demain.

"Les généraux avoient les meilleures espérances, et l'armée étoit en good spirits." Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 3. Harley Street.—"Je n'ai pas pu faire traduire plus tôt les ordres de l'Empereur à moi et au Général Herman que votre courier m'a apporté avant hièr. Celui qui étoit adressé à Herman je l'ai ouverte, parcequ'étent prisonier, et ne pouvant exécuter rien de ce qui lui est prescrit, j'ai voulu voir n'y-a-t-il pas là quelque chose où mon concour seroit nécessaire. Vous verez que tout ce qui nous est prescrit l'a été en conséquence de vos demandes, et que si nos déclarations eussent été faites au même tems que les vôtres, elles ne seroient pas déplacées peut-être ; mais, à présent, je doute fort de l'à-propos. Au reste, je suivrai vos conseils, et je viendrai les prendre chez vous demain à l'heure que vous m'indiquerez.

“Je suis tout honteux de vous dire qu'on est si ignorant chez nous de vos loix et de votre constitution, qu'on m'ordonne de demander que vous ordoniez à un négociant Anglais d'aller se présenter à Petersbourg pour comparaître devant un tribunal pour une affaire qu'il a contre un autre Anglais, et un Russe. Je sais la réponse que vous me ferez, et je ne viendrai chez vous que pour entendre ce que je sais déjà d'avance sur ce sujet.”

MILITARY STRENGTH OF FRANCE.

Force effective par arme et par armée d'après l'état remis au Directoire par le Ministre de la Guerre le 3rd October, 1799.

This statement reduces the strength of the French armies to 237,000 men.

MAJOR-GENERAL EYRE COOTE to LIEUTENANT-GENERAL
SIR CHARLES GREY, K.C.B.

1799, October 4. Bergen.—“Most sincerely do I congratulate you upon the glorious day and victory gained by us on the 2nd instant. At day-break I marched from Petten, having in the night been moved from Schagen to support the Russians. A corps of 8,000 British marched under Sir Ralph Abercromby along the shore towards Egmont. Colonel McDonald's reserve moved along the sand hills. My brigade upon the left of the Russians, who were to march along the road towards Schorell. Lord Chatham's upon my left, and General Burrand's to proceed round by Warmenhousin to attack Shouldam. Sir J. Pulteney with 2,000 Russians, Prince William's, and General Don's brigade to remain as a reserve—in our lines. This was the disposition. General Essen, commander of the Russians, would not however move from the Sloper Dyke until I had cleared the way for him by turning a three gun battery at the end of the Dyke, and, instead of sending one battalion of mine into the sand hills, he would not march until four battalions were placed there to cover his right flank. In short, though contrary to the general disposition and arrangement of His Royal Highness, I was obliged to comply or the Russians would not move. About seven in the morning we got into action in the sand hills. The Russians in an immense column moved on the road upon our left. The battle lasted until three or towards four in the afternoon, at which time, the enemy, all French in the sand hills and in very great force, say 7,000 men, were completely repulsed. We at that time were nearly as far advanced upon the sand hills as Egmont, and consequently in the rear of Bergen and Alkmaar. We remained upon our arms for the night of the 2nd, exhausted completely. In the morning of the 3rd we found Bergen evacuated, and which town I took possession of, and proceeded within a mile and a half of Alkmaar, sent a short note to the Duke to say I conceived it had been also evacuated, and a detachment of Guards took possession of it last night. The Russians who had advanced no further than Shorel were then ordered to Egmont and Sir Ralph Abercomby took possession of Egmont upon Zee. Thus we are at present stationed, and I suppose we shall proceed this evening towards Beverwick, where I expect another battle. The position is narrow and strong, we must take it, nothing can resist the bravery of these British soldiers. The Russians give us no assistance whatever. I had a company of Russian yangers with me; they all lay down, officers and all, and declared they had no more ammunition. I, suspecting them, opened their pouches and found them nearly full, and their arms in perfect order. The corps principally engaged were the Queen's, 27, 29, and 85; my brigade, 25, Royals, 92, 49, 79; General Moore's 55, 23, Light Infantry and Grenadiers; Colonel McDonald's 31st, three battalions 4th Regiment; Lord Chatham's; and I believe the Grenadiers of the Guards.

"Moore's and McDonald's formed part of Sir Ralph's corps, and were in the sand hills upon my right.

"Lord Chatham's and mine with Burrard's were under Lieutenant General Dundas, who behaved exceedingly well, was clear and distinct. I have lost 212 men, officers included, killed wounded and missing. The other corps British have suffered considerably, say near 1,000 in all; the 92nd I am told in particular, General Moore and Huntley wounded. Our cavalry upon the right were conspicuous at a critical moment, charged and prevented the loss of two guns.

"I had two guns attached to me which, upon entering the sand hills I left in the road, and have never seen them since, as they joined the Russian column. I thought it much better not to wait for them, and proceeded with our small arms and bayonets.

"I have given you in a hurry a long detail, tolerably correct I believe. The business has been well done, and by sending back an immense force of British to our right and to fight in the sand hills, the left of the French army was completely turned. About five last evening the Duke of York entered the town of Bergen, met me in the street, and said he never could sufficiently thank my brigade and myself. He is at least satisfied, and, I dare say, will do the whole British justice, and who well deserve the thanks of their country. I confess I did not expect so great success. Dash, Dash, Dash was the cause of our victory." Copy.

COUNT W. G. BENTINCK-RHOON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 6. Helder.—"J'espère que vous ne m'aurez pas pris de mauvaise part, que je ne vous aye pas écrit plutôt, mais j'ai eu tant à faire, pour aller et venir prendre des informations de tout, que j'ai eu peu de temps à moi; outre cela j'ai voulu être au fait de tout, et pouvoir vous mander quelque chose d'intéressant de la situation des affaires icy. En attendant j'espère que vous aurez été content du détail que j'ai envoyé à M. le Greffier Fagel. D'abord, à mon arrivée icy, j'ai été chez Monseigneur le Duc de York qui m'a parfaitement bien reçu, et m'a promis de me donner une commission que je n'ai cependant pas encore reçue. Ensuite j'ai été chez le Prince Héritaire, et vous avez vu par la lettre de M. Fagel, que je n'avois pas lieu d'être tout-à-fait content de lui d'abord ; mais la chose est fort bien allée après cela, et son Altesse Sérénissime m'a entièrement remis le soin de la marine, et des mattelots qui étoient au Texel. En conséquence de quoi je me suis directement mis à l'ouvrage, et le commandant Anglois, le commodore Lawford, m'a directement remis tous les vaisseaux de guerre qui se trouvoient dans le Nieuve Diep, que j'ai directement mis en commission, d'après les ordres du Prince Héritaire, savoir le Hector de 44, la Hellui de 32, le Valk, Venus, et Minerve de 26, et le Duyjsse de 58. Mais le manque de tout ce qui est nécessaire, et que je n'ai pu trouver jusqu'à présent que peu à peu, et dans tous les coins du petit pays que nous possédons, m'a empêché jusqu'à ce moment de finir cette affaire avec la célérité que j'aurois désiré, ayant encore jusqu'à ce jour été obligé de laisser les mattelots dans l'isle de Texel. J'ai aussi été le 26 Septembre chez l'amiral Mitchell, lequel je ne scaurois assez recommander à votre excellence, ayant été, on ne peut plus, content de son zèle, de son activité, de l'amitié et de la loyauté de toute sa conduite, tant à l'égard des habitants, que vis à vis de moi.

"J'ai alors, à sa réquisition, pris possession, au nom du Prince d'Orange, de tous les bureaux, arsenaux, et comptoirs de l'Amirauté, et de la compagnie des Indes, à Enkhuisen, et à Medenblic, et mis autant que possible un ordre provisoire pour empêcher la confusion, et procurer à l'Amiral, et à la flotte, tous les secours que les petits moyens que nous avons encore ont pu permettre.

"A mon retour icy le 29 Septembre, je suis allé le lendemain, le 1 Octobre, au quartier-général à Schager Brug, et y ayant appris l'intention d'attaquer l'ennemi le lendemain, j'y suis resté pour assister à cette affaire ; qui, étant bien combinée, à eue tout le succès possible, m'a faite un sensible plaisir, ayant eu la satisfaction d'en être le spectateur de très près, ayant suivi les colonnes, et été près des batteries qui faisoient un feu d'enfer sur les François ; mais, malheureusement, n'ayant pas de chevaux, j'ai été obligé d'aller à pied, ce qui étoit très fatigant, et m'a empêché d'aller aussi loin que j'aurois bien voulu ; de sorte que je ne puis pas vous en faire un rapport aussi détaillé que je désirerois. En attendant, je vous ferai part de ce que j'ai vu.

"Le soir du 2 Octobre toutes les troupes ont eu l'ordre de porter tous leurs bagages au quartier-général de leurs régiments, et on leur a laissé le choix de garder leur capotte ou leur couverture de laine, et de prendre pour deux jours de viande et de pain. Vers les trois heures tout s'est mis en le 2, avec la plus grande tranquillité ; le Général Abercromby, avec 10,000 hommes, s'est mis en colonne par Petten sur le bord de la mer ; le Général Coote avec une colonne a pris par les Dunes ; les Russes ont débouchés de Petten le long des Dunes, en s'étendant sur la prairie entre les Dunes et le Zÿpe, par les villages de Camp, Groet et Schoerle. Derrière eux en reserve la brigade du Général Dundas, sur la droite du canal qui va de l'écluse du Zÿpe à Schoerledam, où on avoit fait un pont de batteau à 100 pas de la ditte écluse. A Crabbendam, une reserve de Russes, et un régiment Anglois en face de Schoerledam sur la digue à gauche du canal qui mène par Schoerledam à Alkmaar. Sur le canal même 6 bateaux plats avec des canons de 24lb, armés de matelots Anglois, et commandés par le Capitaine Popenham [Popham]. Sur l'aile gauche le général Sir Murray Pultney et la brigade du General Don. Voilà notre position, autant que j'ai pu observer. Les François avoient tous leurs chasseurs, et tous leurs tirailleurs et l'infanterie légère dans les Dunes, une forte batterie au pied des hauteurs dans le village de Schoerle et à Schoerledam, et une entre d'eux ; et en arrière une forte position de batteries et d'abbattis, dans le Bois de Bergen. Outre cela nous avons tres fort retranché notre position de Zÿpe, de sorte qu'en cas d'accident on avoit une retraite sûre, et une position pour le moment inexpugnable.

“Voilà les positions respectives, autant que j'ai pu observer. A 6 heures du matin le feu a commencé avec les Russes dans la plaine, et au but des Dunes, et ils ont avec le plus grand ordre possible poussés les François pied à pied par le feu d'artillerie jusqu'au village de Schoerle ; et se sont maintenus en faisant un feu terrible en face de ce village, jusqu'à ce que le Général Coote fut venu à bout de netoyer les Dunes, où les François se sont deffendus avec la plus grande opiniâtreté, et ont longtemps maintenu le terrain, en se deffendant d'une hauteur à l'autre ; mais enfin ont été obligé de céder à la bravoure des Anglois, et surtout du 52^{me} régiment Eccossois, qui ont culbuttés quatre fois les François à l'arme blanche. Enfin les François se sont retirés dans les Dunes jusqu'à la hauteur du village du Schoerle ; alors la réserve du Général Dundas, qui étoit formée en collonne sur le chemin du Zyper Sluis à Groet, s'est avancé, et a pris par le village de Groet le long des Dunes, sur la droite des Russes, qui se fut portés plus sur la gauche entre Schoerledam et Schoerle : ce qui a alors forcés les François d'abandonner le village de Schoerle, où ils ont mis le feu pour couvrir leur retraite ; les tirailleurs François s'étant postés derrière le dos d'un ravin, et d'une hauteur à la droite du village, où ils se sont encore maintenus pendant une heure et demie ; mais enfin, vers les 11½ heures les Dunes étoient netoyées, les Anglois maîtres des hauteurs, et attaquant à force du coté de Bergen, et par la communication entièrement ouverte avec le Général Abercrombÿ, qui, pendant ce temps là, s'étoit porté en avant sur Egmont, où il avoit appuyé son aile droite, et joint sa gauche avec les Généraux Coote et Dundas. Pendant ce temps-là les chaloupes sur le canal attaquoient de front la batterie de Schoerledam, le régiment

Anglois en reserve à Crabbendam attaque sur la digue à la gauche avec un obusier, et les Russes de la plaine sur le flanc droit du même village, que les François durent abandonner en y mettant le feu ; de sorte qu'à deux heures, les François avoient été chassés de toutes leurs positions de leurs avant postes, et étoient en retraite sur leurs positions principales du Coedyk, Langendyk, et Bergen. Ces postes étoient extrêmement forts, et on s'est occupé à les cannoner jusqu'à la nuit, mais sans avoir pu les entamer, et les Anglois proposerent d'abord d'emporter la position de Bergen avec la bayonette durant la nuit ; mais on a abandonné cette idée, parceque les troupes, et surtout les Russes, étoient tres fatigués, ayant eu un très mauvais terrain ; de sorte que vers le soir à huit heures on a gardé ses positions, et le Général Abercromby se trouvoit sur le flanc des François, sa droite appuyée vers la mer sur Egmont, et la gauche en communication avec le centre de l'armée.

"Si, malheureusement, les François n'avoient pas reçu la nuit de l'attaque un renfort de quelques milles hommes, qui se sont opposés au Général Abercromby, et qui l'ont obligé de se battre tout le long du jour, sans interruption, on auroit culbutté et tourné les François, et l'on seroit entré ce soir à Alkmaar.

"Vers le soir, un régiment de chasseurs à cheval, qui venoit en deux mois de marche de la Vendée, ont attaqué nos troupes, et s'étoient emparés de sept à huit pièces de canon, mais les dragons Anglois les ont tout de suite chargés et repris toutes les pièces, mis les chasseurs en fuite, et fait quelques prisonniers. Le lendemain on a fait quelques préparatifs pour attaquer de nouveau, lorsque vers le midy, on a reçu la nouvelle que les ennemis avoient abandonnés Alkmaar et Bergen, et se retiroient en grande hate vers le Beverwyk ; de sorte que hiér-au-soir le Duc de York, et le Prince Héréditaire d'Orange sont entrés dans Alkmaar, et l'on se prépare à poursuivre les ennemis. L'aile gauche n'a rien pu faire parceque l'ennemi avoit mis le Heere, Hingerwaard, et tout le pays sous l'eau. Les François, à ce que l'on dit, ont perdu beaucoup de monde, et de notre côté peu de morts, mais assez de blessés, dont cependant peu de très graves. Le général Moore a deux blessures dans les chairs, une dans la cuisse avec laquelle il est resté encore deux heures à cheval, et l'autre à la joue. Le collonel Mylord Huntley a une balle à l'épaule, le fils du général Abercromby est blessé à la main. Un capitaine Anglois tué, et quelques officiers blessés. Le Quartier-Maitre-Général Anstruther a eu un cheval tué, et a presque été pris prisonnier. Deux majors Russes, et un capitaine tué, et deux officiers blessés.

"Du reste la perte ne peut être grande d'après les rapports, parceque tout s'est décidé par l'artillerie, et que nous avions la supériorité du calibre.

"Environ quarante déserteurs Bataves sont venu hiér, et une soixante de prisonniers François, et un Lieutenant-Collonel Maurice. Voilà la relation de ce que j'ai vu, et que j'ose croire pouvoir affirmer ; j'aurois pu voir davantage, si je n'avois pas été obligé de me retirer du champ de bataille vers les trois heures, tant par lassitude, que pour ne pas être surpris par la nuit, que ayant encore quatre lieux (ou 12 miles) à faire avant que d'être de retour chez nous.

“ Du reste il n'y a qu'une voix générale sur toute la conduite de l'armée Angloise, et elle est au dessus de toutes louanges à tous égards, tant pour sa bravoure héroïque sans aucune exception, que pour sa bonne conduite, sa discipline, et sa loyauté vis à vis de habitants ; et il n'y a jusqu'à présent qu'une voix à sa louange, et aucun sujet le plus léger de plainte, till to the last drummer, they behave all like gentleman : ce qui me fait un plaisir incroyable.

“ Les Russes ne sont pas si bien du côté de la discipline et de l'ordre, et laissant partout où ils passent des traces, plus ou moins saillantes, de leur passage et séjour. En quelque façon ils sont excusables, parcequ'ils ne sont pas traités comme les Anglois. On leur a offert de leur donner aussi de la viande ; mais le General Hermann (qui a été pris) l'a refusé, de sorte qu'ils en prennent où ils peuvent ; et il me semble qu'il seroit fort bon, puisqu'ils sont à la solde de l'Angleterre, que le Duc de York reçut un ordre de devoir les traiter comme les Anglois, parcequ'allors on pourroit aussi les tenir à la même discipline que le reste de l'armée Angloise, et les punir quand ils sont des désordres ; ce qui est très essentiel, parcequ'ils ruineront le pays si cela continue ainsi, diminueront par là le bon effet que la bonne conduite de l'armée Angloise fait sur l'esprit des habitants. J'espère que vous me pardonnerez la liberté que je prends de soumettre cette considération à vos lumières.

“ J'ose encore vous prier de vouloir bien faire renouveler à l'Amirauté les ordres pour l'embarquement de mes chevaux sans lesquels je ne puis rien faire icy, les chemins n'étant pas praticables pour des voitures ; de sorte que quoique le quartier-général n'étoit qu'à 16 miles d'icy, je perdois trois jours chaque fois que je devois y aller (jugez donc à présent qu'il en est à trente miles) de sorte que je ne puis y aller si souvent que je devrois, et par là je ne puis être aussi utile que je voudrois, n'y remplir le tout de votre confiance en moi. Je ne sçais ce qui y manque, mais il est déjà arrivé, et encore avant-hier, un grand convoi où il y avoit plusieurs chevaux qui sûrement ne sont d'aucune utilité à l'affaire, tandis que je suis paralysé par le manque de moyens de me transporter à un endroit où je dois être. J'ai aussi pris la liberté de tirer sur Mr Hammond, étant au bout de mon argent, et on ne peut rien avoir icy qu'au poid de l'or, et encore pas toujours ; ainsi que j'espère que vous voudrez bien donner les ordres à cet égard.

“ Du reste, je ne puis finir celle-cy sans insister encore sur une diversion en Frise, et surtout sur la Zeelande, car les François se retireront sur la frontière, et pilleront tout ce qu'ils pourront prendre avec eux, et la Zeelande est le seul endroit par où on peut leur couper la retraite, de même qu'à nos gens, qui partiront avec les caisses et tout ce qu'ils pourront prendre. Dans ce moment il me vient un officier avec la nouvelle que l'amiral Mitchell a pris le Lemmert en Frise, et qu'il s'y est fortifié.

Postscript. “ Dans ce moment une nouvelle du quartier-général qui dit que l'on avancera aujourd'hui et demain sur l'ennemi; les avant postes Anglois sont a Heyloo, et ceux des François à Limmen.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 7. Harley Street.—“ Je vous renvoi ces papiers avec bien de reconnaissance. La lettre du Duc d'York est parfaite.

“ S'il est vrai que Herman a eu l'infâme bassesse de calomnier vos troupes come s'ils ne l'avoient pas soutenu, j'aurai pour lui autant de mépris que j'avois d'estime; mais j'aime à croire que c'est Brune qui répand ces bruits pour metre la désunion entre les deux nations. J'espère, à présent, que nous enverrons demain vos couriers, et j'espère surtout que l'ennemi sera chassé de la Holande. Cette perssevérence à renouveler l'attaque fait honneur au Duc d'York. C'est un grand vertu en toute chose, et surtout à la guerre; c'est elle qui fait triompher de tout.

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 7. Wangen.—“ I have little to add to my public despatches but my earnest and anxious wish that no time may be lost in making such arrangements with the Court of Petersburg as experience has shewn to be absolutely necessary before the Russian army can take the field against the French.

“ Without an increase of pay neither officers nor men can subsist in these countries but by pillage and plunder, by which they must infallibly in the end render the cause of the allies odious. Without a commissariat and without magazines, of which they are in total want, they can make no progress anywhere, and they must have starved in Switzerland had they been obliged to pass their winter there.

“ Without a staff composed entirely, in the first instance, of foreign officers, and without foreign officers attached permanently to every corps, this army cannot possibly act by itself, but must be dispersed in separate bodies among the different Austrian armies.

“ I am aware that all this is very delicate matter for the ear of the Emperor, but truth must be spoken on this occasion or we shall all be undone. Fortunately, the Russian officers, in this army at least, seem now persuaded of their own ignorance and insufficiency, and are themselves calling out for foreign officers to command them.

“ I trust this is a subject upon which your Lordship may speak out with Count Woronzow. I have not hesitated to do so with M. de Stackelberg, who arrived just in time to witness the defeat and disgrace of his countrymen; and I have found him quite in the same sentiments with myself, though humiliated when he acknowledged it.

"The Condé army is ready at hand if the Emperor will be but magnanimous enough to make a proper use of it. There are also, at this moment, some excellent staff-officers in the Austrian army who, disgusted with the manner in which they have been treated or neglected by their own Government, would readily embrace any advantageous offer that might be made them.

"It seems an essential part in the great system of politics now adopted by his Majesty's Government, putting the war against republican France for a moment out of the case, that the Russian army should be put on such a footing as to keep either Berlin or Vienna in awe; and certainly a more favourable opportunity of arriving at that desirable end can never happen. How it is to be taken advantage of it is for your Lordship alone to say. I only hope and trust most earnestly that it will not be neglected.

"I am still very uneasy about the marshal, though I think it difficult, indeed scarcely possible that his retreat should be absolutely cut off. He has completely lost his head, and in the Mutton—that was as bad as Korsakoff at Zurich.

"Your Lordship might have collected from some of my late despatches that I had a very bad opinion of this great operation, which was in fact too vast and too complicated for anyone to manage. My friend Tinseau, whom I sent some time since to Suwarow with some other officers acquainted with the country, had the same bad opinion of the measure with myself. It failed also precisely there where I thought it would, namely, before Zurich. I always thought that the marshal would succeed from the time that I knew how powerfully he would be supported by the Austrians from the Grisons.

"Notwithstanding all these disasters, and bad as the Russian army is, I am persuaded, provided Suwarow escape with his corps, that, if the whole business be left to the Arch-Duke, he will conquer Switzerland before the winter. I am confident that he has force enough to enable him to achieve this enterprise, great as it is. But then, who is to guard it during the winter? Certainly nothing less than an army, and nothing but an army of Austrians.

"The Russians may be made great use of in the conquest, but I would not trust them to guard the chateau of a bailiff. I shall write to Lords Minto and Mulgrave on this subject to-morrow."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 7. Emden.—"The perverseness of the unchanging south-west wind having still kept me here, I have endeavoured to turn my involuntary stay here to the best account I could by quickening and exciting our friends in Groningen and Friesland. We are, I hope, at the eve of concluding some arrangement with the 4 or 500 Waldeckers who are now in garrison at Delfzyl and at Niew Schank, to surrender to us and garrison for us those two fortresses; if, on the one hand, I venture in return for this service to accede to their demand of being taken into the pay of Great Britain, on the other hand I shall insist, as a sine qua non, that they first become in those two places our garrisons at our orders, instead of those of Gallo-Batavians; if they will surrender Delfzyl to us, I think there is great reason to hope that we can put force enough with them into it to keep it till a small force shall cross over from North Holland, and there may be a good chance that the Orange flag flying in that fortress may put a little better heart into the other parts of these provinces. In addition to our hopes from the Waldeckers, Captain Winthrop has undertaken to cut out the guardship and the six gun-boats which make the naval protection of it, and if he succeeds, as he is confident he will, there will be a good naval protection to the fort as well as to the garrison which is left in it; I heartily wish we had but a stray transport or two with 4 or 500 men, and I really believe the thing could be done without the treaty of Waldeck; but we will do for the best, and at least I shall be saved from dying of spleen and impatience here, by watching our little projects while the winds keep me from mixing in those of greater importance. I continue however to regret most bitterly the waste which is made of the Hereditary Prince in tacking him on to the rear of an English army, instead of giving him some small detached force to enable him to rouse his countrymen from their slumbers, and build upon his own exertions a personal reputation which will be useful and necessary to the future government of the country. Whether his abrupt departure from Lingén prevented him from leaving sufficient directions with Fagel and with Bentinck, or whether they are reluctant to act of their own accord, I know not; but the truth is that very little is done, either at Lingén or anywhere else, by the leading persons of the Prince's party. I must, however, do Charles Bentinck the justice to say that he himself is full of zeal and industry, and now that I have brought him more into contact with the Privy Council at Lingén, I hope that communication will be maintained with better advantage.

"In the midst of these speculations I am not a little disturbed by the letter which I have just received from General Stamford, because it shows me, from Zastrow's authority, how far Haugwiz is advanced in his original Prussian project of fighting with our arms and money for his benefit and for the advantage of his system; I will not believe that it is possible that the tardiness of our progress, and the stationary position of our army on ground where the Gazette tells us it cannot act, is to be attributed to our mixing in the discussion of all the proposals which Brune shall dictate to us through the Batavian Directory; I trust we cannot be in such a state of duplicity to our enemies, but yet it is so impossible for me to account for our inactivity on any other principle, that I am reluctantly forced to entertain these apprehensions, and to give more attention than I would to the prevailing reports that we are treating instead of fighting with the Gallo-Batavians. When I express these apprehensions I confine them however entirely to the councils of the Helder, for I do not imagine that they can reach to the councils of St. James's where you are too well versed in the ways of Haugwiz to regard the overtures of Voss or those of Mollerus. With this additional anxiety upon my mind you will judge that my stay here, where I can know nothing, is a pretty high trial of my good humour ; and there are times in which I am not in perfect charity with you for not making Hammond send a duplicate dispatch to Harward, from which I could have learnt here the true and real state of things, and whether we have 40,000 men in Holland to make peace or to make war with the Gallo-Batavian Directors and generals. I know that you will defend yourself by saying that you did not foresee the probability of a violent south-west wind arresting my progress for so long a course ; but yet, as that improbable event has happened, you must be content to undergo the ill-humour which arises from the complete ignorance in which I find myself.

"The course of every moment furnishes some new proof of the bad effects of our stationary position, and I should not deal fairly with you if I concealed from you the real alarm which I entertain upon that subject from the impression which I see is produced by it; there is already a very current report that the English Government, finding themselves disappointed in their just expectation of assistance from the interior, have already begun to take measures for retiring, and will satisfy themselves with the possession of the Dutch fleet without pursuing any farther the original object of their expedition ; judge too of my surprize when I find the Prince of Orange's Bentinck writing this news from Lingen in a letter of the 6th instant, in which he states his belief that this is true, and describes it as a natural and reasonable conduct for us to pursue ; to this letter he adds that they have heard nothing whatever at Lingen since his letter of the 23rd ultimo. What can be the reason of this universal stagnation of military operations and of political correspondence, is really an enigma which I know not how to solve ; if, however, it should be possible that this letter should reach you before I shall be able to reach the Texel, I do conjure you to represent upon the certain ruin of all our hopes from the interior, if no detachment or diversion whatever is made to encourage them. I talk myself out of breath in endeavouring to urge here the necessity of their acting manfully without waiting for the arrival of English troops, because I cannot feel sure that they will arrive, while I am ignorant of all that is intended to be done with them ; but to you I cannot scruple to ask what possible doubt or hesitation they can have to send 2 or 3,000 men across the Zuyder Zee, when the leading persons, such as Van der Haar, Humalda, and Charles Bentinck, engage in the most direct and solemn assurances that such a force would instantly secure the two provinces of Groningen and of Friesland ?

"They have answered Charles Bentinck from Lingen that the Hereditary Prince's present funds will not allow of the necessary expenses, and therefore that application must be made by His Serene Highness to me for larger funds ; I naturally answered that I had never heard one word upon the subject from the Hereditary Prince, but that I would converse upon it as soon as I could see him ; and meantime I have told Charles Bentinck that our Waldeck treaty shall not fail if it depends only upon those funds.

“ These are the natural perversities of this business ; if the troops act by diversion all will do well, but let them not stand still to die of a Dutch ague.”

Postscript. October 8.—“ I send you a copy of Stamford's letter of the 29th ultimo and of my answer. I likewise enclose the copy of a letter from Van der Gros to Mollerus which I received from Lingen ; I do not know that my numerous enclosures are always interesting, but as you may burn them as fast as you please, it is better to send too many than too few.”

Enclosure No. 1.

GENERAL DE STAMFORD TO THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, September 29. Brunswick.—“ Je commençois, je vous l'avoue, à m'affliger sérieusement de votre long silence, quand je reçus votre aimable lettre du 21 de ce mois ; car, comme je vous supposois mieux au courant des événements politiques et militaires qui se passent en Hollande que vous ne l'avez été d'après ce que vous me dites, je m'imaginois que, tout allant peut-être de ce côté-là au gré de vos vœux, vous n'aviez guères le tems de vous occuper d'un homme dont vous ne pouviez vous souvenir sans vous rappeler en même tems cinq mois, qui, sans doute, n'ont pas été le tems le plus agréable que vous ayiez passé en votre vie. Je vois que je vous ai fait tort, et mon cœur, qui vous est bien sincèrement et bien tendrement attaché, vous en demande pardon. Mais si votre lettre m'a entièrement rassuré à l'égard de mes craintes injustes, la lenteur des opérations en Hollande, et la manière peu prononcée dont se montrent les habitans envers leurs libérateurs, ne me rassurent pas également contre la crainte que j'éprouve par rapport aux suites que peut avoir un pareil état de choses s'il ne change pas bientôt. Cependant, le mauvais succès que nous avons eu dans la journée du 19 ne m'a pas découragé un seul instant ; ce que je trouve de très fâcheux dans cet événement c'est la malheur arrivé au général Herman ; mais, ce qui seroit infiniment plus fâcheux encore, ce seroit la confirmation de ce que rapportent les Gazettes Hollandaises, savoir que les Russes attribueront leur défaite aux Anglais. Ah ! qu'on prévienne par tous les moyens imaginables la désunion entre les généraux et les troupes des deux nations ! Tout iroit sens dessus dessous, si la disharmonie venoit à se mettre entr'elles.

“ A présent qu'on est maître du Zuyder Zee, and que toutes les troupes du débarquement sont arrivées en Hollande, je ne saurois m'empêcher de désirer qu'on pensât à faire passer un corps de 8 à 10 mille hommes dans la province de Frise où l'ennemi n'a point de troupes, et où les places sont sans défense.

Le corps pourroit y arriver par mer en 7 ou 8 heures de tems, tandis qu'il faudroit à l'ennemi 7 ou 8 jours pour y porter des secours, supposé qu'il en ait dont il puisse disposer. Si une fois on étoit établi dans cette province et celle de Groningue, avec quelle facilité ne protégeroit-on pas une insurrection contre l'ennemi dans les provinces de Gueldre and d'Overyssel, où les habitans ne remueront pas aussi long tems qu'ils verront l'armée Anglo-Russe ne s'avancer que péniblement vers eux, entre et à travers les canaux et sur les digues de la Hollande.

" M. le Duc de Brunswick est de mon opinion quant à la diversion dont je viens de parler ; mais comme il peut exister nombre de circonstances qui empêchent de l'effectuer, et que nous ignorons parfaitement, je vous prie de me regarder ce que je viens de vous dire à ce sujet que comme une idée jettée au hazard, et qui mériteroit peut-être d'être pesée par ceux qui se trouvent sur les lieux mêmes.

" Depuis votre départ de Berlin et mon retour à Brunswick ma correspondance avec M. le Duc, tant de vive-voix que par écrit, a été plus animée que jamais. On accueille avec bonté mes avis aujourd'hui qu'il n'en est plus tems. Vous en jugerez par les copies ci-jointes d'une lettre et d'un mémoire qui me furent remis de la part de ce Prince à mon arrivée en cette ville. Depuis son retour de Potzdam, où le Roi l'avoit invité pour assister au manœuvres, j'ai eu l'honneur d'avoir avec lui un fort long entretien, dans lequel il m'a dit que son mémoire n'a pas fait la moindre impression sur l'esprit du Roi, et que Sa Majesté, tout en convenant de la solidité des argumens y contenus, et en approuvant le motif et le zèle qui le lui ont dicté, n'en demeure pas moins persuadée que le rôle passif auquel elle se condamne, est le seul qui puisse convenir à la Prusse, dans les circonstances actuelles. Sans doute que Sa Majesté trouve plus agréable et commode de jouer la guerre sur les colines autour de Potzdam, que de la faire avec les puissances, qui, depuis les Apenines jusqu'au nord de la Hollande, se battent pour conserver aux rois leur dignité, leur puissance, et leur trône. Sunt, quos curriculo pulverem Olympicum collegisse jurat.

" Si l'intervale qui nous séparera lorsque vous serez au Texel, moi étant ici, vous déplaît, comme vous avez la bonté de me dire, je vous avouerai que je ne puis absolument pas me faire à l'idée de me trouver si éloigné de vous. Or, voici ce que j'ai imaginé pour racourcir cette distance. Malgré l'approche de la mauvaise saison qui ordinairement influe d'une manière nuisible sur ma santé chancelante, je me suis déterminé d'aller m'établir à Emden, où j'espère que je serai toléré sous ma qualité d'envoyé de Mönseigneur le Prince d'Orange près de sa Majesté Prussienne, et où je n'aurai pas à risquer d'être appelé dans l'autre monde, sans être expédié dans les formes par la faculté de médecine.

" Si donc vous me faites l'honneur m'écrire après la reception de cette lettre, veuillez m'adresser vos lettres à Emden poste restante. J'y serai, s'il plaît à Dieu, vers le 12 du mois prochain, car, avant de m'y rendre, je me propose d'aller voir M. de la Palue pour m'aboucher avec lui sur l'affaire dont vous me parlez dans votre lettre, afin de pouvoir vous en rendre un compte exact dans la première que j'aurai l'honneur de vous adresser." Copy.

Enclosure No. 2.

THOMAS GRENVILLE to GENERAL DE STAMFORD.

1799, October 7. Emden.—“Votre lettre du 29 Septembre m'a trouvé encore ici, toujours retenu par les vents contraires au port d'Emden, toujours ignorant les détails de ce qui se fait ou de ce qui ne se fait pas en Hollande, et toujours d'assez mauvaise humeur en voyant que les événemens ne se prononcent pas assez d'eux-mêmes, mais sont plutôt de nature à demander beaucoup d'explication et beaucoup de commentaire; mais si d'un côté je suis au désespoir de l'ignorance où je me trouve dans un moment si critique, sans lettres quelleconques de l'Angleterre ou de la Hollande, de l'autre côté, je voudrois au moins me persuader que l'état d'inactivité militaire et d'apathie populaire que je trouve tant de raisons à regretter, pourroit être motivé et justifié d'après des faits ou des considérations politiques que jusqu'ici j'ai entièrement ignoré, et que je ne saurai certainement pas avant mon arrivée au Texel. N'ayant donc encore que ces espérances vagues à me consoler, je suis très peu en état de vous offrir des renseignements sur tous les objets importans dont il s'agit actuellement dans la Hollande. La nécessité pourtant d'une diversion puissante me paroît d'un intérêt prépondérant, et je ne manquerai pas de l'appuyer autant que possible dès le premier moment de mon débarquement, quoique je ne crois pas qu'il soit possible qu'une pareille considération n'eût été déjà discutée à l'armée autant qu'elle le méritoit. Cependant je n'ai pas négligé de tâter le terrain pour pouvoir nous procurer dans la Frise et dans la Groningue une déclaration plus ouverte et décidée de la bonne disposition qu'on nous vante avec raison, à ce que je crois, dans ces deux provinces. On revient toujours à demander préalablement la soutien actuel et personnel des Anglois, et jusqu'ici je n'ai pas réussi à faire envisager les quarante mille hommes près d'Alkmaar comme un point d'appui assez sûr pour inviter la coopération de l'intérieur. Effectivement je crois que dans ces deux provinces il y a beaucoup de bonne disposition pour la bonne cause, mais aussi on a si peur des Francois et du gouvernement qu'ils exercent, que personne n'est disposé à se compromettre par une déclaration ouverte sans avoir un détachement Anglois dans son village; et on veut absolument pour la rétablissement de l'ancien gouvernement que personne ne soit exposé au danger qui existe toujours, qui existera toujours, dans les premiers momens de toute révolution dans tous les pays du monde. Avec tout cela il faut être juste, et je dois convenir que dans les personnes du Comte Charles Bentinck, de M. Vanderhaar, et M. Humalda à Leer, on trouve tout ce qu'on pourroit désirer de zèle et d'intelligence et d'activité; mais pour les mettre à même d'appeller leurs amis à entrer en lutte, et tomber sur leurs ennemis et les nôtres avec courage et succès, il faut absolument ou plus d'enthousiasme de la part des bien intentionnés, ou bien plus d'assistance effective de la part des Anglois dans ces provinces. C'est donc à ce dernier objet que je vais travailler autant que possible dès que j'aurai mis pied à terre au Helder, si avec 40,000 hommes qui sont déjà là, il y a place encore pour un de plus.

“Je n'ai rien reçu du Prince Héritaire d'Orange par la raison qu'il me croit toujours au moment d'arriver chès lui, et par conséquence, je ne connois pas la marche qu'il suit dans ce moment, ni la destination ultérieure qu'il se propose ; mais à moins que des motifs très puissants l'engagent à rester où il est, je serois très porté à croire que Son Altesse Sérénissime se mettroit à la tête de cette expédition dans la Groningue et dans la Frise avec grand avantage, et pour lui-même, et pour le bien public. A la tête des 2 ou 3,000 Hollandois qui sont déjà avec lui, renforcés par un corps d'Anglois et de Russes, il seroit bientôt dans le cas de dominer dans ces deux provinces, d'y former une armée Stadthoudérienne avec laquelle il entreroit dans les provinces d'Overysse et d'Utrecht pour se porter à la tête d'une force respectable, partout où sa présence pourroit devenir utile et nécessaire. J'aime à voir dans ce projet les moyens de le faire regarder chez lui comme le libérateur de son pays, et je désirerois qu'en travaillant à sa propre gloire, il se fit un fond de célébrité et de popularité, tel que les grands hommes ont toujours cherché à se faire dans les situations aussi critiques que celles où il se trouve ; c'est un beau moment pour lui que celui de la crise actuelle, et c'est aujourd'hui qu'il faut qu'il fasse parler de lui parmi ses compatriotes.

“J'ai lu avec beaucoup d'attention le mémoire du Duc de Brunswick, et s'il ne s'agissoit que d'une déclaration de ses opinions politiques, j'en serois assez content, puisqu'il n'y a rien dans ce mémoire qui ne me paroît pas être d'une vérité reconnue ; mais pendant que j'ai la conviction qu'avec plus d'énergie de sa part il pourroit donner à ces raisonnemens une valeur effective auprès du Roi de Prusse, je ne puis pas me satisfaire en lisant l'exposé qu'il a fait de ses sentimens au Roi. Les dangers du siècle où nous vivons ne permettent pas les ménagemens ni le réserve ni les demi-mesures ; et pendant que toute l'Europe est persuadée que l'activité du Roi de Prusse dépend entièrement de l'ardeur et du zèle que le Duc de Brunswick pourroit à tant de titres employer efficacement auprès de Sa Majesté pour cet objet, on se contentera difficilement de la lecture du mémoire que vous avez eû la bonté de me communiquer. Dans les crises si urgentes, le public ne connoît pas les degrés du plus ou du moins ; le Duc de Brunswick ne doit pas s'attendre à jouir impunément de toute sa célébrité passée ; il faut qu'il soit regardé aujourd'hui comme la personne la plus influente dans la monarchie Prussienne, et, par conséquent, comme celui dont il dépend absolument quel seroit le rôle que la Prusse va jouer. On croit qu'il ne tient qu'à lui et à la manière dont il pourroit se prononcer, pour porter l'esprit du Roi à adopter une conduite plus analogue à ses intérêts, et à sa gloire, et à la sûreté de son trône ; et quelque sévère que pourroit paroître un pareil jugement, on croira que le Duc de Brunswic n'a rien fait jusqu'à ce qu'il eut tout fait que sa célébrité, ses talens, et son influence parroissent exiger de sa part. Voilà, en peu des mots, mais avec beaucoup de sincérité, et avec ma franchise ordinaire, ce que je dois vous dire sur le mémoire du Duc.

“Je suis très sensible à la bonté et à l'amitié que vous me témoignez dans votre aimable lettre, et pour non que le vent contraire me retienne encore trois ou quatre jours, je ne pourrois me résoudre à ne pas attendre encore deux jours à Embden, s'il fut possible de cette manière que je pourrois espérer de vous revoir ici avant mon départ. J'aurois beaucoup plus à vous dire que ce que je puis me permettre de vous écrire, mais je vois, malgré moi, trop d'incertitude dans le moment de votre arrivée pour oser encore différer mon voyage, qui est peut-être plus nécessaire que jamais. Cependant, je travaille ici, et mes nouvelles, quant aux environs de ces provinces, sont encore meilleures cet après diné.”

LORD GRENVILLE TO SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH.

1799, October 8. Downing Street.—“On Count Panin's setting out for Petersburg to take upon him the duties of his new situation, he had the goodness to desire Mr. Garlike to transmit to me on his part the expression of sentiments by which I cannot but feel in the highest degree gratified and honoured. I transmit to you, under flying seal, a letter which I have written to that minister in return ; and I should be obliged to you if you would deliver it to him with such expressions as may best mark the sincere respect and regard which I entertain for his character, and distinguished talents.”

Enclosure.

LORD GRENVILLE TO COUNT PANIN.

1799, October 8. London.—“M. Garlike m'a bien communiqué les expressions, infiniment flatteuses pour moi, des sentimens dont vous voulez bien m'honorer. Les bontés que vous avez eu pour mon frère, et la confiance que vous m'avez témoigné à différentes reprises, m'ont paru autorizer en quelque sorte la liberté que je prens de vous écrire pour vous témoigner toute la satisfaction que j'ai ressentie en apprenant votre nomination aux hautes fonctions que vous allez remplir à Petersburg.

“Depuis le moment que le Roi m'a confié le département de ses affaires étrangères, je n'ai jamais cessé de travailler à l'établissement de la plus stricte union entre nos deux Cours, aidé par le zèle et les lumières de mon ami le Comte de Woronzow. J'ai eu le bonheur d'y réussir, et je regarde cet ouvrage comme plus assuré que jamais en voyant l'exécution des intentions justes et magnanimes du grand prince que vous servez, confiée à un homme dont je sais apprécier les talens et les vertus, quoique je n'aie pas été assez heureux pour le connoître personnellement.

“ Je demande à v[otre] E[xcellence] avec instance la continuation de sa confiance. Qu'elle soit sûre que je n'en abuserai jamais. Je m'estimerai toujours heureux de recevoir ses ordres, et je ne cesserai d'employer tous mes soins pour le maintien d'une union nécessaire pour le bonheur de nos deux païs, et pour le triomphe de ces principes auxquels je sais que v[otre] E[xcellence] n'est pas moins attaché que je le suis.”

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 8. Harley Street.—“ Je suis malheureux, accablé de douleur et de rage par quelque nouvelle qui j'ai appris sur l'infâme conduite des troupes Russes dans la dernière affaire. Ce n'est pas la même nation qui est en Italie et en Suisse, ou les généraux et officiers qui les comendent en Holandes sont des infâmes, dignes de la potence. J'espère que vous ferez ce que je fais, et que vous en informerez votre ministre en Russie comme je le fais ce soir, en informant Rastopchin pour qu'il le comunique à l'Empereur. Ces gueux qui sont en Hollande me font rougire d'être Russe. Si vous envoyez votre courier ce soir je pourai écrire plus librement à d'autre perssone que je ne puis le faire par le mien ; c'est pourquoi je vous prie de l'envoyer.

“Faites-moi l'amitié de me dire si Popham a été envoyé par le Duc d'York à Petersbourg. Ce seroit bien malheureux s'il ne l'avoit pas fait, car cet homme actif, et que l'Empereur aime, obtiendrait tout de suite qu'on enverrait d'autres généraux à la place de ceux qui couvrent de honte le nom Russe.”

LORD GRENVILLE TO W. PITT.

1799, October 8. [Dropmore.]—“ I have had a long conversation with Lord B[uckingham] on the subject of the paper you sent me about Irish representation.

“ We were totally unable to solve the difficulty of deciding who is to receive the compensation of open boroughs, nor indeed do I think it capable of any solution except by arrangement with the persons concerned. If this be impossible the result must necessarily be as follows :

Counties	32	-	2 each	-	64 members.
Cities	2	-	2 „	-	4 „
Open towns	30	-	1 „	-	30 „

which, if we adhere to our limitation of an hundred, leaves only two members for 84 boroughs.

“ To extinguish them on the plea of their being created so late as the reign of James I., or by enquiring why they were created, would be very dangerous in principle ; and the same plea would also, it is conceived, apply to some of the 30 open boroughs which are meant to be retained.

"If therefore this idea must be adhered to, perhaps the best way of doing so would be to avow the plain reason, that of convenience; that the object being to lessen the number, those are abolished which are capable of compensation in money.

"It would then be a question whether to abolish them all instantly and compulsorily, giving the full value, and leaving only the 98 rights above stated, or, whether it would not be best to class the close boroughs in classes of threes, to alternate by Parliaments.

"To do this would abolish two-thirds of the present value, supposing it agreed that the one member to be sent to the United Parliament is equal to the two to the Irish Parliament.

"This two-thirds might be given now compulsorily in money, and would be about 10,000*l.* for each borough. The third of eighty-four is twenty-eight, which, added to ninety-eight, would make the present number of members to the United Parliament one hundred and twenty-six, liable to be reduced as often as any of the classed boroughs should offer to take the other third in money.

"Some bargains of this kind might possibly be made by private contract, before the measure is brought forward. The four Bishops' boroughs which belong to Government might certainly be so arranged, and the immediate increase might probably not be more than to about 115 or 120, instead of the 100 originally proposed. This increase forms therefore a very small part of the objections to this plan.

"The solid reasons against it are, 1st, that while you abandon to so great a degree the principle of the actual representation, and form one quite different from it and very unequal and artificial in its composition, your new system does not rest on any (even plausible) theory, but merely on convenience. It is a total change but no reform, many of the open places retained being, in practice, as much private property as the others, and the places themselves not at all more considerable.

2nd. "That what you retain by preference are practically the very worst species of representation, pot-walloping boroughs and open elections by the mob, where neither property, nor family connection, nor the good opinion of neighbourhood, or any other good species of influence could weigh against adventurers from Dublin or London with large purses, or backed by any temporary clamour.

3rd. "That you admit a principle, or establish a mode of applying it, both which, if good, are quite as applicable to the case of English representation. And that as there will be a general and apparently a well-founded opinion that 650 is too large a body for the House of Commons, this will be suggested as a natural mode of reducing the numbers here, as well as in Ireland.

"These objections are so weighty that I think it well worth while to examine in detail the cases on the apprehension of which this whole plan is grounded. I mean those of the actual owners of the 30 open boroughs, who, it is supposed, may be indisposed to the measure if any compensation in money is to be given for those boroughs, as it must go to the electors and not to them.

“Considering that this number of 30 is in itself not large, and that several of these persons are probably among the decided enemies of the whole measure, it might perhaps not be impossible, by private and separate discussion with the individuals concerned, to reduce the effects of their apprehended discontent so as to be much less dangerous in its extent than even the influence of the objections I have already stated.

“If this could be done, the plan of a general classing by threes of all boroughs indiscriminately would so very nearly answer in point of number that there could be little difficulty of reducing that to practice.

Thus, 32 counties and 2 cities	-	-	-	68
add $\frac{116}{3}$	—	$38\frac{2}{3}$	-	$38\frac{2}{3}$
				$106\frac{2}{3}$

Deduct two Bishops' boroughs, which are four, and they would diminish this number by $\frac{1\frac{1}{3}}{106\frac{2}{3}}$; and make a further deduction for such others as might, before the measure is brought forward, be bargained for and surrendered by private agreement, and you would find the number considerably reduced, possibly below the 100.

“The inestimable advantage of grounding the whole plan on the present rights without any other change than that of doubling the counties and great cities, is so strong a recommendation of this plan that I should think a large proportion of private accommodation, so arranged as to satisfy the proprietors of the 30 new boroughs, very well bestowed indeed; and I should wish that the means of doing this should be examined in detail by those who are conversant with the subject, before any other plan is resorted to.” Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to SIR JAMES CRAUFORD.

1799, October 9th. Cleveland Row.—“The uncertainty in which everything continues respecting the Netherlands has prevented me from turning my mind to the subject of your letter of the 23rd August. If anything can now be done there it must be by military plans and measures, and what has as yet been done on the subject is directed in that course. Till the state of that country shall assume some more settled shape, nothing more can be said respecting any mission there.” Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 10. Harley Street.—“Par les donnés que j'ai eu mardi passé de l'infâme conduite de notre misérable Général Essen, duquel je n'avois déjà rien à espérer d'après la lettre confuse que j'avois reçu de lui du vingt-trois du passé, et qui me prouvoit qu'il a perdu la tête ou ne l'a jamais eu, j'ai écrit le même soir qu'on le rappelle, et qu'on envoie tout de suite un autre général. Je sais par un témoin oculaire que le dix-neuf, au lieu de rallier les gens en désordre, il a été le premier à fuir, et se trouvoit dans le camp, où il étoit occupé à regarder avec une lunette d'approche ce qui se faisoit en avant. Je vous conjure de me donner tous les détails qui parviendront par le courrier qu'on attend, et si son Altesse le Duc d'York n'a pas encore ôté le commandement à cet infâme Essen, et à celui qui a commandé le régiment de chasseurs qui s'est si mal comporté dans la dernière affaire, j'espère qu'on lui écrira d'ici de le faire, et qu'il écrira à l'Empereur qu'il a été forcé à cela par ce que ces gens déshonorent les drapeaux Russes. L'Empereur en sera très content. Il est déjà prévenu par ce que j'ai écrit, mardi passé, de l'infâme conduite d'Essen, et de bien d'autres officiers.

“ Je me flatte que vous n'accuserez pas les troupes de ce qui n'est que l'infamie de ceux qui les commandent. Le Maréchal Roumentzow, qui dès l'âge de quatorze ans a fait la guerre, qui a passé par tous les grades, nous disoit toujours que quand les soldats Russes se conduisent mal il faut pendre sans forme de procès les officiers qui les commandent, et il avoit raison. Dans six campagnes que j'ai faites, j'ai vu qu'il falloit retenir le soldat pour qu'il ne coure pas trop en avant, au lieu de l'animer. Que s'il s'aperçoit que celui qui le commande manque de courage, il le méprise, se décourage, et cesse d'obéir à des généraux ou officiers méprisables. Je vous réitère ma prière de me donner les informations que vous aurez. En attendant, je suis outré au-delà de toute expression de l'infamie qui rejaille sur les troupes de ma nation.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 11. Harley Street.—“ J'ai toujours crains quelque désastre en Suisse depuis la retraite de l'Archiduc. Comment quarante et quelques milles hommes sur une position aussi étendue que celle qu'occupoient Korssakoff et Hotz depuis le Tirol, les Grisons, jusqu'à Zurich, faisoient la périphérie d'un demi-cercle dont Massena avec soixante-dix milles hommes occupoit le centre, et n'ayent qu'un demi-diamètre à parcourir pour se porter avec toute ses forces contre telle partie du grand arc qu'il vouloit percer. Cette disgrâce est aussi naturelle qu'inévitable. L'étonnant est que Massena a tardé si longtemps à l'effectuer. Vous vous souvenez que Korssakoff m'écrivait que sa position étoit insoutenable, ajoutent ‘vous me demanderez pourquoi j'y reste ? C'est pour qu'on ne disent pas de moi que je suis un général à retrahir ; mais, surtout, pour ne pas abandonner à la rapacité et à la féroce vengeance des Français la petite partie de la Suisse que nous tenons, et qu'il seroit cruel de sacrifier.’

“ Je suis impatient des détails de la Hollande. Quoiqu'ils ne fassent que me chagriner de plus en plus, la seule consolation que j'en retirerai c'est de renouveler mes instances à St. Petersbourg pour le rappel de ce maudit Essen, et pour l'envoi d'un autre général plus ferme, plus rigide, et qui comenceroit à punire severement tous les coupables ; ce qui remettrait de suite l'ordre dans les troupes."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 11. Emden.—"It is now the 17th day of Emden and the Circe is still as fast wind-bound as ever ; you will see with satisfaction that the Captain's time is not however idly spent here, and with my antient hostility to the trade of the Waddens, you will naturally imagine I did not repress the activity of Winthrop by any idle dreams of Prussian neutrality. To avoid all possibility of misrepresentation as to the facts, I have written them to Garlike at Berlin ; to remind him of our claim to fight our enemies by sea whenever we can reach them by sea, is however unnecessary, as I recollect that he felt as every Englishman should do upon this subject. What makes the gallantry of this exploit is the most ample justification of it, for the Dutch ships of war were within half musket shot of the batteries of Delfzyl, and the King of Prussia cannot affect to find his neutrality there without claiming the Dutch side of the Ems as well as the opposite coast. I send you a map of the Emden River to shew you the spot more accurately ; the Circe lay 20 miles down the river, and it was from the Circe that Winthrop sailed up on a dark night in two Dutch boats, to take away two ships of war manned with 75 and with 40 men, under batteries which would have sunk him a hundred times if he had given the alarm by one single pistol shot. He is a fine fellow of the true breed of British seamen.

"My land report is not so prosperous ; we have done nothing yet with these shuffling Waldeckers, and though our friends here vapour all day long about their means and their influence in Friesland and Groningen, I see that no human means will make them move with any exertion attended with risk to their persons or property ; and it was gravely answered to me the day before yesterday that as soon as our army would send force enough into Groningen and Friesland to disarm the disaffected and drive away the Batavian garrisons, the whole country would rise to a man. I could not help answering that in such a case they might to a man go to bed again, for if they would not stir till the whole business was done to their hands, there was no reason why they should stir afterwards. Such a wretched and lamentable want of all zeal and spirit, public or private, I could never have believed, if I had not been an unwilling witness to it. What that spirit of the De Witts and the Barneveldts originally was, I know not ; it seems to have been exhausted in their persons, for no trace of it is to be found in their descendants ; they talk without shame of the wretched pusillanimous character of their countrymen, and I do not see that those who hold this language correct the faults which they reproach to others, or contribute by their own spirit and energy to restore that which they complain of seeing extinguished throughout the United Provinces.

"This evil is in my mind the greatest difficulty upon the whole subject; when the materials are found the arrangement is only matter of labour and prudence, but here all is to be created, for the more you examine into the account, the more you will be persuaded that there is not in the people of the United Provinces any trace of that national spirit which should form the only solid and certain source of its defence and security. I can say nothing of Flanders till I know what has been said or done there. D'Yvoy's reports are those against which I have always suggested some doubts. I will write more when I know more."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1799, October 12.] Harley Street.—"Je vous remercie pour la communication des papiers que je vous renvoi. Ils ont servi à adoucir l'amertume et le chagrin où je me trouve, voyant que la malheureuse affaire du dix-neuf, et la captivité de Hermann a été prise mieux que je ne l'espérois. Je me flatte pourtant que le Chevalier Whitworth s'emploiera pour que ce malheureux général soit repris au service.

"Le raisonnement du Chevalier sur le rapel du Comte Tolstoi de l'armée de l'Archiduc est très juste. Il ne faut pas se brouiller avec la Cour de Vienne: il suffit de la connoître, de n'être pas sa dupe, mais il ne faut pas la pousser au bout, et la déterminer à s'accomoder avec la France."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 13. Downing Street.—"The messenger is arrived with the detail of the action of the 2nd, and a short account of another action on the 6th. It was obstinate and long, and ended in our keeping the field; but the generals seem to have been unanimous in their opinion that there was not a prospect of any further advantageous operation, and the army have moved back to the position they left on the 2nd. Colonel Brownrigg is sent over for further instructions, and he is hourly expected. I, of course, expect to see you to-morrow morning as early as you please."

OFFICIAL NOTE.

1799, October 14. Downing Street.—"Despatches have been received from his Royal Highness the Duke of York dated Alkmaar the 7th, giving an account of a severe action which took place on the 6th instant, between that town and Beverwyk, which terminated in the enemy's retiring after sustaining a very considerable loss in killed and wounded. Upwards of 500 prisoners were taken; the loss of the British is stated at 500, and that of the Russians at 1,200 killed, wounded and missing. The difficulty of advancing in a country naturally so strong, the reinforcements daily received by the enemy, joined to the unusually bad weather and impracticable roads, determined his Royal Highness to re-occupy on the 8th the strong position from which the army had advanced on the 2nd, and there to wait for further instructions."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 14. Duke Street.—"I called twice on your Lordship this morning and had the misfortune the last time to come two or three minutes after you were gone. I wanted to have introduced to you M. de Heerdt who has been sent by the Hereditary Prince of Orange to the Prince his father, and is to return immediately to join his Serene Highness who writes from the Helder. The Hereditary Prince is extremely anxious to be informed in time of the determination that will be taken, in case of a final retreat, with respect to the 6,000 Dutchmen, sailors and soldiers, who have enlisted under him. In order to lose no time in sending M. de Heerdt back with some answer on this subject, which the Princes take much at heart, I have engaged to accompany him to-morrow to Dropmore, and we mean to be there between 11 and 12 o'clock, and to return immediately after having waited on your Lordship. I am very sorry thus to disturb you, but I am sure you will excuse me on account of the nature of the thing."

The PRINCE OF ORANGE (to) HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, October 15. Hampton Court.—"Mon fils vient de m'envoyer le Baron de Heerdt pour m'informer du mouvement retrograde de l'armée alliée en Nord Hollande et demander mes ordres sur ce qu'il devoit faire dans le cas d'une retraite ultérieure de cette armée. Votre Excellence se rappellera que ce gentilhomme a accompagné M. le Général Abercromby, chargé de ma part d'une commission que je lui ai donnée à la demande du Gouvernement Britannique.

"Mon fils l'a, en même temps, spécialement chargé de me représenter la situation d'un nombre de six à sept mille Hollandois, tant matelots que soldats, qui, animés par la proclamation que le Général Abercromby a émanée au nom de sa Majesté Britannique, et par celle que j'ai publié de mon côté, ont fait preuve de leur attachement à la constitution légitime de la République des Provinces-Unies, ainsi qu'à moi et à ma maison, en quittant le service des usurpateurs du pouvoir suprême dans la République des Provinces-Unies, pour prendre volontairement service, et se laisser employer sous les ordres de mon fils.

"Votre Excellence sentira à quel point la situation de ces infortunés pourroit devenir facheuse si l'armée alliée étoit obligée, à la suite des circonstances actuelles, d'évacuer entièrement la Hollande. Je suis trop persuadé de l'équité de Sa Majesté Britannique, et du Gouvernement, pour ne pas être persuadé que, dans un cas pareil, on ne souffrira pas que ces gens soient victimes de leur zèle et de leur dévouement, et qu'ils ne seront pas abandonnés à la vengeance de l'ennemi; mais j'ai cru de mon devoir le plus indispensable de ne pas perdre un seul moment pour mettre leur situation sous les yeux de Votre Excellence, et la prier de donner les ordres nécessaires pour qu'il soye pourvu provisionnellement à leur sûreté, ainsi qu'à celle des officiers qui ont été envoyé en Hollande conformément au désir du gouvernement, et des personnes qui ont accompagné mon fils ou sont venus le joindre; en attendant qu'il soye possible de prendre pour leur sort futur des mesures analogues aux sentiments de justice et de générosité que distinguent d'une manière si éminente et Sa Majesté Brittannique et son Gouvernement.

"Votre Excellence m'obligera infinément si elle veut bien m'informer le plustot possible de la détermination qui aura été prise à ce sujet, afin que je puisse en informer mon fils, et lui renvoyer, pour cet effet, M. le Baron de Heerd, qui n'attend que cette réponse pour partir." Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 15. Harley Street.—"J'ai reçu hièr ce que vòus m'avez écrit en secret. Le retraite de la Holande est une mesure non seulement très sage, mais elle est même indispensable, car, outres les raisons valables que vous alléguez, il y a encor la considération que d'après les désastres arivés à Korssakoff en Suisse, désastres si perfidement préparés depuis longtems par Thugut et compagnie, les Français peuvent détacher trente à quarante milles hommes de plus de leurs armée de la Suisse et du haut Rhin, et les faire dessentre [descendre] par eau sur ce fleuve, et qui pouroient ariver en Holande dans moins de trois semaines; ce qui rendroit la supériorité de l'armée de Brune sur celle du Duc d'York tout-à-fait disproportionnée.

"Etant malade, je n'ai pas pu sortire hièr et voir M. Hamond, mais j'ai envoyé tant chez lui que chez M. Huskinson mon Révérend Smirnov, qui m'a aprit bien des choses sur ce maudit Essen. Je profiterai de votre courier de ce soir pour écrire à Petersbourg.

"J'ai lue aujourd'hui, avec une consolation extrême, dans le True Briton, que le Maréchal Souvorow est à Coir. Il est clair que marchant par Belinzona, Saint Gothard, à Altorf, battent sur son chemin les Français qui vouloit s'y opposer, dès qu'il aprit les disgraces de Hotz et Korssakoff, et qu'il alloit être entouré par toute l'armée de Massena, il a prit tout d'un coup à droite, et avec une dilligence et des marches que lui seul peut faire, il est arivé à Coir à la droite du Rhin, d'où, par un détour assez considerable autour du lac de Constance, il arivera pour se joindre au débris de ses compatriotes."

The MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 15. Stowe.—"Most melancholy indeed is the awful reverse of the last week which, under God's will, has dashed from us so much of the well-founded hopes that had been entertained ; but the question is not altered in any particular by this reverse, for ' we must fight the course.'

"I am of course anxiously uneasy for the re-embarkation of the army, not knowing what the means are of ensuring the retreat by means of the work at the Helder. I take it for granted that you will hold that fort and the Texel as long as you can, upon principles and with objects very different from those which we had fondly entertained ; for it is obvious that the French must besiege to great disadvantage whatever you leave there, even if it should not be a stronger garrison than 1,500 men ; and therefore that such a force would operate as a solid diversion if besieged, or as a mischievous desultory force if left unattacked. And, at all events, it will hold the key of Holland till it is dislodged, and for that time our detachment of North Sea fleet will lay in the Texel or in the Mars Diep without risk or expense. And I fear that the state of our transports is such, that unless you can send the cavalry horses to the Texel island till you can re-embark them at a proper opportunity, they must be sacrificed. But even this is of less importance compared to the risk of losing any of those brave men to whose zeal and exertion we owe so much. My poor men have indeed suffered severely, but I thank God they have not disgraced themselves. But my sensations upon the subject would be most painful if I was not sure that I have done right in the line which I have taken, and which has ended so fatally for so many of them. Two of my officers (poor Chaplin and Browne) are missing, I hope not wounded. As to my recruiting it has indeed done the regiment the highest credit. My numbers now amount to 327 men, of whom 285 have enlisted for the 4th under their own officers ; 26 more (trained artillerists) have entered for the Royal Artilley, and the remainder for the 16th or Buckinghamshire regiment. My officers and sergeants are indeed entitled to every praise and indulgence, and with this view I have writ to Mr. Dundas, whose kind attentions to me have been unbounded, to propose (under an intimation given me by Major-General Ross that the barracks in this eastern district will be wanted for the Russians, or for some of the new corps, particularly those which will be formed or recruited from Ireland, either as recruits or as militia) that our now very small corps may be sent to quarters, for the first winter since 1791, in the county. This is not within your line, but unless military reasons interfere (to which at once I lend myself) I know it will give you pleasure to assist my wishes, which are strongly interested on this subject, for those to whom I owe so much.

"Lord Chatham's escape has, I trust, decided you and others to whom the public have a right to look, not to suffer yourselves to forego for his very proper feelings as a soldier the dearest interests of the public ; and that, in one word, his further service on the Continent will be negatived ; a sacrifice which, I must say, he owes to the public. For God's sake do not be deterred from doing what I know you will feel your duty on this subject.

"You say nothing of our dear Tom. I suppose he will return immediately to England, unless Petersburg should call for him, which I conceive may be the case."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 18. Harley Street.—“La journée que j’ai passé hier chez un ami dans le Kent, a un peu dissipé mes chagrins, mais votre billet que je viens de recevoir m’a fait encore plus de bien. L’assurance que vous me donnez que l’inappréciable Souvorow a rejoint l’armée battue de Korsakoff me rassure. L’arrivée de cet homme prodigieux contiendra les Français, tous supérieurs qu’ils sont en nombre; et si Wikham lui amène dix milles Bavares, il reprendra avec ce renfort l’offensive, c’est à dire la partie de la guerre qu’il aime et qu’il connoît le mieux. Je crois qu’il n’y a aucun danger à vous et à nous à garantir les possessions Danoises. Qui diable pourroit les envahir? Le bien de l’accession du Danemark viendra de ce que leur marine marchande ne pourra plus approvisionner les ennemis; et c’est beaucoup, car malgré vos capteurs, c’est immense ce que les Danois portoient en France, en Espagne, et en Hollande.

“Je vous envoie ce que j’ai reçu de Kalitcheff par votre courrier de Vienne. Starhemberg a dit à Wedel et Circello qu’il a des preuves officielles que c’est à l’instance des cours de Londres et de Petersbourg que l’Archiduc a quitté la Suisse. Je vais au bureau, d’après votre permission, pour avoir des détails sur la position de Souvorow. Je vous supplie de me renvoyer la lettre de Kalitcheff.”

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 18. Texel.—“A safe but very tedious voyage has just brought me into smooth water here, and while things are preparing for me to land, I am told that a vessel is instantly sailing for England. I profit of it therefore in order to tell you that we are all arrived safe after a seven days’ voyage which, as you know, I waited three weeks in daily expectation of completing.

“The reports that I hear are all of the most unpleasant nature, and though I cannot find that there has been any defeat, I find the army has resumed its original position, the heavy artillery is embarked, and all men talk of our immediately evacuating Holland. After the entire ignorance in which I have passed the last month I cannot pretend to judge of these extraordinary events, but until I am better informed, I shall confine myself now to the assuring you that I will lose no time in writing to you.

“It is certainly not a very pleasant reception after an extraordinary voyage to find that I shall probably have immediately to re-embark, but it will be gratifying to me to try to the last to do all the good I can; and when I see you, as I probably very shortly shall, we shall meet with satisfaction in that reflection, whatever may be the course of events here, or the extent of our disappointments.”

SIR W. SIDNEY SMITH to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 18. Tigre, off the coast of the Delta.—“I have found it absolutely impossible to carry on distant correspondence at a time when that within the immediate sphere of our local operations required every moment that I could venture to take my eye off from the daring enemy we are opposed to; and I should feel myself very remiss toward your Lordship if I had not been certain that every line I wrote to my brother would of course reach you in a more concise form, as being separated from those parts which merely concerned the local arrangements at the Porte, but which, from the pressure of my necessities, naturally became the prominent feature of my correspondence. I don't like to adopt the tone of complaint, but I certainly have ample field, unsupported and cavilled at as I have been. Plague, pestilence, and famine, battle, murder, and sudden death, we are used to, but it is more difficult to bear the unceasing attacks of envy, hatred, malice and all uncharitableness in the rear, while the enemy are within pistol shot in front. The idea of those who ought to support their zealous servant undermining and pulling him down would be too much for the patience of any man, who had not had the trials I have. The first blow I received in the back after I was grappled with the enemy was from Lord St. Vincent, who misconceived some expression of mine, which literally was no more than that I would go and do my best with whatever I found to work with, supposed to mean that I should take whatever I could find to work with; this at least is the only way I can account for a round accusation and reprimand for ‘having given orders to ships not put under my command by Lord Nelson,’ a thing I neither did or conceived an intention of doing till two months after the date of that reprimand, before I knew of it. In the month of March, when actually engaged with the enemy, I ventured to quote the article of war which obliges us all ‘to assist a known friend in view to the utmost of our power’ which that zealous good officer who was killed (Captain Wilmot) accepted as full justification for remaining to help at the labouring oar we had in hand of undertaking to fortify an old, almost defenceless tower, with such materials as could be furnished to seamen and savages; and in the face, nay in the very teeth, of a disciplined European army which had hitherto borne everything before it; that is to say, had never been resisted before. Now, though I cannot in conscience think this a crime, yet such is my idea of the necessity of subordination in these times particularly, that I did not hesitate to make an amende honorable to Lord St. Vincent immediately that I knew he was offended, thinking that I ought to sacrifice every personal consideration to the good of the service which must be hurt by altercation; and likewise to the friendship of Lord Spencer and yourself in selecting me from the number of more experienced men to fill the post of honour in the advanced guard of the glorious contest in which we are engaged. Illiberality may construe this amende honorable into a confession of guilt to my prejudice, but 'tis better I should suffer than naval discipline be affected.

"I had scarce recovered from the stun of this blow when I received a much more violent one from Lord Nelson. Fortunately the enemy were already beaten, or the certainty I thus acquired of my not being to expect the smallest succour would have weakened my hopes of success, and consequently might have paralysed my efforts. Having got at the cause of this paroxysm of jealousy which his Lordship, I trust, now sees to have been a mere sensation from his extreme sensibility, I feel certain that nothing of this kind will ever happen between us again. I felt my character, public and private, called upon to refute erroneous opinion, and clear up misconception, but I hope I did it with that degree of temper the delicacy the subject required, in which the real respect I feel for Lord Nelson came to my aid; and I must do him the justice to say he did not wait for any justification on my part to come forward with frank approbation of my attempt to emulate his meritorious labours, giving scope to the manly feelings of a fellow soldier. Our two letters crossed each other on the road, since which my very old friend, Sir William Hamilton, who has acted a very conciliatory part between us, has assured me that no rancour remains there, and thus we shall agree very well, for I am sure there will be none on my side.

"These two storms over, I thought myself at liberty to go on as I had begun, smoothing the troubled scene before me, taming even Bonaparte's malice by acting differently from him, while I held him up to the light of truth so as to cause defection in his followers; when on a sudden, I find an attack from the quarter of all others whence it was least to be expected, being from the very man who was sent by your Lordship to co-operate with me, and with whom, from his professions of cordial friendship, I thought I should be able to go hand and glove. Alas! I have been miserably deceived; in the first place, his unwarrantable attacks on my brother from the first moment he set up the pretension of an independent mission, which the Porte don't admit, are indecorous in the extreme in the eyes of such a government as this; and I now find that the success of our labours at Acre, while he was driving a bargain with the Porte for services we had officially notified as a free offer of the King, has occasioned him to make a scape-goat of my brother by the assertion that he has influenced me to keep him in the background; and while he is writing to me in the most flattering terms, he is writing of me in terms of the most pointed censure for making 'arrangements' which he chooses to term 'irregular and disrespectful to his Majesty's minister.' Now, I have borne all the first manifestation of jealousy between 'Army and Navy' (which he ought to correct a subaltern for as I should a midshipman) but this sort of assertion in one of the official folios he chooses to pester my brother with in the middle of his labours to bring him forward, calls for a few marginal notes to correct mis-statements which might weaken the confidence of his Majesty's ministers in me, and thereby unhinge the ricketty complicated machine I have to regulate here, and which I have hitherto done as well as I could without that assistance from General Koehler I expected and wished for most impatiently. Can it be supposed that any naval man could wish to take such a responsibility on his shoulders as fortifying and defending an almost defenceless place single-handed, without a spade, or a shovel, a fascine, or a gabion, but those he could steal from the enemy? Can it be supposed that any man could see his friends drop off and fall sick, one after the other, from excess of labour, till he was left quite alone, without the most earnest and constant wish for relief and assistance; if I did not cry aloud for it, it was because I thought it impossible that so able and so zealous a man as General Koehler could suffer any consideration whatever to prevent him throwing himself, and any little means he might have, into a besieged place so hard pressed as Acre was known to be. He had a transport at his door, and might as well have come himself as send the single officer, Major Faed, to whose solicitations he at length yielded, even though the Porte might not chose to increase the emoluments beyond the very handsome allowance from England, which is known to be greater than that of all of us put together, while we are doing our best to supply his place till he should come. I don't enter into a paper war on the subject, or send your Lordship whole folios of procès-verbale as he does, because I trust they in themselves must have long ago convinced your Lordship that the man had something to cover by such elaborate epistles; but I must appeal to my superiors so far as to place the correspondence within their reach in case they should entertain a suspicion that I have acted alone from any objection to combined operations with the army; so far from it I have all along felt, and most seriously regretted the absence of abler professional men to perform those labours which we did as well as we could from the necessity of the case, and for want of their assistance. When I say this I don't mean to acquiesce under the sentence of exile into the ocean which the General has passed on the whole navy. We don't like to be excluded from contributing our utmost efforts in our country's service, although there may be no enemy's ships in the contest; and I trust my friends Troubridge, Hood, and Hallowel will justify this tenacity of our right to take a walk on shore now and then to learn a part of the art of war which so often comes into play in maritime states. I call on Lord Nelson as my naval chief, and your Lordship as my principal in my present additional duties, to protect me from censure of this sort, which is an interruption when it comes from those on whom we count for cordial co-operation; and I take my leave of the subject by the request that your Lordship will have the goodness to give me a word to satisfy me that I am doing right to go on in the execution of what was concerted at Constantinople, without the necessity of reverting to Constantinople again for endless discussion, which after all can only prove that there are but three ways into Egypt on this side and two on the other. On this side the desert, the river, or the Alexandrian road by which Bonaparte entered it. On the other Suez, or the Mecca road, and that from Upper Egypt by Cossire.

“This leads me to the development of the work in hand before I close my letter to your Lordship. The Turks being unequal to a regular siege unassisted by a European army of strength, and Alexandria being now very well fortified, famine and discontent can alone allow us to enter by that door. The desert is the only way by which the great bodies of cavalry that compose the best part of the Turkish force can move; more camels are wanted than are now left alive to carry the water that would be necessary for the ten days’ march from Syria to the Nile, by that route, supposing them to go eighteen miles per day, which is a forced march in the sand; and when on the Nile, the army would have to begin an operation which it might as well begin at once by the mouth of the river, having the advantage of fresh water, and a conveyance for baggage, without such a multitude of animals. I proposed to lead Mustapha Pasha by this route, under the protection of my floating cannon, in the flotilla I have created since I have been in the country; instead of which he chose to knock his head against the castle of Aboukir, where there is only one well of brackish water, and he failed accordingly. Still had the gunboats taken the stations indicated long enough before the fatal day, Bonaparte would have lost even more than he did; and these sort of victories discredit him, and increase the discontent in the army, which is my surest game considering the smallness of the English force, and the want of confidence of the Turks in themselves, where they have regular moving bodies opposed to their disconnected multitudes. The whole mass in the plain of Nazareth could not make any impression on Kleber’s single division, and gave way in all directions the moment Bonaparte’s reinforcement of 500 cavalry fired a signal gun from a hill, and encouraged Kleber to form a close column and go through the mob. The Vizier’s weak, irregular, insubordinate army will only afford the plunder of a rich caravan to the first three demi-brigades he finds under arms after passing the desert. If the French risk themselves to fight in the desert they are out of their element, and the Turks and Arabs are in theirs; so, there, the French advanced guard will be beaten, but this encouragement will only make the Turks commit themselves in some new attack, in which case, as I have seen in all our sorties, the brave run on and perish, and the great mass of cowards run away and never reappear otherwise than as the plunderers of their own camp. There is no forming men who are assembled from all quarters by edict, and who obey no voice whatever, still less that of a Christian. The chiefs have just knowledge enough to feel that there is something to know in the art of war beyond galloping and firing at a mark, but they don’t venture to undertake to second the views of the European to teach them soldiering, from prejudice, indolence, and apprehension of shewing that they have no authority themselves. The supreme chief may assassinate a man authoritatively in private, but he could not flog him for disobedience without making mutiny, to which he would fall an immediate sacrifice. We have just now a melancholy proof of the mutinous spirit and desperate conduct of the malevolent part of this banditti in the assassination of Patrona Bey, the Turkish Vice-Admiral, the moment he took out his firman to read as the act of assumption of his authority. The discontent arose from the stories of the want of water at Aboukir which was not his fault; they reproached him, did not give him time to speak, but, each that could, fired or cut at him till he was a lifeless corpse among them; after which they patiently heard me lay down the law authoritatively by interpreter in perfect silence, because they respect me more than I fear them; and I have got them all afloat under a favourite chief, Seid Ali Bey, and must make them meet the enemy, or else I can't pretend to success from the underplot of the proclamations operating on the mal du pays which is strong upon the French army just now. Judge if I can have an ambition to supplant General Koehler in the direction of such a gang. I do it because it is my duty as he is not here, and because my manner with them, being a due mixture of affability and severity, gives me an ascendancy over them; but the next check their stupidity and insubordination exposes them to, the whole will recoil upon me, I know. This consideration, however, shall never prevent me doing the utmost possible with the means I have. I wish general Koehler or any general was here to take his share of the labour and the risk; the latter would be none if he had a sufficient number of regular troops under arms to shew and enforce an example with. I would give him all the weight of my acknowledged supremacy, which is but a feather after all, but it is the plume of 'triumph,' and they feel confident from its presence among them; so much so that I had a deputation yesterday of the army to beg that I would not allow the Tigre to run out of sight, as she does with ease in chase, 'lest the troops should lose their confidence.' This was partly [a] trick to have a scapegoat at hand for all failures, and fail they will if they go out of reach of the flotilla's guns. So much for the reason of the present 'combination' to attack Damietta on the mouth of the Nile. If I can once get a footing there, I shall persuade the Vizier to transport his army from Gaza where he has given me a rendezvous, or from El Arish by sea, which is now practicable; for the south-east winds set in for the next month, and the Nile is so high that the lake Mazalé forms part of it, making Damietta and every town an island, as I am assured. What a field for a force that was really efficient. But alas! I have no gun-boats, but prizes half-manned, and make-shifts.

"The last news I had from the Red Sea, the Centurion was gone down to Mocha, and Admiral Blanket gone to Bombay. Indeed, their presence near Suez without an army would not do much more than encourage the Arabs to continue their predatory war to appear something in our eyes, for we are great favourites;

but it would surely be possible to bring twenty thousand English and seapoys up the Gulf, in which case we may eradicate the 'colony' of Fayoum before it takes such deep root as to become the centre of the Deistical government these modern philosophers and sarans are attempting to establish in these regions. I endeavour to balance this in the political scale by the influence of Les Pères de la Terre Sainte, whose president's life I saved at Jaffa, and whose gratitude and hope of further protection has induced him to write me the letter herewith transmitted. The guardians of the Tomb of our Saviour surely may well claim the protection of a king whose style and title is 'Defender of the Faith'; and the ally of the Sultan can alone protect them efficaciously, and this without giving umbrage to anybody but old Herod Gezzar, to whom I have preached moderation till he is afraid to tyrannise when I am near. He is a cruel, faithless old monster, fearing nothing under heaven but the Tigre and Theseus, and despising the Vizier. He has shut himself up in Acre, which he fancies impregnable now, and laughs at him, having discharged all his Turkish troops, and kept nothing but his Albanian regiments, which he is recruiting daily from the the Morea and Bosnia. He has cut off all connection with Constantinople, and he will not take a bill of exchange on it as heretofore (being a monopolist merchant) and there he sits growling among his mortars and old iron picked up in the French trenches, waiting for the Vizier to be gone by before he begins his old trade of fleecing our friends the Christians and Druses in Mount Libanon. When he was within a hair's breadth of perdition, with Bonaparte not only at his gates but on his ramparts, he was happy to find that I had created such a degree of confidence in me among the mountaineers as to be able to draw off that portion of his enemies. He then promised everything in their favour, and I only asked tranquillity for them at his hands that they might not be forced to accept it at the hands of Bonaparte; now he is enraged at my influence in the mountains and jealous of our communication. I have had the formal thanks of the Porte for my salutary interference; the Vizier has, in the first instance, ratified everything I did to secure their allegiance to the Porte and their co-operation against the enemy; but, since that first effusion of satisfaction and gratitude, the interested gang of plunderers who surround his Highness have (I hope it will be found without his knowledge) imposed a greater tax on the mountains as the price of the Vizier's forbearance than Gezzar himself ever thought of exacting; and the messenger from the prince (Emir Beshir), the same who was sent to Acre to me during the siege, is detained in the Vizier's camp as a hostage for this sum, although he went there in virtue of the arrangement guaranteed by my word. There is no dealing where one is exposed to breach of faith. Our British character is established on this score, but it may be impeached in this way, not only to our prejudice, but to the prejudice of the cause, by the renewal of the French speculation on the discontents of Syria; discontents fomented among the Christians by the consideration that they cannot be worse off in the hands of the French than they are under the fiscal governors of Gezzar. The question is a delicate one, and I must manage it accordingly without letting the question of religion mix with it if possible.

"While things are in suspense the prince is reduced to a sad alternative. Placed as he is between Gezzar and the Vizier, he sends me word that, rather than break his word with me, and favour discontent leading to an invitation of a second incursion of the French into Syria, which all the world knows the Vizier's multitude could not oppose, he will abdicate and take refuge on board the first gunboat whose flag he can claim as an asylum; a measure which would place us in an awkward predicament, for it would be contrary to honour and sound policy as standing on good faith to give him up, and by protecting him we should offend some among the gainsayers of the alliance, who publish that the Court at Constantinople is sold to the infidels, for so we are all called in current conversation; though when we are present the term Giaour is exclusively applied to the French. It is to be observed that Emir Beshir publicly professes the Mahometan religion, as Henry the Fourth of France did the Catholic, to enable him to hold the government which is necessarily conferred by the Pasha of Seide on a member of the family of Beshir Sheb, being a Mahometan. He is, however, a Maronite Christian, a humane, just, good man, much beloved and respected by all his vassals, the etiquette of the court being a true type of paternal government. The princes of the same house are all treated by the inhabitants with the same external marks of respect with which they treat each other, and particularly the reigning prince, by rising from their seats, which, being troublesome, is never done but by obligation, and the inferior kissing the inside of the thumb near the palm once or twice, according to the profession of affection, carrying the hand so kissed to the head afterwards. I had an opportunity of observing their customs in this respect from the assembly of all the princes to meet me when I visited Emir Beshir in the mountains immediately after the siege of Acre was raised, and that Bonaparte went south instead of north, owing to the little encouragement he met with from our Christian friends. The prince met me half-way from the capital, Der el Kamar, at a country residence of his, six hours from thence, and six hours from Baruth where I landed, the ship being in that bay to water. The several princes and shieks or inferior chiefs came out to meet me as I passed the several villages in the way, drawing up their vassals across the road and firing a feu de joie; after which they approached with the most friendly greetings, and it was easy to perceive the most heartfelt satisfaction and affectionate regard pictured in every countenance. These mountaineers are a fine race of people, of good stature, and regular features, expressive of benevolence and energy. They are exceeding good horsemen and always armed; the cultivation of their ground in terraces up the centre of every ravine bespeaks them to be very industrious; and their dress shews them to have a superfluity beyond the necessities of life. This it invites the cupidity of the Turkish governors at the foot of the mountain on all sides, and their intercourse savours rather of an armed truce than peace and subjection. The Christians and Druses, united by a common interest to resist oppression, live very well together, though the latter are idolaters; professing the Mahometan faith publicly, and practising some peculiar rites secretly, of which there are strange stories not worth repeating. It was thought necessary for an ambassador to come from each when our friendly intercourse was first established in April, and the mayor of the capital is a Druse. The prince who governs both is, as I said, a Maronite Christian, professing the Mahometan religion; he was placed in the government by Gezzar, who took him from one of his dungeons, where he kept him two years chained by the neck, and appointed him as successor to Emir Yussuf, his own original patron when he was a refugee from the wreck of Ali Bey's fortunes.

"This same Gezzar was no other than Ali Bey's executioner. His real name is Achmet, the surname Gezzar (signifying cutter) being given him from the terror his sanguinary deeds inspired; he is fond of this surname, always saying 'Gezzar will, or will not, do so and so.' His origin is from Bosnia where his father was a peasant, and he is fond of citing this origin and the poverty of his family, as well to show his ability in having raised himself to the pitch of power and wealth he at present enjoys, as to secure the adherence of his Bosniac and other Albanian troops, whom he counts upon to resist the Grand Signor's troops whenever it may be decided to interfere with his pretensions to independence; a thing I, of course, never have admitted an instant either in conversation or by an act of any kind, our treaty guaranteeing the integrity of the Ottoman empire. He was sold as a slave in Egypt in his youth, and having, as I said before, been an officer during Ali Bey's usurpation, and having learnt the tactique of that sort of power, he became necessary to the almost independent chiefs of Syria. Being a man of herculean strength, and possessing great energy and bravery, he distinguished himself in the civil wars of Syria, and being made governor of Baruth by Emir Yussuf, he shut his gates against the prince who called the Russian fleet (then in the Archipelago) to his assistance, and after a three months' siege obliged him to evacuate the town by a capitulation which allowed him to withdraw by one gate as the Russians entered by the other. He then went into the service of Sheik Daher, governor of Acre, and being sent by him to raise contributions in the mountains, Gezzar ran away with the money to Cairo, after which he lent his assistance to the Porte to subjugate Sheik Daher, whom he put to death, and was rewarded by the government in his lieu. He has constantly harrassed and vexed the mountains ever since, keeping their princes in confinement whenever he could get hold of any of them by treachery or otherwise. 'Divide et impera' has been his motto, and having got the person of Emir Yussuf into his power, he hanged him at the gates of Acre, and gave the supreme government of the mountains to Emir Beshir, whom, as I have said above, he took from prison to invest with the pellice of honour, keeping the sons of both these princes at Acre as hostages. I saw the sons of Emir Yusuff at Acre, and very gentlemanlike, fine young men they are; indeed, these mountaineers are a fine race of people, l'air noble is a strong characteristic of them; and the gentleness of the manners even of the lower class forms a strong contrast with the rough brutality of the Turks. This may fairly be attributed to the difference of religion. The only savage act I witnessed in the mountains was the bystanders, when my health was proposed, all drawing their swords and clashing them together over my head, while the company were drinking it.

“Gezzar’s project at present is to divest Emir Beshir of the government, as he will not tax the people to the extent of his (Gezzar’s) exactions, and to put the two sons of Emir Yussuf in the northern district of the mountains, keeping the other under his own immediate government. This the mass of the people, who are content with Emir Beshir’s administration, resist; although there are, of course, many partisans in favour of the sons of their former prince, and the poor young men are, of course, glad to accept any conditions that shall give them their liberty even to the prejudice of their country. In this state things are, all sides except Gezzar appealing to me, and the Vizier having promised me to reward Emir Beshir’s fidelity at a most critical time; while a demand is made, underhand, for a most enormous sum as the price of this condescension. I am frequently put out of all patience by the interested conduct of every individual with whom one has business to do in this country; everything is bought and sold, fear or cupidity is the primum mobile on both sides between the oppressor and the oppressed; and though I, of course, steer clear of any interference, except on great occasions, when the success of our operations are at stake, there are cases wherein our influence must be exerted in concert with the supreme authority of the empire; and having taken a decisive step, all parties must be confirmed in the idea with which they are strongly impressed at present, that we Englishmen, having the rule of right and benevolence for our guide, never make a retrograde step. I know your Lordship, and I am sure you will approve of the line I have traced to myself as his Majesty’s representative in this affair. I don’t make a dispatch of all this narrative in a formal way, because the style of a private letter enables me to introduce many points illustrative of the question which would not appear so well perhaps on record as being apparently trivial; besides, the current language of a private letter enables me to write with the rapidity that is necessary under the pressure of time and the frequency of interruption, while I am attending to the business of navigation, and the internal arrangement of the squadron, now hard pressed for subsistence, and depending on the precarious supply of fresh provisions in ill-fitted transports, having no salt provisions for a long cruise. Your Lordship will make any use (you may judge necessary) of this letter for the information of your colleagues in office, and if you consider any part of this prolix detail likely to be interesting to our good and gracious King, you will, of course, make extracts of such parts in the proper form, as I really have not time to re-copy or compress it into that sort of brief statement which would be proper.

"I write a dispatch to my brother on what concerns the Ottoman Government, as the ground of what they are required to do under existing circumstances. I send him a most interesting intercepted paper written by Bonaparte before his escape, and one by Kleber since I gave him a fair opening to embark, and trusted the Theseus and squadron I had stationed off Cape Soliman, 240 leagues to the westward, falling in with him; but alas! her distress for provisions, and the impossibility of procuring more at Rhodes than her bare daily consumption, and not always that, prevented her from reaching her destination in time. We met yesterday, 21 October, off Alexandria, when I learnt her ill success. I have been steering along shore towards Damietta while writing this, and have just now got sight of Seid Ali standing in from sea. We shall join this afternoon, and go to work to do whatever may be practicable immediately."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1799, October 19. Cleveland Row.—"Il me revient de tous cotés que dans toutes vos conversations vous vous efforcez d'attribuer à la demande et réquisition pressante de cette Cour-ci, jointe à celle de Petersbourg, la fatale démarche de la retraite de l'Archiduc, seule cause des malheurs arrivés en Suisse; et je crois même que c'est au langage que vous avez tenu à cet égard, que sont dues les assertions du même genre qui ont été tout récemment répandues dans nos papiers publics.

"Si c'est par ordre de votre Cour que vous tenez ce langage, ce n'est pas à vous que nous avons à nous adresser sur une circonstance aussi étonnante. Si cela n'est pas, et qu'on vous a trompé à cet égard, je vous prierai en ami de suspendre vos assertions jusqu'à ce que vous avez eu l'occasion de vous convaincre de la vérité sur ce sujet, soit par les preuves officielles que je vous communiquerai sans la moindre difficulté si vous le désirez, soit par des informations que vous vous procurerez en écrivant à votre Cour.

"Vous êtes trop honnête homme pour vouloir accréditer une calomnie, vous êtes trop sage pour désirer de nous pousser enfin à des démarches publiques pour faire retomber sur les auteurs de ces malheurs les conséquences de leur malheureuse politique.

"Recevez dans notre amitié cette communication confidentielle, et ne me mettez pas dans la nécessité de vous écrire officiellement sur ce sujet si capable de mettre entre nos deux Cours un germe de discorde, et de division perpétuelle." Copy.

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 19. Wangen.—"I really think all the contents of Pandora's box are to be poured out on us at once. This last unfortunate turn of Marshal Suwarow's is the only evil that cannot somehow or other be got the better of. It carries with it all that is calamitous, putting arms into the hands of M. Thugut and the Austrians, which I fear we shall never be able to encounter. It is impossible for anyone to be more thoroughly in the wrong than the Russians now are, and, if M. Thugut had hired them to play his game, they could not have done it better, or entered more thoroughly into the net, if he had spread it for them.

"I have written to Lord Minto and Sir Charles Whitworth in the sense your Lordship desires, but, in truth, what can one say to the former that has not been said over and over again. I assure your Lordship I have sometimes been ashamed of my letters after I had written them, as containing truths which I ought never to have been under the necessity of repeating. With respect to Sir Charles, I know not how I can do more than lay before him the plain facts, desiring him to commit me as little as possible, and to use them with the greatest discretion until he shall hear from your Lordship.

"Suwarow himself trembles at the very name of the Emperor, and the Grand Duke (who, per parenthèse, is one of the greatest brutes that ever disgraced the human shape) governs him now with a nod. Whilst the poor Marshal was notorious the Prince was his humble servant all day long, but now he is a tyrant who feels his power and is determined to use it.

"I trust you will be able to keep Prussia quiet, and firm to her line of neutrality. If so, I think with 50,000 men you can maintain Holland against any force, with the assistance that your navy, gun-boats and other vessels will give you.

"I will do everything in my power to keep up an appearance of offensive operations as long as possible. But this is all that can be done; therefore I trust in God you will make the best use of your time. After all, my means are small, and, between the shock of those contending powers, I shall think myself very fortunate if I escape without being crushed. I should not fear the Marshal at all, but these confounded people about him are as cunning and treacherous as they are ignorant and brutal. Voltaire said of the Russians, speaking of the best of them, otez seulement l'habit, et vous sentirez le poil. With these people you have nothing to take away, they are shag all over.

"I have had much conversation with poor Stackelberg (who is half distracted at what he has seen) about who should be the adventurous rat that would hang the bell about the Emperor Paul's neck, but we have never come to any conclusion excepting that we neither of us know anyone that was fit for such an undertaking.

"I have not the courage to write to Woronzow to-day, and I will be really obliged to your Lordship if you will have the goodness to tell him so. I will endeavour to frame a letter to him by the next post, which he may, if he pleases, send to Petersburg, where I find that all my private notes have been sent, as I learnt from the copy of one of his despatches which the Emperor had sent to the Marshal.

"I will take care of Weyrother (whose name the Austrians, I know not why, always pronounce Vinerode). He has promised never to leave Suwarow notwithstanding the unpleasantness of his situation, and he is under orders to join the Archduke. The Marshal is very much attached to him, and is fully sensible of his merits.

"I will send the best military information I can from France, but it is really, as your Lordship says, that the Directors themselves don't know the strength of their armies. Pichégu has often told me that he never knew the number of troops he had under his command. I will answer the other points in your Lordship's private letter by the first opportunity. In the meantime I have only to beg that you will accept my best thanks.

"If your Lordship has time to see Colonel Stewart, he can give your Lordship many curious and interesting facts respecting the state of the two armies. He is a very good fellow, and an active intelligent officer. I know he was under disgrace for his opposition to Maitland at St. Domingo, but, if his story is to be believed, we may say, the Lord protect us from all new converts.

"I certainly owe my retreat from Zurich entirely to him, and therefore am bound to express my gratitude.

"I send enclosed for Lady Grenville a sketch of some Cossacks, which, though not very well done, is yet extremely like the animal.

"Pray don't forget the question of my return. I don't press it now, because it would look like flying from difficulty if not from danger. But let me venture to ask that you will occasionally mention the subject to the Duke of Portland, and let his Grace know that I have myself recalled it to your Lordship's recollection."

Postscript. "Though I have reason to believe that the enemy has reached Coire, yet I do not mention it in my despatches because I have no certain information of the fact.

"I have not named the Grand Duke in my despatches for another reason, namely, because I could really say nothing good of him. I trust in God, however, that some means will be found of removing him."

LORD GRENVILLE TO HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, October 19. Cleveland Row.—"I send you the answer from the Prince of Orange about Delftzyll, which is certainly not favourable to my wishes. It is, however, to be observed that he mistakes the question, and supposes that the object in view was to attack that place and not (as is the real case) to keep it when given up to us. Some of the reasons which he states as making it impossible for us to advance from thence in the winter are the very circumstances which will render it difficult for the enemy to attack us there in that season.

"This question, however, like that of the Helder, should be considered by military men, and should be reported on by them in detail. If it is really found impracticable to hold the place, and if in fact it shall have been surrendered to us, some means must certainly be found to bring off the garrison, to whom we are bound in honour not to leave them to be sacrificed.

"On the general question, we were led into more discussion yesterday than I think useful in our large Cabinet. Whatever may be my particular opinions on these military operations, I am very ready to subscribe to the judgment of those who possess better means of information than myself; but I rely on your not suffering us to be drawn, either by sanguine and confident hopes founded on no solid reason, or by Royalist zeal, into an enterprise, in which, if we fail, we must probably lose the greatest part of the only army we have ever had, or ever shall have, during the war.

"There are, I conceive, two very distinct questions as to the enterprise against Brest, and as to any further or different attempt on the interior of France. The first is a limited object, capable as I imagine of military calculation both as to time and force; and, if these are well combined, particularly if the force be effective and sufficiently large, and if the attention of the enemy be called off to some very distant point of attack, I do not see why we should not look with reasonable confidence to succeed in any military project there, which is approved and heartily entered into by the person who is to execute it.

"The second leads us into a wide field indeed. Whatever opinion may finally prevail as to the best mode of trying to obtain Austrian co-operation, it would be an act equally wicked and mad to trust any material interest of this country to the hope of such co-operation. I lay it down, therefore, as a principle, from which I trust you will not depart, that in this enterprise you will of course derive all the aid you can from such Austrian co-operation as you may get, but that you will not undertake any plan the success of which (and much less the safety of your army) is to depend on that co-operation.

"The two real questions are therefore:—

1st. "Can you collect here a sufficient force to act with safety and success in the interior of France, if unaided by any diversion; or,

2nd. "Can you, with the aid of Russians and Germans, independent of Austria, ensure the making such a diversion from Switzerland as will make the attempt in this quarter practicable.

"To discuss these questions would lead me into a wide field, military and political. I am best able to speak to the second point, and I much fear that, in sober reason, the answer must be negative. I am, however, far from wishing to form, much less to pronounce, a decisive judgment on such a question in so early a stage of the business. I trust the plan will be well considered and digested; and when you are enabled to state what the amount and nature is of the diversion which you would require from Switzerland, I will then lay before you, certainly without any prejudice, the sort of difficulties which I foresee in the execution of that plan, and the only means which I see of meeting those difficulties. But let me earnestly entreat you not to let your mind proceed step by step imperceptibly to consider the plan as decided, before you have well weighed its extent and practicability, and the consequences of failure. If on full consideration it is ultimately adopted, I need not say that my whole heart and soul must be in its success, and from that time you shall hear of no difficulties from me.

“Supposing it should be adopted, there will, I think, be hardly anything so important to its success as the completely deceiving the enemy as to our projects. This can only be well done by giving to our preparations some other fixed and apparent direction, which I conceive should on many accounts be Holland. The French will more readily believe us in earnest as to that object than any other ; having tried it once, and having failed in it after being so very near to complete success in it, they will think it natural that we should resume the attempt. And all our newspapers and Parliamentary language may easily be made to encourage the deception. It is partly for this reason, and partly as a certain means of attracting and keeping a large French force in that quarter, that I am so anxious that we should, if possible, keep some footing there during the winter.

“Something must be done about Maitland. The best would be, I think, to apprize him of the circumstances which have happened, and to desire him to return home with all the information he can collect.” Copy.

COUNT STARHEMBERG TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 20.—“Je reçois dans l’instant la lettre que vous me faites l’honneur de m’écrire, et je commence par vous remercier du stile de confiance et d’amitié qui y règnent. J’ose me flatter que mes sentimens pour vous et ma conduite le méritent. Quoique les propos horribles que j’entends tenir de tous les côtés sur ma Cour depuis cette malheureuse affaire de Suisse soient faits pour me peiner extrêmement, et qu’il soit impossible que je puisse lire de sang-froid ce que je vois depuis quelques jours dans le Times et l’Oracle, je crois connaître trop le pays que j’habite et que j’aime, pour m’en offenser. Je sais mépriser les diatribes des gazetiers, et suis incapable de soupçonner un ministère que je revère et chéris comme je le dois, d’y avoir la moindre part, tandis qu’il a tant d’autres moyens de manifester son mécontentement. J’aime à croire que j’ai le droit de m’attendre à la réciprocité si, par hasard, quelqu’un des papiers s’avise avec aussi peu de raison de prendre notre parti. J’avoue que j’ai peu de malheur car ja n’en ai pas rencontré jusqu’à présent. La même franchise qui me fait vous parler ainsi me porte à ne vous pas cacher que non pas dans toutes mes conversations, puisque je ne parle d’abord qu’à très peu de personnes, évitant de venir en ville dans un moment où je n’y entends que des choses désagréables ; mais bien dans quelques tête-à-têtes avec un très petit nombre d’amis, M. Frère, M. le Marquis de Circello, par exemple, je me suis permis non pas de parler officiellement, puisque je n’ai aucun ordre à cet égard mais de témoigner mon étonnement de ce que l'on nous ferait un crime de ce que la défense de la Suisse avait été confiée aux seules troupes Russes, tandis que l'un de nos ministres avec lequel je suis en correspondance m'avait mandé, il y a plusieurs semaines, que cet arrangement militaire était la conséquence d'un désir auquel nous n'avions cédé qu'à regret, et pour le bien de la cause commune. Si vous voulez me donner un moment d'entretien, mardi ou mercredi prochain, je vous ferai lire, mais aussi confidentiellement, seulement la lettre dont je vous parle, et dont j'aime à me flatter que vous ne ferez aucun usage. Permettez-moi, après vous avoir renouvelé l'hommage de l'amitié et de l'attachement que je vous ai voué, de vous répéter encore que ni dans ma qualité de ministre de l'Empereur tant que je continuerai de l'être, ni dans celle de gentilhomme, ni dans celle d'honnête homme, je ne serai capable de petites menées basses ou lâches, et que je vous estime trop vous-même pour craindre que vous puissiez m'en soupçonner."

THOMAS GRENVILLE TO LORD GRENVILLE.

[Private.]

1799, October 20. The Helder.—“L'homme propose, et Dieu dispose. After my tedious stay at Emden, and my slow voyage hither, I find that I might as well have spared my pains, for the first news which greeted me was that an armistice was concluded, and that the conditions of this agreement were that the British and Russian army should immediately evacuate the Dutch Republic. The Duke of York informs me that he has sent to England all the papers belonging to this transaction; you have therefore all the knowledge of it which I have, and much more; for probably you were informed of the measures which led to it; I am utterly ignorant of them, as well as of all that belongs to the subject. I could do nothing here; the convention was signed.

“I shall, therefore, re-embark in the course of to-morrow or the next day at furthest, and shall have the joy of seeing you, and the heartfelt satisfaction that neither you nor I have been wanting in our duty upon this occasion

“I have given to the Hereditary Prince of Orange the best hopes which I could that the expedition will be resumed in the spring, and it appears to me that the best conduct to hold now is to shut up the book of regrets, and look only to the new hopes of the spring.

“If I was not following this letter instantly upon its heels it should not be so short.”

Enclosure 1.

GENERAL DE STAMFORD TO THOMAS GRENVILLE.

1799, October 11. Brunswick.—“Si mon médecin savait racommoder des corps vieux et usés, comme mon charron et mon sellier ont su rajeunir ma vieille voiture et la remettre sur quatre roues neuves, au lieu de dater cette lettre de Brunswick je la daterais d'Emden. J'avais tout disposé pour m'y rendre au commencement de cette semaine, ainsi que j'eus l'honneur de vous le mander le 29 du mois passé, et de vous le confirmer dans ma lettre du 4 du courant, quand une violente toux rhumatismale vint, il y a deux jours, me jeter sur le grabat, de sorte qu'il n'y a que le ciel qui sache quand je serai en état de me mettre en route.

“Quoique j'eusse le projet d'aller à Emerick avant de me rendre à Emden pour m'y aboucher avec notre correspondant Jean Knout, je ne laissai pas de lui écrire pour lui demander les renseignements que vous désirez. Je m'applaudais d'avoir eu cette précaution à laquelle je suis rédevable de pouvoir vous envoyer sa réponse plutôt que je ne l'aurais pu faire sans cela. Vous la trouverez sur la fenille ci-jointe. (Copied and sent to Lord Grenville 23rd November.)

“Si les propositions qu'il fait vous paraissent acceptables, voici l'arrangement que je prends la liberté de vous proposer pour notre correspondance avec le Sieur Knout. Il vous adressera directement, par la voie d'Emden, les rapports du correspondant de Paris, auxquels il joindra régulièrement les siens propres. Il m'enverra, en même temps, des duplicata des uns et des autres que j'aurai soin de faire parvenir en entier ou par extrait à Monsieur Garlike et Comte Panin, si je juge qu'il peut être utile que les choses qu'ils renfermeront soient d'abord portées à leur connaissance. Le Comte de Panin m'a témoigné qu'il désirait de rester en relation avec moi, ce dont je suis d'autant plus flatté que je sens que ce désir lui est inspiré par l'amitié dont il m'honore, et non par l'espoir de tirer quelque avantage d'une correspondance que je ne puis lui rendre ni intéressante, ni utile, à moins que je ne trouve occasion de lui apprendre des choses intéressantes par elles-mêmes.

“Si le plan du Sieur Knout et l'arrangement que je viens de vous proposer peuvent mériter votre approbation, je vous prie de m'en instruire le plutôt possible. En attendant, je prendrais la liberté de vous observer que la somme demandée par le correspondant de Paris étant très forte, et la friponnerie en France étant tellement à l'ordre du jour qu'il serait possible que ce monsieur eut formé le projet de nous vendre des mensonges pour des vérités, il me semble que deux mois tout au plus suffiront pour nous mettre en état de juger de sa véracité et de l'importance de ses rapports.

“Vous voudrez bien aussi vous rappeler que le terme de l'engagement du Sieur Knout a fini avec le mois dernier, et que si l'on veut le continuer dans son emploi, il faut songer à lui en fournir les moyens. Il a eu jusqu'à la fin de Septembre deux cents Frédéric d'or, dont 20 ont été pour son voyage de Brunswick à Berlin, et de là à Emerick ; la reste a été pour sa dépense à raison de 40 Frédéric par mois. Il demande, ainsi que vous le verrez dans son mémoire, quelque chose de plus, à fin d'être à même de pouvoir envoyer de temps en temps quelque exprès ou émissaire dans la Belgique ; je pense que 20 Frédéric par mois pourront lui suffire à cet effet.

“Quant à ce qui me régarde, vous êtes bien persuadé, je l'espère, que je me trouverai heureux d'employer mon temps et le peu de moyens que j'ai pour le service de la bonne cause, aussi longtemps qu'il me reste un souffle de vie; mais comme la révolution m'a privé à peu près de la moitié de mon revenu, et que de celle qui me reste je ne puis rien sacrifier, je ne demande en renonçant, comme de raison, à la gratification que le Gouvernement Britannique m'accorda durant mon séjour à Berlin, qu'à être dédommagé à l'avenir de mes fraix en ports de lettres, et à être mis en état de pouvoir payer un copiste lorsqu'il se présentera, comme cela arrive souvent, des lettres, mémoires, ou relations, dont je souhaiterais de prendre copies, pour les transmettre à mes correspondants. Quatre Frédéric's par mois suffiront largement à cette dépense. Ce serait m'affliger que de m'offrir davantage.

“Je suis très peu au fait de ce qui se passe en Hollande; c'est par des Hollandais qui demeurent ici que j'apprends le peu que j'en sais. Tous m'assurent que, le deux de ce mois, il y a eu une affaire à l'avantage de notre armée; que le Gouvernement Batave craint de se voir abandonné par les Français; et que ceux-ci font, en effet, des préparatifs qui semblent justifier cette crainte. Dieu veuille que tout cela soit vrai!

“Les affaires en Suisse sont en mauvais état. Comme cette bonne armée de Korsakow y a été incommodée! Il est arrivé ici des lettres de ces côtés-là qui accusent ce général d'être la cause du désastre qui lui est arrivé; elles disent qu'il n'a pas voulu prendre de certaines positions qu'il devait nécessairement garnir de troupes; reste à savoir, s'il en avait assez pour le faire. D'autres lettres disent que l'Archiduc n'aurait pas dû quitter la Suisse avec son armée avant que toutes les troupes s'y fussent mis à portée de la remplacer sur le champ. Ces dernières me paraissent avoir raison; car lorsqu'on a quitté un pays où, peu de jours après, on a été forcé de rentrer en poste, pour y réparer des malheurs, il y a grande apparence qu'on l'a eu quitté trop tôt. Quoiqu'il en soit, l'invincible Suvarow, en s'emparant de la position du Mont Saint Gotthard, a, pour ainsi dire, arraché la victoire d'entre les mains de Masséna, en l'empêchant par là de poursuivre ses succès. Il courait ici hier un bruit que ce dernier avait été battu, blessé, et pris, le premier d'Octobre; en remontant à la source de cette nouvelle, je ne l'ai pas trouvée digne de créance. Puisse-t-elle valoir au moins comme prophétie.”

Postscript. “Je joins à cette lettre une copie de celle que Monsieur le Duc de B[runswick] a écrite à Monsieur de Zastrow en réponse à la lettre dont je vous ai parlé dans ma dernière.”

Enclosure 2.

THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK TO COLONEL DE ZASTROW.

1799, October 4. Brunswick.—“Les détails que vous m'avez fait le plaisir de me communiquer en date du premier de ce mois, offrent des preuves parlantes du plan formé par les deux républiques, tant Française que Batave, pour atteindre le but qu'elles se sont toujours proposé, de gagner du temps et de parvenir à associer la Prusse à leurs intérêts.

“ Il est d'abord incertain si l'Angleterre se prêtera à mettre le fils à la place du père, et si le Prince Héréditaire d'Orange lui-même voudra ou pourra donner les mains à ce changement ; mais, dans la supposition qu'on puisse passer par-dessus cet article (qui n'est pas cependant d'une médiocre importance, et qui, par rapport au droit de succession de la Maison d'Orange, serait formellement lésif de l'ancienne constitution telle qu'elle a été garantie au traité de Loo par la Prusse et l'Angleterre en 1788), et en admettant de plus qu'en conséquence le conseil des douze serait établi, pourrait-il exercer ses pouvoirs sous les yeux de 40,000 Russes et Anglais quand la flotte Batave du Texel, et toutes les colonies Indiennes sont au pouvoir de l'Angleterre ? La France n'exigera-t-elle pas la retraite des troupes étrangères du territoire d'Hollande ? Celles-ci se retireront-elles spontanément et sans y être contraintes, pour abandonner à une négociation, dans laquelle l'Angleterre n'aurait aucune part directe, la destinée d'un état aussi intéressant ?

“ Je n'ai jamais cru à la rétrocession des pays d'outre-Rhin tant que le sort de la Hollande ne serait pas décidé, et que nous ne faisons de notre côté aucune démonstration imposante. La noblesse de l'âme du Roi ne permet pas à sa Majesté de croire à la duplicité, à la scélératesse du Directoire Français et de ses agents.

“ Vous vous rappelerez que je n'ai jamais regardé les négociations d'Otto dans le mois de Juillet que comme des moyens astucieux pour trainer les affaires en longueur, et barrer les négociations entre la Prusse et l'Angleterre. Trois mois se sont écoulés, et depuis cette époque il n'y a pas eu la moindre démarche ultérieure de faite. L'avenir prouvera de plus en plus que nous n'avons à attendre de la part des Français ni l'amitié, ni équité, et que l'unique objet de leur Directoire est de chercher à leurrer la Prusse par les négociations successives qu'ils ont soin de jeter en avant, de paralyser les forces de cette Puissance, pendant qu'ils ont, en même temps, la perfide adresse de faire répandre par leurs adhérents que Sa Majesté Prussienne est réellement disposée à concourir avec efficacité aux intérêts et aux succès de la République Française.

“ Je suis convaincu intimément de la sagesse des mesures que le Roi prendra dans tous les cas pour le bien de ses peuples, mais je n'en suis pas moins persuadé aussi, et je l'ai toujours été depuis la rupture du Congrès de Rastadt, que par des simples négociations, si elles ne sont pas soutenues par des dispositions guerrières et vigoureuses qui en puissent assurer l'effet, il n'y a rien à attendre de convenable ni de positif de la France.

“ Justice, équité, et modération sont des vertus qu'on ne peut trouver que dans des Gouvernements basés sur la religion, la morale, et le véritable honneur. Elles ne sauraient se rencontrer dans un prétendu Gouvernement qui ne s'est fondé que sur le pillage et le meurtre, et qui ne peut prolonger son existence que par le mensonge, la mauvaise foi, et la violence.” Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 20. Wimbledon.—“I received your letter this morning, and I don't think I differ in any material point from any part of your statement; and I rather think you have been led into some misapprehension on one point, I mean where you suppose that there is any disposition in me to be ardent in the pursuit of military exertions in the interior of France. In truth, I am such a sceptic on all that subject, that nothing but an unwillingness to decline taking a trouble which Mr. Pitt and you pressed so earnestly upon me, could have induced me to take the very limited share I have taken in the succours to be afforded to the Royalists in France. It is my earnest wish that I may be mistaken, but I am strongly impressed with a conviction that, however well disposed they may be to the ancient Government, and however eager the generality of the inhabitants of France may be to get rid of their present rulers, none of those considerations will operate upon them so far as to come forward in any manner to justify us trusting to anything but our own means, both of attack when it can be made, or of retreat if it shall become necessary. As to any great operation upon the Seine and the Somme, I think it is very fair to reserve it for future consideration, but by no means ripe for present decision. It must depend entirely on the extent of operations carrying on in other parts of France. Without a most extensive diversion in more places of France than one, I should think it perfect insanity to think of it with any army that the utmost exertions of this country can produce.

“Upon the same principle, but not to the same extent, I argue that without a diversion somewhere else an attempt upon Brest ought not to be made. But if one hundred thousand men can be collected to act anywhere (but particularly in Switzerland) under Suwarrow, I feel confident in saying that we have the resources within ourselves of sufficient extent to justify an attempt on Brest and its harbour; and the prospect of success is of a nature that would render it unjustifiable in us not to attempt it. I don't take it upon me in any military operation, especially one of such magnitude, to promise certainty of success. The nature of the subject does not admit of such certainty, but I see my way very sanguinely to the hope of producing a British army the beginning of May, consisting of fifty thousand infantry and fifteen thousand cavalry; and if the Russians now in our possession can in the course of the winter be made up to their full numbers, and disciplined under the eye of better officers than those who now command them, you will have a disposable force of 80,000 men. If I am right in my calculation, and I don't feel it liable to any uncertainty (except the extent that the present levy of English militia and the expected levy of Irish militia will go to) I shall not be satisfied that I do conscientious duty to my country if I do not urge the propriety of one splendid attempt, at one stroke, to annihilate the naval power of France and Spain. If it does not succeed it will not disgrace us; and our army, to a great extent, will still be ready to attempt any other operations that may be thought most advisable. If it succeed, I deceive myself very much if it will not have the effect to shake from its foundation the power of France, and the authority of its rulers, more than anything else that can possibly happen in any other quarter be what it may.

"From what I have stated you will observe that I distinguish between the attempt on Brest, and any other detailed military campaign in the interior of France. This last I would certainly not think of without more than one great diversion to the armies of France, operating upon that country in different quarters; but if one hundred thousand men can be got to operate in Switzerland and towards the frontiers of France from that quarter, I would, in that case, be of opinion that your British army of 80,000 men should make the attempt on Brest. In the meantime, there can not be a doubt that so much depends upon our force being landed without being expected, and as much as possible being affected by a coup de main, that every possible means must be taken to blind the whole subject, and mislead as to the object of it in every possible way.

"I cannot drop this subject without adverting to two topics which dropped from you at our last meeting of Cabinet, where, I agree with you, much more was said than there was any call for at the present moment upon such a subject. I think upon further consideration you will not continue of opinion that there is any similarity between the case of Holland, attempted at a late season of the year in a country rendered more difficult than it even is by nature and art in consequence of the very extraordinary inclemency of the weather; a country where your cavalry, the great feature of your military pre-eminence, was totally useless, and where, I distinctly state to you, I never had the idea of success if you was fairly resisted, and no aid got from the country. In none of those particulars will the attempt upon Brest have any similarity. The army will be larger in proportion to the scene of action to which it will be confined; your cavalry will have commodious field in which to act; the country will not present to you those innumerable difficulties which the dykes, the marshes, and the ditches of Holland present; and if you have any aid from the country it will be autant gagné, but you will not rely upon it, and of course will not be disappointed in the want of it.

"In like manner I must confess we will totally differ in sentiment if you continue to think that enterprise is no part of the character of a British soldier. In truth I believe it is their distinguishing characteristic; and such an enterprise as that I am now writing would animate every man from the general to the meanest soldier; and there is no exertion of spirit nor no prodigy of valour I would not look for on such an occasion.

"It is scarcely necessary to trouble you more at present except on one point. I don't wonder you, who have had so much to do both with Prussia and Austria, should be disgusted with both; but, after the best consideration I can give to the subject, I cannot help feeling with Mr. Pitt that, however mortifying it may be to our feelings, we should take every means in our power to secure if possible the continuance of the Austrian arms in full exertion during another campaign. If they would even do it for three months, it would be an immense point gained to the object I have been dwelling so much upon. Recollect if we succeed at all on the subject of Brest, a month is and must be the whole period required for the execution of it. If during that period not only the Russian but the Austrian arms should be acting with vigour, be the object and motive of the exertion what it may, I need not detail to you the incalculable advantages which would arise from it.

"I have been inadvertently led to a longer dissertation that I had any intention of, but it may probably save a repetition of the same discussion at any other time."

HENRY DUNDAS TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 20. Wimbledon.—"The difficulties stated by the Stadtholder with regard to Dalfzyle are so great as to render it impossible to undertake the business this season ; and with all the disadvantages which would at present attend the attack on Walcheren, I should not look upon it as so desperate as that in the Ems. If we come under any engagements, the garrison must certainly be taken care of ; but I don't think the letters you communicated to me from your brother would justify doing anything with that view without hearing from him again.

"I fancy you had not seen Maitland's despatches when you wrote your letter. I have not seen those to you, but the one I have is not encouraging."

COUNT STARHEMBERG TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 21. York Farm.—"Après avoir eu l'honneur de répondre hiér littéralement à la lettre que vous m'avez écrit, permettez que, dans notre ancienne intimité, je me plaigne aujourd'hui à vous de vous-même. Je suis plus que peiné de voir la facilité avec laquelle l'ami que j'aime et révère prend la première impression défavorable que des sots ou des méchants veulent lui donner de moi. Une expérience de sept ans doit vous avoir fait assez connoître mon caractère et mes principes invariables, pour que je sois à l'abri de tout soupçon. Vous avez vu, entendu, et lu la manière hardie et ferme dont j'ai osé souvent blâmer plusieurs transactions de ma Cour. Je n'ai pas craint de l'écrire à Vienne et d'y parler sur ce ton. Le fils du Prince de Starhemberg, qui ne sert que par honneur, n'est arrêté par aucune considération. Quant à la circonstance présente, voici le fait. Vous ne m'avez jamais parlé des mesures militaires adoptées en Suisse. J'entendois tous les jours des gens que ces objets ne regardent en rien, se mêler de critiquer notre conduite et nous imputer tous les malheurs qui arrivent, et, nommément, le dernier à la retraite de l'Archiduc au Rhin. Je n'ai jamais jetté le blâme sur votre ministère, et vos sollicitations ; fi donc ! que c'est mal me connoître ! Mais j'ai dit à la secrété (comme je devois le croire d'après les informations particulières que j'avais reçu, et que je vous communiquerai confidentiellement) que j'avais lieu de prévenir que cet arrangement avait été fait de concert avec les alliés ; et la manière dont l'Archiduc vient de vôler au secours del'armée battue, était bien faite pour me confirmer dans cette opinion. Rendez-moi donc plus de justice. Je vous suis trop attaché pour ne pas le désirer. Je ne m'inquiète pas du jugement de ceux que je n'estime point. Daignez surtout ne pas oublier que j'ai toujours été le même dans tous les tems, et que je le serai toujours. Mes sentimens personnels sont indépendans des torts, des erreurs, et de l'aveuglement des Cours."

OFFICIAL NOTE.

1799, October 21. Downing Street.—“By a private letter from his Royal Highness the Duke of York to Mr. Secretary Dundas, dated Schagen Brug, 19 October, 1799, it appears that an agreement has been entered into between his Royal Highness and General Brune, in consequence of which hostilities have ceased, and the allied army is to evacuate Holland by the end of November. His Royal Highness promises to send the particulars of the treaty on the following day ; all that can be collected from private letters at present is that the armistice extends to all the naval force in the Zuyder Zee, and stipulates for the restoration of a certain number of French and Dutch prisoners now in England.”

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 22. Hollwood.—“I received your letter only half an hour ago, and will call upon you as soon as I come to town in the morning. I see nothing, in the first moment, to be advised or to be done but refusing the passport to Holland, and taking the usual precautions to see whether any subsequent correspondence throws any light on the subject. My present impression is that what has now passed is only a stronger proof of the same irregular and eccentric mind, brooding on the same project of somehow or other getting to Paris, God knows for what purposes, but for none, I believe, hostile to this country. Your proposed letter to the Duke of Portland seems, in substance, to include everything you ought to do on so painful an occasion, but, as you cannot now send it till to-morrow, I rather wish you may postpone it till we have talked over the subject.”

LORD MINTO to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 22. Vienna.—“I feel it quite necessary to apologise for the great length of the dispatches carried by this messenger, and to express my wish in general to shorten those I write to you, being perfectly aware that you cannot afford as much time to Vienna as I who have nothing else to think of. But the matter of these dispatches is important, and will, I hope, reconcile you in some degree to their length.

"After what I have been desired to say concerning Mr. Wyndham's residence at Florence, I think it due to him to add that I believe he is entitled to every sort of commendation for zeal, activity, and good intentions. But if, as an English minister, he is to take an active part in the affairs of that country, it will no doubt be desirable that he should do so under your immediate instructions, as we are otherwise likely to be pursuing different systems under the same authority.

"I thought you might like to see the enclosed specimen of Suwarrow's style. It is certainly a curiosity, but he seems to unite the essential qualities of a great man with singularities that often denote a smaller character. It is a note which he wrote to General Petrasch on giving up a plan of attack which he had before proposed. It was formed by Weinrota, an Austrian officer, acting as his Quarter-Master-General, and when he says the plan is like Alvinzi's behind Peschiéra, he means to rally Weinrota, who was also the author of that action in which Alvinzi was beat. I allude to this note in one of these dispatches.

"Lord Mulgrave proposes setting out for England on Thursday, the day after to-morrow. I have not only derived great pleasure from his company, but I think have a little matured my judgment on such military questions as are likely to arise here, from his very instructing conversation on those subjects."

Postscript. "M. de Rozamousky is about to quit his station here. He is to travel for six months (as it is said) at his own desire. M. de Kalitcheff has orders to take on himself immediately the functions of the embassy. Kalitcheff is full of zeal and frankness, and will make a most comfortable colleague."

THOMAS GRENVILLE to LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, October 23. Yarmouth.—"I am this moment safely landed here, having left the Helder the 20th instant in the evening.

"I have no new intelligence to send you. You are informed, as Lord Duncan tells me, of the convention under which our army has till the 30 November to retreat unmolested; we give 8,000 prisoners for this, and we covenant to have evacuated the Dutch territory by the 30 November and to leave the works undisturbed. We met Admiral Dickson yesterday with five line of battle and a frigate in his way to the Helder; he had likewise provisions on board, and three victuallers are to sail from here to-morrow. I shall proceed to-morrow morning, and shall hope to dine with you in town on Friday.

"Why do you not send your Russians to their own principality of Yevern? Popham agrees with me in thinking they would there be much more nearer at hand. Count Rhoon Bentinck can give you information of the country, and I see much advantage in it and little inconvenience."

HENRY DUNDAS to [W. PITT].

1799, October 24. Wimbledon.—"I return Lord Grenville's paper which, I agree with you, is a very candid statement of the grounds for consideration. As to what concerns the British army I need say nothing except that I do not think he under-rates it. So far as there is any contingency in the business the chances are as likely to lead to less than more. What is to be expected as efficient from Holland is clearly over-rated, unless perhaps he reckons into the number the Dutch collected at the Helder by the Hereditary Prince of Orange, and reckoned about 4,000, when properly put together and arranged. The distribution of the British force which I have thought of will not keep the army collected, for that is impossible, but they may be kept in large bodies. 12,000 in Ireland. A large body (the Russians) in the islands of Jersey and Guernsey. Some thousands at Plymouth. Some thousands at Portsmouth; a great body in barracks and cantonments in the eastern district; the same in the barracks and cantonments in the southern district.

"As to the foreign part of the consideration, I have little to add to what is stated by Lord Grenville. A Russian army as large as can be got, and as large as you can afford to pay, is an essential ingredient for every purpose. I feel deeply what Lord Grenville mentions of the total defects of every part of the Russian military system and arrangement; but the more I feel it the more I am alarmed by the contemplation of it; for I greatly doubt if the Emperor will be brought to confess it to the extent of admitting the remedies (and very proper ones) which Lord Grenville suggests.

"Austria is the almost unsurmountable difficulty which presents itself on every hand. It is too long to detail all I think upon it, but the result of my considering the subject very maturely for some days past is that our only chance is to leave the whole arrangement of the continental alliances and their ultimate objects to the Emperor of Russia. I would state to him explicitly that Russia is the basis and sine qua non of all our continental connexion, and we shall readily acquiesce in any arrangements he shall make upon that subject, it being understood that himself is the only great power we will agree to subsidize. Let his success in this pursuit be greater or less, I am sure it will be greater than any we can hope for. He may perhaps get both Austria and Prussia to take a part; past experience proves that to be a task beyond our powers of negotiation. We cannot tie one of them fast enough. I think if it is thrown upon him, if he does not secure both, he will at least one of them; and I own I am much confirmed in this sentiment upon the perusal of his paper to Woronzow, which shows that he is meditating upon the subject, and if he lends himself to it in earnest, it shows that he is allowing his reason to operate, and is not guided solely by his temper. In short my idea is that he knows better, and has better means of improving himself in the knowledge of the jealousies and animosities, with the grounds of them, on the part both of Austria and Prussia than we have, and knows, of course, better how to work upon them than we do. I don't mean by all this that we are to be kept in a state of ignorance as to what is going on. Our ambassador at Petersburg will be attentive to it, and will employ his exertions for the purpose of keeping the Emperor's mind in a right train, but this may be done without our entering into all the minutiae of the intrigues. If we gain our end of having large armies kept in the field, we have in truth very little to do with the subordinate means and arrangements by which this is attained. Indeed it is in every view more eligible to be kept out of them. And we have at all times a just ground of confidence that there is no bias or wrong cast in the mind of the Emperor of Russia which will lead him to acquiesce in any line of conduct or arrangement adverse to any of the principles or substantial interests of Great Britain.

"I am sorry to state it, but I cannot refrain from doing so. I doubt much if the next campaign can be either a very extensive one in its operations, or final as to its results. So much negotiation is to take place, and such extensive military arrangements are to be made, I am afraid we only deceive ourselves if we suppose that they can be so effectually or so early completed in the course of the winter months, as to afford the hopes that the different powers we wish to engage, particularly Russia itself, can be in that state of forwardness at any period of next season as entitle us to look to a brilliant or decisive success. I think, too, in the late interruptions of credit and commerce on the Continent, and likewise in the general scarcity of provisions all over Europe, I could if necessary trace many circumstances which are adverse to a very extensive scale of military operations in the course of next summer. I mention these considerations in the view of inducing Mr. Pitt seriously to contemplate his resources, and to husband them till they can be brought forward in a manner and at a season effectual for the objects in view. Enough in the shape of subsidy must be given to keep a defensive army in Switzerland, and the Austrians must take care of themselves in Italy, but the great exertions of Russia next year must, I am afraid, be employed at home in forming, arranging, and disciplining a powerful army to act with effect when it is so prepared. The effect of extensive preparations will have almost the same effect as an extensive campaign upon the resources of our enemies, for they must be keeping up all the time an immense army, and it will be our fault at home if, by limited exertions by our army and navy, we do not keep them in a state of continual disquietude and alarm. The Walcheren, Belle Isle, Cadiz, Teneriffe [expeditions,] and a moving army of ten thousand men in the Mediterranean would effectually answer that object."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 25. Harley Street.—“ Je vous envoie le portrait du bon et grand Souvorow, en vous prie de me le renvoyer demain, car je veux le mettre dans un cadre plus digne de ce héros. Je vous prie aussi de me renvoyer la lettre de l'Empereur, et d'avoir la bonté de me communiquer ce que vous savez de l'armistice, en cas que le Colonel Clinton est arrivé.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 26. Harley Street.—“ Je vous remercie pour le papier que vous m'avez renvoyé ce matin. Votre billet d'hier-à-soir m'a fait beaucoup de peine, à cause de celle que je vois que vous avez sur les transactions en Hollande, quoique je les ignore. Je suis bien persuadé que si elles sont mauvaises ce n'est que la nécessité seule qui a forcé à les faire, et nécessité n'a pas de loi. Je vous prie de m'indiquer l'heure à laquelle je pourrai vous voir demain. Vous êtes le maître de faire copier le portrait du maréchal. Vous n'avez qu'à choisir le peintre qui doit faire cette copie, et lui ordonner de passer chez moi; je lui remettrai le portrait.”

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 27. Wimbledon.—“ I wish you to insert nothing into your correspondence that excludes the idea of sending the Russian troops, now in Holland, by the Mediterranean, to go from Genoa to join Suwarrow at any given time. You will not suspect me of any disposition to lessen the army on this side of Europe, but with the nucleus of Dutch force now coming from Holland, and the troops now in Portugal, I can have no doubt of creating a force in the course of the winter superior in point of numbers to the Russians we lose, and in every respect more eligible to act with our army than any Russian force ever can be.”

The MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 27. Stowe.—“ But, good God! to what a degree the Duke of York must have felt his danger, or must have been broken in spirit, to have signed a convention which I consider as the most disgraceful to the British character of any document I ever read! The assumption of the power or right to purchase his retreat (without instructions for that purpose) by the release of Admiral Winter and of 8,000 prisoners of those not taken by him is, to my mind, as dangerous a precedent as it is weak and wicked; and though I perfectly agree with him in the principle of not destroying wantonly, yet I feel most strongly that if the risk of the re-embarkation justifies such a price as that paid for it, the destruction of the dykes ought to have been resorted to (as in reality it was by General Brune) rather than the surrender of our national honour, which I conceive gone, and even if possible more disgraced by the delivery of a hostage. I feel all this so strongly that I should, if I had the misfortune to be a Minister, well weigh the question of the ratification ; but if you should agree to ratify it, I protest I do not know how you can defend it. However, all this is between ourselves, for as I look to the means of getting out of the war by our military exertions, I shall not conceive our prospects and my objects improved by saying or doing anything that can militate with your wishes. And in stating it I only mean to think aloud with you."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 28. Wimbledon.—“I have this moment received your note. Mr. Pitt passed here yesterday on his way to Bulstrode, and I mentioned to him the idea I had wrote to you ; after a little conversation he seemed satisfied of the propriety of it, and I don't think you need have any doubt of writing to Sir Charles Whitworth in the way you propose.

“I really don't understand what Woronzow can mean by neglect as to the exchange of the Russian prisoners. They are included in the exchange, and many of their officers, I believe, are already arrived. The convention as to the exchange of prisoners actually once broke off on the refusal to include the Russians, and there is actually a ship of Dutch prisoners arrived in this country, brought over in consequence of the convention having stopped on that account, and that ship must now be sent back with its prisoners. I have examined the detail of the armistice, and except that I do not see it made a point to exchange General D. Herman with Winter, I do not see a fault in it, and, when that is explained, perhaps there may be no fault. I have by this night's despatches given a private instruction to get D. Herman's exchange if possible.

“I am afraid you and I unfortunately see this whole subject in so different a point of view that there is little chance of our agreeing upon almost any part of it. As I know not the authority on which you use the strong words in the concluding part of your letter, I can say nothing upon it, except that every channel of information I can apply to, public and private, leads me to a conclusion directly the reverse of what your information has induced you to believe. I yesterday had a long private and confidential conversation with Colonel Clinton, and, if there is truth in man, your information must be erroneous. With regard to the Duke's coming away, all I shall say to him is that I wish, which I certainly do, for many reasons to see him when he can come with propriety. At the same time I cannot enter into your idea of the propriety of his staying while any soldier remains. If there had been no armistice, and the resolution had (for any reason whatever) been taken to remain in the corner of North Holland, as long as there was a soldier alive, I agree with those that may think the Duke ought never to have left a soldier behind him ; but when they are all embarking in safety under an armistice, I cannot see either the propriety or the decency of the Duke remaining with the command of the rear-guard.

"I am not surprised at the temper and moderation with which Woronzow conducted his conversation with you, for, in all the communications I have had occasion to make to him on the subject, I have observed his conduct marked with great candour and great good sense."

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, October 28. Cleveland Row.—"This unhappy business of the capitulation in Holland has just presented itself to my mind in a new light, which makes it impossible for me to avoid stating to you in this manner my sentiments upon it.

"I believe, if you will examine the law and practice of war, you will find that a stipulation made by the commander-in-chief of an army for the surrender of prisoners at home, not taken in that expedition, nor in any manner under his control or disposal, totally exceeds the powers of such an officer, however high in rank and station. If this should be true, as it must I fear be confessed to be, the duty which we have now to discharge is to consider, not whether we will approve of, or even acquiesce in, a thing already done by competent authority, but whether we will advise the King to confirm or rather to do by his act, that which he has not yet either empowered or instructed any person to do for him. And if we determine this in the affirmative, the act is no longer that of the Duke of York of his advisers, but is the act of the King and of his Majesty's advisers here.

"Should this be just reasoning, I should very ill discharge my duty if I did not, in whatever manner it is most becoming for me to do it, express my decided opinion that it would not be proper for the British Government to accede to the terms proposed by General Brune. If it is desired, I am ready to state my reasons at large for that opinion; but, if the deliberate judgment of the King's servants on this subject should be different from mine, I can have no wish to prolong the discussion of so disagreeable a subject, provided it be distinctly understood that my opinion (however little weight it may deserve) has nevertheless been given on this melancholy occasion explicitly and unreservedly, as it ought to be; though always, I trust, with that respect to which his Royal Highness is on every possible account so much entitled. It is not possible for any man to respect the Duke of York's virtues more than I do; but, if the King's Government is to act at all upon this subject, I am bound to give my opinion upon it, though it does not coincide with the measure which he has, with the most upright intentions, thought himself under the painful necessity of adopting." Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 28. Wimbledon.—"I have this moment received your letter. I trust I have no occasion to assure you that it must always give me a sensible concern when I differ with you upon any point of importance, especially of the delicate complexion of the one under consideration. I should not say under consideration, for in fact the question is decided. I sent yesterday to the King the draft of the despatch I meant to send to the Duke of York, containing a direct approbation of the armistice he had entered upon with General Brune; and this day the draft was returned with the King's approbation marked upon it in his own hand. There cannot be a doubt of its being in the power of the King to dispose of such a number of prisoners as he pleases, and his approbation of the transaction so given is an approbation of that article of the convention which, with all the others, was before the King when he gave the approbation. I perfectly admit that the Secretary of State who gave him the advice is responsible for it, and, in that mode, any other of his Majesty's confidential servants may with perfect regularity state to the King their dissatisfaction with the advice which he has received and followed; but, except impelled by some such call of duty as that which I have supposed, I am not aware that any other Minister has any necessity imposed upon him to volunteer his disapprobation.

"Under such circumstances I am sure your Lordship will feel that I am not the person to give you advice upon the subject. If you should think it your duty to take the step I have referred to, I can with the most perfect truth and sincerity assure you it will not in any respect alter my feelings towards you. It is impossible from the course of our habits together that you can have any motive for doing it except an irresistible feeling of public and conscientious duty. On the other hand, I feel equally confident you will do me the justice to admit that it is from no principle of arrogance or self-sufficiency if I avow to you that my mind is so firmly made up on the business that, if it had been the determination of his Majesty's Government that the army under the command of the Duke of York should remain in its present position in Holland, I must have been under the absolute necessity of declining to sign the order for that purpose, and must have returned the Seals into his Majesty's hands, in so far as the holding of them had anything to do with any share in the conduct or deliberations of the war. You know that if the Helder fort had been tenable with three or four thousand men, as we were once led to believe, I should have been perfectly satisfied to have retained that position, and, if possible, to add one or perhaps two more to it. Beyond that it would have been impossible for me to concur."

COUNT WORONZOW TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 28. Harley Street.—"Je vous remercie pour la communication de la lettre du Colonel Clinton, du 9, de Coire. Elle ne fait que confirmer la grande habilité du Libérateur de l'Italie. Puisse-t-il être aussi celui de la Suisse.

"J'ai vu hier dans plusieurs papiers du soir un article que j'ai retrouvé aujourd'hui dans l'Oracle. Comme cet article se trouve dans la Gazette Almande de Hambourg, qui est très exacte, et comme la lettre énergique du maréchal est tout-à-fait dans son caractère, occupé comme vous êtes, je doute que vous ayez eu le tems de lire les papiers, c'est pourquoi je vous l'envoie.

"Permettez-moi de vous faire souvenir des copies des deux notes que Lord Minto a présenté à Thugut."

Enclosure.

October 5. Frontiers of Swabia.—"Yesterday morning the Russian generals received the following order from Field-Marshal Suworow:—'You will be answerable with your heads for every inch of ground that you shall give up to the enemy. I have advanced by way of Schwitz and am ready to repair your errors; show therefore a courage and resolution which nothing can subdue.'"
Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, October 29. Cleveland Row.—"I am much obliged to you for the friendly sentiments expressed in your letter, and which I can with great sincerity assure you are reciprocal on my part.

"The object of my letter was to express to you, and to such others of my colleagues as might see it, the strong additional reason of dissent from the measure in question which I felt from the new light in which the subject had struck me. In a case where no Cabinet deliberation had been held, I conceive that the regular way of doing this was by communication to the Minister in whose department the business rests. Having done this I have discharged my duty, as those who differ from me have done in advising the approbation of the measure. To remark on what you say respecting the Helder fort would be to renew an argument on the subject after it is decided."

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MULGRAVE.

Private.

1799, October 29. Cleveland Row.—"The task which in my dispatch I have solicited you to undertake so much exceeds the limits of any ordinary commission that I have felt some difficulty in giving you the whole idea in official language. What we mean is this: (1) That you should persuade Suwarow to reconcile the Emperor's mind to the appointment of a foreign staff and commissariat to that army, and of some foreign officers to serve in the line with it. For this Suwarow will be a little prepared by Wickham, as far as relates to the staff and the line, and the matter of the commissariat cannot be deemed unreasonable if we bear the whole expense. (2) That you should yourself take the station of Adjutant-General, or Quartermaster-General to that army, according as you shall judge that you can be most useful. And that you should also, if you think proper, take the command of any Swiss force that may be raised in the King's pay, on any plan like that of last year. (3) That you should select some English officers to be employed in both departments of the staff, and that you should, in concert with Wickham who knows all the individuals, also choose some Austrian and Condé officers for the same purpose, and for that of the line. (4) That you should reconcile Suwarrow's mind to these arrangements, and also get him to recommend to the Emperor an increase of pay to his troops (officers and men) when serving out of Russia. (5) That in all these matters, and in everything that respects the commissariat, you should act for the best as if you had precise instructions; considering always that the distance will admit of few references either here or to Petersburg, and that in this business time is as valuable as money or troops.

"I need not say that in proposing to you to take such a latitude of discretion, I could not do it without the full confidence that you will receive a support adequate to it, not only personally from myself, but from every department of the King's government. I hope therefore that you will not judge the thing impracticable. Difficult it certainly is, but you will not be discouraged by mere difficulty, nor by the prospect of much vexation and fatigue, where the object in view is so important. Without a Russian army we shall make no solid impression on France; and without these arrangements the most numerous Russian army will, I fear, rather be productive of triumph to our enemies than of advantage to ourselves. But with them what may we not hope, if the French are pressed by Suwarrow on one side, by the Archduke on the other, and, on this side, harassed by the operations which we can undertake with a superior fleet, and a disposable force of 60,000 men.

"You will have learnt the result of our Dutch campaign. It has not been ultimately successful as to all its objects, but it has produced much honour to our troops, and much advantage to the country; and the public spirit will, I trust, remain unabated, and enable us to persevere.

"Let me again repeat that, if in these instructions there is not latitude enough expressly given to you on the innumerable points that cannot be foreseen, or on those that are mentioned, the best service you can do us is to take it first, and then ask for it.

"Do for the best, and, rely on it, we will think it the best."

H. FAGEL to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October 29. Duke Street.—"The Hereditary Prince has informed the Prince his father of what has passed in the conference he had with you this morning. The Prince has approved of everything that has been suggested to him in consequence of that conversation, and M. Mollerus, who wishes, if possible, to set out for the Continent on Saturday, is ready to obey your commands and wait on you at any time you will be pleased to appoint. If you will have the goodness to let me know when it will suit you to receive him, I shall inform him immediately of the time you have fixed.

“With respect to the ships, the Prince of Orange will write to you in the manner agreed upon.

“The annexed packet contains a letter from M. de Stamford to the Prince of Orange which his Serene Highness desired me to communicate to your Lordship.”

Enclosure 1.

GENERAL DE STAMFORD to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

1799, October 9. Brunswick.—“L'impossibilité où je me trouve de pouvoir souffrir, moi seul, à toutes les écritures nécessitées par la multitude des correspondances que je suis obligé d'entretenir, a été cause que je n'ai pas pu, aussitôt que je le désirois, rendre compte à votre altesse sérénissime de ce qui s'est passé depuis peu à Berlin, au sujet des affaires en Hollande.

“Monseigneur le Duc de Brunswick ayant adressé dans le courant du mois passé un mémoire très circonstancié au Roi, dans lequel il lui démontre les suites facheuses qui ne sauroient manquer de résulter pour la Prusse de son système temporisateur. Sa Majesté lui répondit que tout en convenant de la solidité de ses argumens, et en approuvant surtout le motif et le zèle que les lui avoient dictés, elle n'en demeurait pas moins persuadée que le système qu'elle avoit adopté étoit le seul qui put convenir à la Prusse dans les circonstances actuelles.

“A mon retour de Berlin, Monseigneur le Duc étant en chemin pour se rendre à Potzdam, je trouvai ici une lettre de sa part à la quelle étoit jointe une copie du mémoire dont je viens de parler et que je m'empresserai d'envoyer sur le champ à M. de Grenville.

“Monseigneur le Duc voyant que ses avis en politique ne prévalaient pas à Berlin, et n'étoient pas goûtés par le Roi, s'étoit persuadé que sa correspondance avec Sa Majesté sur cette matière finiroit là, lorsqu'il reçut, ces jours passés, une lettre du Collonel Zastrow, en date du 1^{re} de ce mois, écrite par ordre du Roi, pour l'informer que le Gouvernement Batave venoit d'envoyer à Sa Majesté un nommé Vos de Steinwyk, chargé d'implorer sa protection. La lettre de Zastrow dit que les propositions que cet envoyé a fait au nom de ce Gouvernement sont; que Monseigneur le Prince héréditaire d'Orange soit mis à la tête du Gouvernement de la Hollande, avec des pouvoirs plus étendus que n'étoient aux des Stadhouders précédens, avec la clause, néanmoins, qu'il prendroit un autre titre que celui de Stadhouder, qu'on laisseroit à son choix; que pour établir solidement la constitution, on nommeroit une commission composée de douze membres dont six de la part du Roi ou du Prince et six de la part du Gouvernement Batave actuel: qui, du reste, étoit prêt à se soumettre à toutes les conditions qui pourroient lui assurer la protection du Roi: M. de Zastrow ne dit pas ce que Sa Majesté a fait répondre à ce négociateur, mais il ajoute que ses propositions ont d'abord été communiquées par M. de Haugwitz au Chargé d'Affaires d'Angleterre, et que le Sieur Vos de Steinwyk est reparti pour la Hollande.

“Aux informations précédentes contenues dans la lettre de Zastrow, se trouva aussi la réponse du Directoire François relative à la retrocession des provinces Prussiennes d'outre Rhin, que la Cour de Berlin demande depuis trois mois. Cette réponse porte en substance que Sa Majesté Prussienne ayant fait avancer son armée de neutralité jusques sur les bords du Rhin, et ce mouvement ayant tout l'air d'une menace, le Gouvernement François ne pouvoit pas acquiescer à la demande sans donner lieu à croire qu'il y auroit été porté par un mouvement de crainte qu'il étoit bien éloigné d'éprouver; qu'à l'égard du motif et des raisons qui avoient engagé Sa Majesté à demander la retrocession des dites provinces, et qui consistoient en ce qu'elle craignoit de les voir traitées comme pays ennemi, s'il arrivoit que l'armée Anglo-Russe parvint à y pénétrer, le Directoire pouvoit assurer Sa Majesté que les troupes Françaises sauroient les défendre; mais que si cependant il arrivoit, contre toute attente, qu'elles s'y vissent attaquées par des forces supérieures, que pour une défense commune, Sa Majesté n'auroit alors qu'à joindre ses troupes aux troupes Françaises qui s'y trouveroient.

“M. de Zastrow dit que cette réponse (ironique et insultante) a d'autant plus surpris le Roi que l'agent du Directoire à Berlin, le Citoyen Otto, en avoit fait espérer une plus satisfaisante, mais il ajoute qu'on ignore quel parti Sa Majesté prendra dans cette affaire. La réponse que Monsieur le Duc a faite à cet officier,³ dont je joins ici une copie, seroit bien faite, si le Roi la voit, à le déterminer à prendre un parti digne de sa Majesté, mais je doute qu'elle fasse cet effet.

“J'avois pris tous les arrangements nécessaires pour me rendre d'ici à Embden, afin de me rapprocher de M. de Grenville qui m'en avoit prié.

“Une toux violente, accompagnée de douleurs rhumatismales dans la poitrine, m'oblige depuis deux jours à garder la chambre; et Dieu sait si, et quand, je serai en état de me mettre en route.”

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1799, October ?]—“Permettez moi de vous demander en confidence si vous avez reçu aujourd'hui quelque nouvelle désagréable de Vienne. Vous connoissez ma façon de penser, et n'ignorez pas que vous pouvez me le dire. Ce qui me porte à vous faire cette question c'est le langage extraordinaire et continuellement critique de Sa Majesté ce matin au lever, au sujet de notre Cour. Je vous avoue que cela m'a affligé, surtout à cause de la présence de mes collègues. J'ai présumé que nous avons peut-être fait quelque sottise, ce qui me peinerait beaucoup. Si ce n'est qu'une disposition particulière du Roi aujourd'hui, ou même un conséquence de quelques calomnies de notre ami commun, dont je resterai toujours l'ami, quoiqu'il ne soit plus le mien, je m'en consolerais, meliora tempora sperans. Adieu, pardon, mais ma confiance, mon intrusion même, vous prouvent mon attachement.”

WILLIAM WICKHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

[October.]—"The Marshal flew, or pretended to fly, into a violent passion, sent the man out of the room, and asked the other where was Ravensburg. 'At 8 leagues from Augsbουργ,' says the man. 'Bon,' says the Marshal; '8 leagues make four German miles, and my troops march 8 German miles a day if necessary. Let the hospital however march only four German miles, in which case it will be here in one day.' The poor man attempted to explain, but orders were given accordingly, and an official letter written in my presence to General Hiller to provide for the hospital on one day's march from Ravensburg. Now from Ravensburg (where, by the by, the hospital consists of above 3,000 wounded) to Waldsee there are 5 leagues; from Waldsee to Warzach, 5; from Warzach to Memmingen, 5; from Memmingen to Mindelheim, 4; from Mindelheim to Schroabumken, 6; and from thence to Augsburg, 4.

"Whether this be ignorance, wit, or madness it is the same thing in its consequences to the poor people of the country where this army resides, and to the generals of the Allies who are to repair, and explain to themselves and to others, all these absurdities.

"In one word we must get rid of these people as fast as possible, or we shall all be involved in the same disgrace and reproach. I could go on for hours with histories of the same kind, to some of which I have been an eye-witness myself, others I have heard from persons who were in every respect unprejudiced. All this evil is, I fear, incurable under the present Emperor. This army is his own creature, and no one dares to speak to him of its defects. His vanity, I understand, passes all bounds, and his violence is still greater than his vanity. Suvarow, who is one of the most cunning, artful men I ever met with on public business, has never yet taken a step of any kind without having first learnt the Emperor's private opinion, if not on the very measure at least on something analogous to it.

"I had a letter from Whitworth yesterday, in which he says that the Emperor reproached him with being a friend of the Austrians. Your Lordship will recollect that Suvarow attempted to pay me the same compliment; among other things I remember he told me on that occasion 'que Whitworth feroit mieux de jouer le God damn, que de se laisser duper par Cobenzell.' I have since learnt that Colonel Kurtuchoff, who had just then brought him despatches from Petersburg, had told him that Whitworth was not a match for Cobenzell, and that the Emperor had expressed this opinion to Rastopchin.

"I beg pardon for all the nonsense I have been scribbling, but sometimes from such things a spark of light may be struck out, which I am sure your Lordship will not fail to turn to advantage."

[The beginning of this letter is missing.]

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, October —. Downing Street.—“I return Woronzow's and Kalitcheff's letters. Lord Minto's I had read as attentively as possible. Your note to Starhemberg seems absolutely necessary, and I have given it to Taylor to forward. It will, I think, silence him.”

APPENDIX.

LORD GRENVILLE to the PRINCE OF ORANGE.*

1798, April 18. Downing Street.—“ En conséquence de la permission que votre altesse sérénissime a bien voulu me donner ce matin, j’ai l’honneur de lui expliquer de cette manière l’objet de la communication dont Sa Majesté m’a chargé auprès de votre altesse. La nécessité d’opérer (s’il est encore possible) une réunion entre les grandes puissances du Continent pour s’opposer aux progrès ultérieurs des François, et les difficultés que présenteroient à cet égard les prétensions respectives de l’Autriche et de la Prusse pour s’indemniser aux dépens de l’Empire, ne sont pas inconnus à votre altesse. Elle n’ignore pas non plus combien ces difficultés pourroient tenir à cette stipulation du traité entre le feu Roi de Prusse et la Directoire Français, par laquelle il étoit convenu que votre altesse sérénissime seroit compensée pour sa renonciation au Stadthouderat, par l’acquisition d’une indemnité territoriale dans l’Empire, laquelle seroit en partie le résultat des sécularisations qu’on méditoit alors. Sa Majesté connoissant la justice, le désintéressement, et les sentimens élevés de votre altesse, a pensé qu’il seroit digne d’elle de déclarer formellement tant à Vienne qu’à Berlin, qu’elle renonçoit à ces idées de dédommagement par des acquisitions territoriales aux dépens d’autrui, et rien ne pourroit plus qu’une pareille déclaration contribuer à écarter les obstacles qui s’opposent encore à cette réunion, d’où dépend le salut du continent de l’Europe. Sa Majesté m’a donc chargé de lui en faire la proposition, en ajoutant que si elle ne voyait aucun inconvénient de charger de cette commission si honorable M. le Général de Stamford (dont personne ne connoît mieux le mérite distingué) cela pourroit encore être d’un grand avantage pour le succès des objets majeurs dont il est question. Les sentimens nobles et équitables que votre altesse sérénissime a montrés dès le moment que j’ai commencé de m’acquitter des ordres du Roi à cet égard, ne me laissent rien à désirer quant au rapport que je dois en faire à Sa Majesté, et n’ont pu qu’ajouter à la vénération et au profond respect qui m’ont toujours animé à son égard.”

The following confidential reports from Mr. Liston, British Minister at Stockholm, in regard to the murder of Gustavus III,

* Omitted from a previous volume.

King of Sweden, and the Regency of the Duke of Sudermania, were found subsequently to the publication of Lord Grenville's other papers relating to the same period.

ROBERT LISTON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, August 26. Stockholm.—“As the fate of the conspirators is now finally decided, and I may not again have occasion to mention their names to your Lordship, it may be proper that I should say something of the character of these men, and of the motives which induced them to unite in an attack on the life of their sovereign. The place which their crimes have acquired them in the history of the present times will justify my claiming your Lordship's attention to the subject for a few moments.

“I begin with Count Ribbing, who may be said, perhaps beyond any of the others, to have been the spring and mover of the conspiracy. He had imbibed from his infancy strong principles of republican liberty, and having spent some years in the French service at a very early period of life (he is now only 27) he returned to his native country with a super-addition of the notions which became fashionable in Europe at the close of the American war. The character and measures of Gustavus III. were so incompatible with these sentiments that Monsieur de Ribbing soon discovered an intention to enter into formal opposition to his sovereign; and being of an active and enterprising spirit, and possessed of good abilities, he came to be considered by his late Swedish Majesty as a formidable enemy. On the commencement of the war against Russia, without the consent of the Estates of the kingdom, Monsieur de Ribbing, to preserve consistency in his political conduct, thought himself obliged to resign his commission of Captain in the King's Guards; and a necessity which seemed to cut off his hopes of future advancement had the effect upon a haughty and ambitious mind of converting a spirit of opposition into private enmity to the King's person. His temper was further soured by the disappointment of his hopes of contracting an advantageous marriage. He had made his addresses to a young woman of beauty and fortune, and had been not unfavourably received; but the lady's relations, and in the end she herself also, gave the preference to Baron Essun, one of the King's favourites, in consequence, as Monsieur de Ribbing supposed, of an interference of his Swedish Majesty. He attempted to revenge himself by challenging his rival; but he had the misfortune to be wounded, and Monsieur d'Essun carried off the prize. Count Ribbing afterwards retired to his mother's estate; but he was soon disgusted with the life of the country, and despairing of being able to effectuate anything in opposition to a Prince whose good fortune seemed to triumph over every difficulty, he had formed the resolution of quitting Sweden, when the unexpected rumour of an Assembly of the States to be holden at Gefle, and his accidental meeting with Ankarström, inspired him with other thoughts. It was expected that the nobility would have made such resistance to his Swedish Majesty's plans at that Diet that he would have been induced to employ violent measures; and as the resolution was taken by the majority of the Opposition eventually to repel force by force, it was thought that the confusion of the struggle would have afforded a favourable opportunity of taking away his Majesty's life. But the nobles, contrary to the wishes and efforts of Ribbing, prevented extremities by the moderation of their conduct, and by their final compliance with the greater part of the King's demands. Count Ribbing appears, however, to have returned from Gefle familiarised with the idea of using violence towards the King, and to have had recourse with little or no scruple to the desperate fanaticism of Ankarström. Determined and zealous as this man was, he seems at the same time to have needed the countenance and exhortations of Ribbing to embolden him to proceed. One of the circumstances which had the greatest effect upon him was that, when he mentioned the subject of the murder, Ribbing used to laugh him to scorn, as having undertaken what he had not the courage to execute. Ankarström still put off the horrid deed on various pretences, and would have done so once more the night of the fatal masquerade had not Ribbing urged that the blow must be struck then or not at all, for that, if it were deferred a day longer, they would infallibly be betrayed. At the consummation of the shocking business, Ribbing not only pointed out the King to Ankarström (who was not sure that he could distinguish his Majesty in mask) but is said to have covered the pistol at the moment of its being fired off with the sleeve of his domino, and even (though this did not appear in evidence) to have supported the trembling hand of the assassin.

"Of Count Horn it is remarkable that he is of the same family with the gentleman of that name who lost his head in 1756 for attempting, in conjunction with Count Brahé, to effectuate a change of government calculated to give the sovereign of Sweden a greater degree of authority; and that his father, who is still alive, was one of the most zealous supporters of the revolution of 1772, and the most enthusiastic and extravagant of the admirers of Gustavus III. It is true this last gentleman joined the rest of the nobility in disapproving of the further alterations in the constitution which the King attempted to make in 1789, and he was one of those who were imprisoned on account of their opposition in the Diet on that occasion. The young Count Horn, a schoolfellow and intimate friend of Ribbing, was educated in the same principles of republicanism, and adopted similar sentiments of disaffection to the late King's government and person. He imitated Ribbing's example in resigning his commission of Major in the army in 1789. He retired to a small country seat, not far distant from Stockholm, married, and had several children; amused himself with the occupations of the country, and with poetry and music, for which he had a considerable degree of genius; and having less ambition and less ability for public affairs, he had given up all idea of entering into active opposition, and would probably have ended his days in a quiet retreat had he not been roused by the proposals and solicitations of Ankarström and Ribbing. In the progress of the conspiracy, too, he seems at times to have recoiled at the idea of shedding the King's blood, and to have expressed a strong desire that a change of government might be attempted by other means. It was with this view that he engaged Ankarström to traverse with him, in a winter evening, the park of Haga, and to reconnoitre the small palace where the King lodged, in order to see whether it might not be possible to carry off His Majesty and to keep him in confinement till a revolution should be effected, to which they might afterwards extort his consent. But Ribbing uniformly insisted on the impossibility of effecting anything while the King was suffered to live; and Ankarström remonstrated against this enterprise on account of the guards and attendants who surrounded the King at that country seat, and the consequent necessity of admitting a great number of persons into the secret. A singular circumstance is said to have taken place on this occasion. Ankarström's real intention is thought to have been to shoot the King through the window of his apartment at Haga, had he found a proper opportunity; and Horn and he went near enough to see His Majesty sitting in an easy chair alone, in a small room adjoining to his library; but as he was lying much back in the chair, and appeared to them extremely pale, they imagined he had died suddenly and retired without effecting their purpose. The King's appearance is accounted for by the recollection of those who were near his person, that one evening, about the time alluded to, His Majesty had had his hair dressed, and happened to fall asleep without having the powder wiped from his face.

"In the meantime Count Horn's house served as a place of rendezvous to the conspirators, and the momentary fits of remorse to which he seems to have been subject, did not prevent him, in the general course of his conduct, from encouraging and aiding Ankarström in the prosecution of his purpose. He made him frequent visits, procured him a place in a box at the opera, with a view to the intended assassination at that theatre. He afterwards was present at Ankarström's lodgings while the pistols were loaded, accompanied him from thence to the masquerade, and provided himself with arms, to be used in all probability in the bustle which was expected to succeed the King's death.

"Deeply as Counts Horn and Ribbing appear to have been concerned in the murderous plot, a considerable part of the public speak with greater horror of the species of guilt incurred by Monsieur de Liljehorn, Lieutenant-Colonel of the King of Sweden's Guards. This gentleman, the son of an officer who had a large family and no fortune, was educated in the palace of Stockholm (where his mother obtained the place of a chamber-keeper) under the eye, and it may be said at the expense of the late King, who took such a kind care of the fortune of Liljehorn and of the rest of the family as might have been expected of an affectionate brother. Colonel Liljehorn, in particular, had risen more rapidly than he had any title to expect, and he had reason to look with assurance to future advancement; the King's confidence and generosity towards him remained unabated. He acceded, however, to Count Ribbing's conspiracy against the life of his benefactor, and was an active and eminent agent in preparing the revolution which was to follow the murder. He was the chief bond of connection between the enthusiastic young men who planned the death of the sovereign and the politicians more advanced in years who undertook the task of new-modelling the Constitution. He had already engaged, in case of a rupture between the King and the nobles at Gefle, to have put himself at the head of the Guards, and to have supported the cause of opposition in the capital. Had the wound inflicted by Ankarström proved instantaneously mortal, as was expected, Monsieur de Liljehorn was in like manner to have assumed the command of the Guards, and he had ensured the assistance of some officers of the Artillery, and of the other troops in garrison at Stockholm, in support of the projected revolution.

"A return of gratitude and loyalty prompted him, however, as he pretends in his confessions, to endeavour to prevent the fatal catastrophe by means of the anonymous letter which he sent to the King a few hours before the commencement of the masquerade. But few people are inclined to give him credit for the sincerity of his good intentions in this act. The letter was entrusted by him to a person unknown, whom he happened to find standing in the street. It was uncertain whether it would reach the King's hands, and whether it would be opened, if it did. Besides, Colonel Liljehorn was perfectly acquainted with the King's character. He knew that he had been accustomed to receive numerous threatening letters, without paying any attention to them; and that warning his Majesty against danger to be apprehended in any particular place was the surest way to induce him to go immediately to the spot. And as Monsieur de Liljehorn had at all times free and confidential access to the King, he had it in his power, had he been in earnest, to have personally given such notice as would have had the desired effect. It is not therefore unnatural to infer that his real view was to secure his own pardon, in the event of the failure and discovery of the plot, and had the King recovered, there is no doubt that he would have obtained this end, whatever had been the fate of the other offenders. The King saw him twice after he was wounded, and was extremely affected when he learnt the share he had had in the conspiracy. His Majesty exclaimed in imitation of Cæsar, Et vous aussi, Liljehorn! and made it his dying request that he at least should not suffer.

"In the course of his defence, Liljehorn urged at great length, and with specious reasoning, that the strain of the letter in question, and the peculiar circumstances stated in it, were of a nature to have attracted the King's serious attention, and consequently to have averted the danger. As the Gazettes have in general given a defective account of that remarkable paper, I take the liberty of enclosing an exact copy of it. But admitting his intentions to have been such as he professes them, he then incurs the blame of having taken a step which tended to the discovery and ruin of his friends engaged in the conspiracy:—for the natural consequence of the intimation if credited (and what would actually have taken place if Baron Armfeldt had happened to sup that evening with the King) was that the doors of the masquerade should have been shut, by command of His Majesty, and a general search made for offensive weapons, which were prohibited by the regulations of the house; the pistols and knife would have detected Ankarström, and torture might have drawn from him the names of other conspirators. The apprehension of this consequence appears indeed but little to have affected Monsieur de Liljehorn. He was no sooner suspected and committed to prison (on the evidence of the bearer of the anonymous letter who happened to recognize his person) than he betrayed the names of his principal accomplices, and in the sequel he related every circumstance respecting everyone of the persons concerned, to the utmost extent of his knowledge.

“It was in consequence of his information that Horn and Ribbing and the other leaders were arrested. A confession was drawn from them, partly by an idea of the inutility of denial after the precise detail into which he had entered, partly by the dread of torture, partly by the honourable desire of freeing the rest of the nobility from the unjust suspicions entertained against them, and from the danger (which in the first moment was not imaginary) of an attack on the whole order by the enraged populace. The confession of Ribbing and Horn occasioned, in its turn, that of Ankarström, who, had they remained silent, would have persevered in denying that he had any accomplices. So that upon the whole, the conduct of Liljehorn alone produced a discovery of the other conspirators, and an explanation of the motives of an event which might otherwise have been attributed to the private revenge of a desperate individual.

“In no particular has the conduct of Liljehorn been more generally or more severely condemned than in his gratuitously informing against Baron Ehrensværd, the fourth person condemned to death for being accessory to the murder of the late King.

“The father of this young gentleman had, in his last will, and on his deathbed, recommended him to the particular care of Monsieur de Liljehorn; and Baron Ehrensværd was drawn into the conspiracy in a great measure by his attachment and respect for his guardian, who indeed enjoyed a universal good character for honour, virtue and good conduct. The young man was fully informed of the purposed attack upon the King’s life, and had engaged to do his utmost to contribute towards the subsequent revolution. But as he received his intelligence from Monsieur de Liljehorn, and had confidential communications on the subject with him only, a discovery of his guilt was the less necessary ; and Monsieur de Liljehorn had given him his promise that at all events his name should never be mentioned ; an assurance which prevented Ehrensværd from endeavouring to make his escape, which he had time to have done. Yet Liljehorn was no sooner put under examination than he disclosed every particular which could inculcate his young friend ; the consequence of which was his imprisonment, and finally his condemnation to death.

“ Of the remaining offenders the only prominent figure is Major-General Pechlin, a gentleman whose talents have assigned him a distinguished rank in the annals of party in Sweden, but who has not been less noted for duplicity of conduct and indelicacy in the means of attaining his ends. It is remembered and quoted as a trait that sufficiently marks his character, that, when a boy, he essentially served one of the contending factions of the day by concealing himself in a chimney that he might overhear the conferences held with his father, and afterwards betraying the secrets, thus learnt, to his employers.

“ Count Ribbing and his associates were forced to have recourse to this man, because they stood in need of some persons of experience and abilities to direct the operations of the intended revolution, and they felt it impossible to obtain of the Fersens, the Brahès, the De Geers, and the other chiefs of the Opposition, to enter into any plan that was to commence with assassination.

“ I have formerly mentioned that Monsieur de Pechlin had proceeded with so much caution that no legal proof could be brought of his participation in the conspiracy. In this situation with the strongest suspicion prevailing against him, it is remarkable, and extremely fortunate for him, that the moderation of the majority of his judges and the clemency of the Duke of Sudermania prevented his being put to the torture (he only suffered from some irregularities which took place at his first examination before the Master of the Police) ; for it was recollected that he had been active in personally conducting the interrogatories by torture which were adhibited in the trials for Count Brahé's conspiracy in 1756 ; and his enemies thought the present a natural time for retaliation.

“ When I employ the word torture, it is proper to explain that the application of any particular instrument for that purpose was abolished by the Swedish Diet so long ago as 1736, and that persons in General Pechlin's situation could from thenceforward be subjected only to what was termed a strait prison. But this, in fact, was rendered equivalent to torture. The supposed offenders were thrust into a narrow cell, the floor of which was covered with mud, or with insufferably cold water. They were placed in such a position as to prevent them from lying down to sleep, and were exposed to other inconveniences at the pleasure of the examiners. The late King built up the door of this shocking receptacle, and it was never used during his reign.

“ Persons who are criminals according to the persuasion of the judges, but who obstinately withhold their own acknowledgments of their guilt, which by the practice of the Courts is necessary in order to their condemnation, are, pursuant to the ancient Swedish law, confined in prison for an unlimited time, till they come to a sense of their guilt, and make confession. An attempt was made soon after the period of Count Brahé's conspiracy to abolish this law, and to enact that the man against whom there was no legal proof of guilt should be fully restored to liberty. But this act was prevented from passing by the warm opposition made to it in the Diet by General Pechlin. And it is singular that he is the first person that has been in the predicament since that time, and who is to suffer in consequence of the protracted existence of the old statutes.

"General Pechlin's confinement is, however, in the first instance, to be considered as a favour to him; for had he been set at liberty at the present moment, he would have been in great danger of falling a sacrifice to the multitude.

"Of the other conspirators, particularly those of the name of Engström, I shall only say that it has been matter of surprise that men advanced in life, of respected characters, and in easy circumstances, should have been induced to engage in a plot of so atrocious a nature.

"It is indeed remarkable that, if General Pechlin is excepted, there was not among the members of the conspiracy (who are known) any one man of profligate manners or desperate fortune; and private animosity seems to have held but a secondary place among the motives of action. They appear all to have been misled by erroneous ideas of patriotism, and blinded by enthusiasm to a degree which made them consider every extremity as justifiable, in order to stop the King's progress towards despotism. Counts Ribbing and Horn used (by a wonderful stretch of imagination surely) to draw a parallel between Nero and Gustavus III., and mutually inflamed their disloyalty by applying to the King the expressions which Tacitus has employed with regard to the tyrant. Ankarström reasoned on the subject with a coolness which struck his judges with astonishment and horror. 'The King,' said he, 'had so often broken his oaths, that he was in my eyes no longer a King, but a tyrant, to whom no allegiance was due. He had set himself above the laws; he was therefore to be regarded as an outlaw whom every man was free to kill. I sometimes indeed asked myself: "But am I not going to commit a bad action?" "By no means," my conscience answered, "if you were in distress and could not extricate yourself, would you not expect that your neighbours, if they could, should relieve you? You have it in your power to relieve your poor country from oppression and misery. It is a merit, it is a duty."'

"Nothing precise can be said with respect to the total number of the conspirators, the steps that were to be taken after the King's death, nor the nature of the revolution that was to follow; the principal conduct of the business having been assigned to General Pechlin and Baron Bielke, the one of whom has observed an obstinate silence, and the other laid violent hands on himself that he might not be constrained to break it. It is only known, in general, that the Prince Royal was immediately to have been placed upon the throne, and the Queen declared Regent. Her Majesty was to have been assisted by a provisional Council, composed of those who had been members of the former Senate, and some of the most eminent persons in the kingdom. As soon as possible a Diet was to have been assembled, and proposals made for a change in the constitution, concerning which, however, the members of the conspiracy were not perfectly agreed among themselves, the elder part of them having shown a desire to re-establish, with only a few inessential differences, the ancient form of the Swedish Government, or to imitate that of England; while the younger men were eager to adopt the greatest part of the modern ideas of France."

ROBERT LISTON to LORD GRENVILLE.

1792, August 26. Stockholm.—"As I am on the point of my departure from Stockholm, I propose to carry this letter with me at least as far as Elsinore, and I take the opportunity of adding a few words, without the encumbrance of cypher, to what I have formerly stated to your Lordship concerning the present situation of affairs in Sweden, and the system of administration adopted by the guardians of the young King.

"The Duke of Sudermania appears now to have abandoned himself entirely to the guidance of Baron Reuterholm, assisted by Baron Bonde, and Baron Staël de Holstein, formerly Ambassador at the Court of France.

"I have already had the honour of mentioning Monsieur de Reuterholm.

"Baron Bonde is a man of more art than ability, noted for his opposition to the late King, which he carried so far as to renounce his prospects of advancement in the military service rather than take the oath to the new government in 1789. He has long enjoyed the friendship and confidence of the Duke of Sudermania, and is deeply initiated in the mysteries of Freemasonry and the delusions of the modern illumination.

"Monsieur de Staël's character is probably known to your Lordship by information from another quarter. To me he appears to be a man of slender talents, great self-opinion, and a tiresome loquacity. The commonplace knowlege, however, which he has acquired in the diplomatic career has a certain effect on the Duke of Sudermania, who has not been accustomed either to speak or think much on the subject of politics.

"In ideas of republican liberty Monsieur de Staël is not behind the two others. The late King was so well acquainted with his sentiments, and thought the propagation of them so dangerous that, having ordered him to withdraw from Paris last year in consequence of the suspension of the royal functions, His Majesty had determined to arrest Monsieur de Staël on his arrival in Sweden, on pretence that he had exceeded his orders, which were to leave France, but not to proceed further.

"The empire which these gentlemen have acquired over the mind of the Duke of Sudermania accounts for the different colour which his government gradually assumes, and gives room to expect still farther and more consequential changes.

"It is thus that His Royal Highness on his first accession to the regency gave assurances to the public that the laws should have their course against the persons concerned in the murder of the King; but has since consented to alleviate the punishment of the principal offenders. The dissatisfaction which has been felt on this occasion through the country is more extensive and more violent than the Duke seems to be aware; but I beg leave to repeat what I have formerly said, that no serious consequences are likely to ensue. Some attempts were made by the populace in Scania to proceed to extremities against the conspirators, on their passage towards Denmark; but they were easily repressed by the governors of the towns. With the rest of the nation there remains a violent and inactive disapprobation, which will by degrees die away and vanish.

"It has been remarked, with a degree of truth, that greater favour has been shown to the managers of the plot than to the more distant participators in it:—that the destitution of office, and the temporary or perpetual imprisonment which is likely to be the lot of the other accomplices, is a more severe punishment than the simple necessity of leaving the country which has been imposed on Messieurs Ribbing, Horn, Liljehorn, and Ehrensvärd.

"But it is answered that their confinement and imprisonment in Sweden would have perpetuated the remembrance which it is the Duke's wish to efface, and have defeated His Royal Highness's great purpose of general and perfect reconciliation. It has been urged to the Duke that the example he has given of the impunity of regicide is of dangerous effect to the security of his own Government. His answer implied a severe censure of his late brother's administration: 'when Governors,' said he, 'are strictly just, it is my opinion that subjects will be loyal and quiet.'

"All those who aided or advised the late King, or who enjoyed any considerable share of his confidence, continue to be removed from the places of trust which they held under him. This is done, however, without any appearance of animosity. The usage of Sweden has been adhered to which forbids any man's being dismissed from the public service without being brought to a previous trial for misconduct. The confidential servants of the late monarch have been therefore advanced to stations of greater dignity, though perhaps less important or agreeable, such as honourable sinecures, or governments in the more distant provinces.

"It is now in agitation, however, to call to an account all those who were entrusted with any part of the public expenditure during the course of the late war. That great malversation took place in the different branches during that period is certain; but there is danger that, in the present moment, enquiry may degenerate into persecution.

"There is no doubt that the gentlemen who surround the Duke of Sudermania mean, if possible, to carry their republican theories respecting government into execution. The only question is when and how they propose to attempt it.

"It is said that Baron Reuterholm had wished immediately to assemble the States, on pretence of regulating matters of finance (in consequence of the discovery of some new debts which the late King had concealed from the Diet of Gefle) and that propositions were to have been brought forward for abolishing all the recent changes, and modelling the form of government to the general satisfaction of the nation.

"But if this overture was actually made by Monsieur de Reuterholm, who had long been absent from Sweden, it was felt by his co-operators that the state of affairs did not by any means make the measure advisable. In calling a Diet, and attempting changes in the Constitution, contrary to the express injunction of the late King's testament, the Duke seemed to contest and annul the only authority by which he himself was entitled to hold the reins of government. And had it been possible to effect alterations, the Acts passed on the subject during the minority of the King, would not have acquired the necessary stability. But the spirit of the country is at this moment so extremely averse to the class of nobility that any propositions made by them would most probably have been rejected. Indeed the great body of the people are too ignorant and too indifferent to find any fault with the innovations introduced by Gustavus the Third, or to wish for any change whatever in the Constitution. There is therefore reason to suppose that the attempt will be deferred till the King comes of age, and that, in the meantime, pains will be taken by the leaders of the Duke's government to pave the way for their projected ameliorations, by spreading information among the people, and endeavouring to acquire popularity for themselves.

"This will account for the issuing of the said edict in favour of the liberty of the Press, which was the more remarkable because the Duke, at the commencement of his regency, not only allowed the late King's prohibition of all newspapers and pamphlets relative to French affairs to remain in force, but requested the Foreign Ministers not to communicate to the people of the country the papers they might receive on that subject.

"To the same motives may be attributed other Ministerial publications; such as an edict abolishing the practice of kneeling before the King; a proclamation against luxury, in the language of admonition, not of command; and more of the same nature may be expected.

"With regard to foreign politics, I have on former occasions mentioned to your Lordship how little the Duke of Sudermania thought the situation of Sweden could justify her interfering in the affairs of France; and His Royal Highness has of late borrowed his sentiments on that subject so much from his conversations with Monsieur de Staël, that I am persuaded he would now decline giving any assistance to Lewis the Sixteenth, even were the armies of Sweden ready to march, and her finances in the highest state of prosperity.

"His Royal Highness's advisers are on terms of great coldness with the Russian Ambassador; and I think I may add that they are disinclined to the alliance with Russia, and would look forward with pleasure to a change of system, could an ally be found of sufficient weight to balance the dreaded preponderance of that power.

"The Duke of Sudermania behaves to the young King with the affection, but at the same time with the authority of a parent. His Royal Highness says he found a degree of rigidity necessary from the manner in which the Prince had been treated by those that were placed about his person, who had taken care to let him know that he was a prince, but never made him feel that he was a man. The Duke adds he has now perfectly succeeded in repressing the nascent faults of character which were the consequence of this education.

"For the rest, the young Prince promises well. His person is handsome; his manners graceful; his politeness general yet distinguishing, and his conversation sensible beyond his years. His preceptors speak highly of his application, and his progress in his studies, and his dispositions appear to be excellent. If any defect is observable, it is perhaps a degree of reserve and timidity which he has inherited of the Queen his mother, but which begins to wear off as he advances in years."

1799, July.—MEMOIRE by H. FAGEL (formerly Greffier) in regard to the changes advisable in the old constitution of the Dutch Republic.

"Il est beaucoup plus facile d'indiquer les défauts auxquels l'ancienne constitution de la République des Provinces Unies étoit sujette, que de hazarder une opinion sur les remèdes qu'on pourroit y apporter.

"Cette constitution avoit des défauts qui lui étoient communs avec toutes les formes de gouvernement fédératives; mais elle en avoit d'autres qui étoient intimement liés à l'histoire de sa formation, et à la nature du gouvernement qui existoit dans les Provinces, du temps qu'elles étoient encore sous la domination de l'Espagne. Il résulte de là qu'il est très-difficile de corriger ces défauts sans toucher à des institutions plus anciennes que la République même. Il seroit aisé de la prouver, mais cela entraîneroit dans trop de détails, et l'on se contentera ici des observations suivantes.

"L'Union d'Utrecht a toujours été regardée comme la loi fondamentale sur laquelle la constitution de la République de Provinces Unies est fondée. Si l'on remonte aux temps où cette Union fut conclue, et aux circonstances qui l'amenerent, on verra qu'on ne songea point dans ce temps-là à établir une constitution, mais qu'on eut simplement en vue de conclure un traité ; par lequel les Provinces et villes qui y prirent part fixèrent les mesures les plus propres à donner toute la consistance possible à leurs communs efforts contre le Roi d'Espagne, avec qui elles étoient en guerre. Si l'intention des auteurs de ce traité, particulièrement du Prince Guillaume d'Orange, un des plus grands hommes d'état de son siècle, avoit été de jeter les fondemens d'une République, ou s'ils avoient pu prévoir seulement que cette ligue serviroit un jour de base à la consitution d'un état destiné à jouer un rôle parmi les principales puissances de l'Europe, il n'est pas douteux qu'ils n'eussent fait adopter un plan tout différent.

“ Lorsque l'indépendance de la République fut reconnue par le Traité de Munster en 1648, et après la mort du Prince Guillaume II. d'Orange, les suites de l'union imparfaite des Provinces devinrent plus apparentes. Elles s'étoient déjà fait sentir pendant les négociations qui précédèrent la trêve de 12-ans, mais on les remarqua bien davantage d'abord après la paix de Westphalie. On en vit la preuve dans la convocation, et plus encore dans le résultat peu satisfaisant de la Grande Assemblée de 1651. Cependant le génie de De Witt, et ensuite celui du Roi Guillaume comprimerent les élémens de discorde toujours prêts à se développer, et réussirent en dirigeant les volontés vers le même but, à maintenir une autorité prépondérante au-dedans, et à faire respecter la République au-dehors. Elle atteignit certainement le plus haut période de sa gloire dans l'intervalle qui s'écoula entre la paix de Westphalie et celle d'Utrecht.

“ D'abord, après la mort du Roi Guillaume en 1702, mais plus encore après la paix d'Utrecht, les mêmes inconvéniens dont on s'étoit déjà plaint reprirent le dessus. Ils donnerent lieu à la convocation d'une seconde Assemblée extraordinaire en 1707, qui se sépara tout aussi infructueusement que la première. Le mal augmenta jusqu'en 1748, et le mécontentement général qui en resulta, joint à d'autres causes et à l'amour qu'une grande partie de la nation a toujours porté à la maison d'Orange, occasionna le rétablissement du Stadhoudérat, qui eut lieu dans cette année. Depuis lors les mêmes causes ont continué à produire les mêmes effets, et dans les derniers temps qui ont précédé l'invasion des François en 1795, le manque d'union entre les confédérés, et surtout d'énergie dans le Gouvernement avoient tellement pris le dessus, que ce qu'il y a eu de surprenant n'a pas été le renversement de l'édifice, mais de l'avoir vu résister aussi longtemps à la destruction qui le menaçoit.

"Le sentiment des imperfections et de la faiblesse du Gouvernement, tel qu'il existoit avant cette époque, a produit et devoit nécessairement produire le désir d'un changement quelconque. Ce désir est devenu fort général, et a donné naissance à plusieurs projets, surtout depuis que la destruction totale de l'ancien Gouvernement à la suite de la révolution de 1795 semble avoir laissé le champ libre aux amateurs de ces sortes de spéculations. Aujourd'hui que l'apparence d'un changement favorable dans l'état politique de la Hollande augmente de jour en jour, on doit s'attendre de plus en plus à de nouveaux plans de cette espèce. Il y aura autant de projets que d'individus qui se croiront appelés à en faire. Il est facile aussi de prévoir que des vues personnelles influenceront sur ces plans, de même que sur l'opposition qu'ils pourront rencontrer. Malheureusement l'intérêt particulier a toujours prévalu dans les Provinces-Unies sur le bien public. Plusieurs personnes parlent de la constitution Angloise, et de l'avantage qu'il y auroit à l'adopter. Il semble qu'il ne sauroit y avoir (aujourd'hui surtout) qu'une seule opinion sur l'excellence de cette constitution. Mais ceux qui la vantent indistinctement, et qui voudroient la voir établie partout, n'ont peut-être pas assez réfléchi à son origine et à sa formation. Elle est, pour ainsi dire, née avec le pays dont elle fait le bonheur; c'est une production de son sol, qui s'est développée peu-à-peu, qui n'a atteint que lentement, après bien des épreuves et des secousses, le degré de perfection où elle est maintenant parvenue; et qui, transplantée sur un terroir étranger, ne réussiroit peut-être pas également bien. Dans tout pays une bonne constitution doit être avant tout conforme aux usages, aux mœurs, aux loix, et au caractère des habitans: elle doit leur avoir été, pour ainsi dire, transmise de père en fils, formée, réparée et perfectionnée pas les mêmes mains. Ces vérités, établies sur la nature des choses, sont confirmées par l'expérience, et celle de nos jours a suffisamment prouvé quel fond l'on peut faire sur les constitutions qui n'ont que la seule théorie pour base. Cela n'empêche pas qu'on ne puisse s'approprier avec fruit les modèles avantageux qu'offrent des gouvernemens différens du notre, en les adaptant autant qu'il est possible au génie de la constitution qu'on veut perfectionner.

"D'après ces principes on est fondé à croire qu'il faudroit dans les Provinces-Unies tirer de leur ancienne constitution même les remèdes à ses défauts. Il n'est pas inutile de remarquer à ce sujet qu'un des caractères distinctifs de la nation Hollandoise est son attachement à ses anciennes loix, à ses usages, et jusqu'aux préjugés que ses ancêtres lui ont transmis. En modifiant les institutions auxquelles elle a été jusqu'à présent accoutumée, il faudroit éviter autant que possible d'en altérer les formes ou les dénominations. Ce sont des mots, mais des mots auxquels la nation attache d'anciennes idées de bonheur et de prospérité. Si on les changeoit, il est à craindre que la masse du peuple (surtout après ce qu'il vient d'éprouver en fait d'innovations) ne se prévint dès l'origine contre des établissemens utiles en eux-mêmes, et que cette prévention ne rendit illusoirs les avantages que de pareils changemens pourroient d'ailleurs produire.

“ De l'autre côté il est évident que l'époque du renversement du Gouvernement révolutionnaire actuel sera singulièrement favorable à l'introduction de tous les changemens avantageux qu'on voudra faire, et qu'il sera de la dernière importance de ne pas laisser échapper une occasion pareille sans en profiter. Le gros de la nation est las au dernier point du joug insupportable sous lequel elle a gémi depuis plus de quatre ans. Tout changement lui paroitra un bien, surtout sous les heureux auspices du retour et du rétablissement de la maison d'Orange. Elle accueillera avec faveur et empressement ce qui lui sera présenté comme propre à affermir une autorité qu'elle regarde avec raison comme salutaire et bienfaisante. L'intérêt personnel pourra seul élever un cri contre de semblables propositions. Mais comme l'établissement d'un nouvel ordre de choses ne pourra s'effectuer que par l'intervention d'une force étrangère, l'on a lieu d'espérer (et l'on doit le souhaiter ardemment) que cette force sera utilement employée à faire adopter, sans s'arrêter à aucunes considérations particulières ou personnelles, les mesures les plus propres à assurer le bien-être général. Si alors (comme on a lieu de s'en flatter) les modifications proposées obtiennent l'assentiment de la partie éclairée de la nation, il ne sera pas à craindre qu'au bout de quelques années, et du changement de circonstances qu'un semblable intervalle manque rarement d'amener, on ne se plaigne des changemens introduits comme étant l'ouvrage de la force, et ayant été imposés à la nation contre son gré.

“ Pour se faire quelqu'idée des principaux défauts de l'ancienne constitution il suffit de se rappeler que la République étoit composée de sept Provinces Souveraines et Indépendantes, dont les Députés, formant l'assemblée des Etats-Généraux, avoient la représentation de l'autorité souveraine de l'Union, sans en avoir ni la réalité, ni même aucun des véritables caractères. En vertu de l'Union d'Utrecht il falloit dans toutes les affaires importantes le consentement unanime des états de toutes les Provinces, et la majorité ne decidoit que dans les affaires ordinaires. Les pouvoirs des Députés aux Etats-Généraux étant très-limités, on étoit obligé d'avoir continuellement recours à ceux des Provinces. Délà ces délibérations interminables, cette nécessité de tout prendre ad referendum, et l'extrême difficulté, pour ne pas dire l'impossibilité, de parvenir dans les objets qui touchoient de plus près au salut de l'état à un résultat satisfaisant. Un des points les plus essentiels que les Provinces s'étoient réservées, et où l'unanimité étoit absolument requise, c'étoit la détermination du quantum des dépenses générales, auxquelles chaque Province devoit fournir sa quote-part. Il étoit presque impossible, dans ces sortes d'affaires, de parvenir à une conclusion quelconque. Et malheureusement les inconvéniens ne se borneraient pas là. En supposant que toutes les Provinces eussent consenti à certaines dépenses, et que chacune d'elles se fut engagée à fournir son contingent, il arrivoit presque toujours qu'elles mettoient de grands rétards dans leurs payemens, et très-souvent ne payoient point du tout. Et comme chacune d'elles étoit souveraine, et l'autorité des Etats-Généraux très-limitée, il n'existoit dans la République aucun pouvoir qui put contraindre les membres de l'union à remplir leurs engagements. Les mêmes imperfections se trouvoient en grande partie dans le gouvernement intérieur de chaque Province, fondé sur le même principe. Seulement, comme les membres qui composoient les Etats des Provinces étoient en plus grand nombre, et leur composition à d'autres égards plus compliquée, la difficulté de parvenir à une conclusion étoit quelquefois encore plus grande dans les Etats des Provinces, qu'à l'assemblée des Etats-Généraux. A ces défauts essentiels de la constitution s'en joignoit un autre dont les conséquences n'étoient pas moins nuisibles. Les commissions des Députés des Provinces aux Etats-Généraux et aux autres Collèges de la Généralité, n'étant que pour un terme assez court de 3 ou 6 ans, ces Députés ne perdoient presque jamais de vue l'intérêt de leur Province, ou même de la ville à laquelle ils appartenoient et où ils devoient un jour retourner, et y sacrifioient d'ordinaire le bien général. Un autre inconvénient essentiel de ce régime c'est que le gouvernement se trouvoit entre les mains d'un très grand nombre d'individus, qui tous avoient en principe des droits égaux. L'autorité ainsi divisée et, pour ainsi dire, éparpillée, étoit nécessairement affoiblie. Chacun croyoit avoir un égal droit de diriger les mesures du gouvernement; tous vouloient être consultés; tous étoient mécontents s'ils ne l'étoient point; et très-souvent il resultoit de ce mécontentement, qu'ils prenoient à tâche de contrecarrer autant qu'il étoit en leur pouvoir, et par de petits moyens, les résolutions les plus propres à avancer le bien-être général.

“ Ce tableau n'est qu'une esquisse très-imparfaite des défauts de l'ancien Gouvernement. Ils se faisoient surtout sentir dans les affaires générales de la République, et dans ses relations extérieures. On peut dire avec vérité que dans aucun pays du monde les individus ne jouissoient de plus de liberté, ne gutoient plus en paix et avec plus d'aisance et de douceur les fruits de leur industrie; que nulle part l'action du Gouvernement sur les gouvernés ne se faisoit moins sentir; mais que nulle part aussi le gouvernement, considéré dans son ensemble, et dans ses rapports avec d'autres puissances, n'étoit plus déstitué de force, de considération, et de moyens de s'en procurer.

“ Les vices de la constitution fédérative des Provinces-Unies sautoient tellement aux yeux qu'on a souvent proposé des remèdes, surtout dans les intervalles où la République a été sans Stadhouder. Mais ces remèdes n'ont jamais été adoptés qu'en partie, l'intérêt personnel ayant toujours fait rejeter tout ce qui pouvoit tendre à couper la racine du mal. A dire vrai, les expédiens qui ont été proposés en divers temps, même par les hommes les plus éclairés, et qui ont le mieux connu l'origine du Gouvernement, son histoire, et ses imperfections, n'ont été que des palliatifs. Le Stadhouderat a été considéré de tout temps comme le seul véritable remède. L'expérience a prouvé que dans les époques où la République a eu un Stadhouder à sa tête, les défauts de sa constitution se sont fait beaucoup moins sentir ; et il n'est pas douteux qu'en supposant que les charges éminentes dont les derniers Princes de la Maison d'Orange ont été revêtus soient remplies avec toute l'activité et l'énergie nécessaires, l'influence qui en accompagne l'exercice suffiroit seule pour obvier en grande partie aux inconvéniens indiqués ci-dessus. D'un autre côté il est certain que cette influence ne remédie pas à l'origine du mal ; elle sert plutôt à en prévenir les effets ; et si l'on pouvoit profiter d'un moment comme celui-ci pour tarir quelques-unes de ses sources, il est très sûr qu'on rendroit un service signalé à l'état.

“ Plus on y réfléchit, plus on est porté à croire que le seul moyen efficace d'atteindre ce but, en touchant aussi peu que possible à l'ancienne constitution des Provinces et de leurs Etats, ainsi qu'aux privilèges des différens membres qui les composent, seroit de restreindre autant que possible l'autorité des Etats des Provinces, en la bornant aux fonctions administratives, et d'augmenter dans la même proportion celle des Etats-Généraux. Il seroit trop long de développer entièrement cette idée, et il faut sans doute s'attendre à des difficultés de détail dans l'exécution. Mais quel est le plan qui n'en présente point ? et l'on croit pouvoir affirmer que celui-ci n'en renferme pas d'insurmontables. Il faudroit, à ce qu'il semble, établir pour base ; que les Provinces renonçassent expressément au droit de délibérer sur les affaires qui intéressent la généralité de l'Union ; qu'elles se soumissent sans réserve, et sans restriction quelconque, à la décision de la majorité de leurs Députés aux Etats-Généraux ; et qu'à cet effet, elles munissent ceux-ci de pouvoirs illimités pour tous les objets relatifs à l'ensemble de la République. Dès lors la nécessité de prendre toutes les affaires majeures ad referendum n'existeroit plus ; et les délibérations des Etats-Généraux ne seroient plus entravées comme elles l'étoient autrefois.

“ Il est sûr qu'au premier abord il paroitroit préférable d'abolir entièrement la distinction des Provinces, et de former d'un certain nombre de Députés choisis dans tout le pays, une Assemblée Générale. Mais cette mesure auroit l'inconvénient essentiel de changer entièrement la face des choses ; et les privilèges des différens corps qui composent les Etats, des villes, des corps des nobles seroient annulés, ce qui donneroit lieu à beaucoup de plaintes. En conservant les Etats des Provinces, leur composition pourroit aussi rester à-peu-près telle qu'elle est. L'administration intérieure de chaque Province, la fixation des charges nécessaires pour le fournissement des sommes consenties par les Etats-Généraux pour le service de l'Union, occuperoient utilement toute leur attention, et ces objets seroient même mieux réglés dans des assemblées provinciales que dans toute autre. Les privilèges des individus et des corporations seroient maintenus, et l'objet principal se trouveroit rempli. L'union d'Utrecht continueroit à faire la base de la constitution : il seroit même à désirer, qu'en adoptant les changemens proposés, les Provinces renouvellassent ce pacte solennel.

“ La plus forte objection qu'on puisse faire à ce plan seroit, qu'en l'adoptant, les Provinces les moins riches et les moins puissantes seroient en état, en obtenant la majorité, de faire prévaloir leurs avis contre celui des membres les plus considérables de l'Union. Mais il y auroit plus d'un moyen de lever cette difficulté. Peut-être pourroit-on établir que chaque Province enverroit aux Etats-Généraux un nombre de Députés proportionné à ses richesses et à ses facultés, en prenant pour base la quote-part de cette Province, telle qu'elle avoit été fixée en dernier lieu ; et qu'alors les Députés aux Etats-Généraux voteroient par tête. Peut-être aussi pourroit-on laisser subsister l'ancienne manière de voter en assignant à chaque province un nombre de votes dans la même proportion. Afin de rendre encore plus efficace l'obligation des Provinces de se soumettre en matières de finances au voeu de la majorité, on pourroit statuer, comme c'étoit clairement l'intention des auteurs de l'Union d'Utrecht, que les mêmes impôts seroient levés dans toutes les Provinces, et que chaque Province seroit tenue de fournir au trésor-général de l'Union la somme à laquelle elle auroit été imposée par les Etats-Généraux, avant de faire aucun autre paiement. En tout cas il faudroit établir comme un principe invariable, que les Provinces fourniroient au trésor, ou à la caisse générale de l'Union, les sommes requises pour les dépenses de l'Union : qu'en conséquence cette caisse seroit chargée de tous les payemens qui regardent la généralité de l'Union, et que ceci seroit en particulier applicable au payement de l'armée ; moyennant quoi tous les payemens des Provinces aux régimens ou corps qui se trouvoient (comme on avoit coutume de dire) sur leur repartition, cesseroient, avec toutes les conséquences nuisibles qui cet arrangement entraînoit.

“ Le serment particulier que les troupes prêtoient aux Etats des Provinces devoit aussi cesser. L'armée ne devoit en prêter qu'aux Etats-Généraux. Elle devoit d'ailleurs être absolument aux ordres du Capitaine-Général ; et le droit connu sous le nom de Droit des Patentes devoit être laissé au Capitaine-Général dans toute son étendue, et sans restriction quelconque.

“ En général l'autorité du Stadhouder devoit être augmentée et fortifiée par tous les moyens possibles, et le pouvoir exécutif, trop confondu dans l'ancien ordre de choses avec l'autorité législative, devoit être concentré dans ses mains. Le Stadhouder dans cette qualité a toujours été regardé comme le chef éminent de la République. C'étoit le nom que la constitution lui donnoit. Le bien de l'état exige absolument qu'il le soit en réalité, et non pas seulement en apparence. C'est à lui à diriger la marche du gouvernement, à donner l'impulsion et non à recevoir, et à proposer et à indiquer les mesures du gouvernement. En un mot le Stadhouder doit être l'ame de ce corps politique : plus il contribuera à lui donner de la vie et du mouvement, plus le but auquel cette haute dignité est destinée sera près d'être rempli.

“ Par une suite de ce qu'on vient de dire, la direction et le maniement des affaires étrangères devraient être exclusivement confiées au Stadhouder. C'est un des points de vue sous lesquels l'utilité du régime Stadhoudérien se fait le plus sentir ; et c'étoit aussi, sous l'ancien gouvernement, un des objets qui avoit le plus indispensablement besoin de réforme. Avant la dernière révolution de 1795, le désordre à cet égard en étoit venu au point que tout ce qui avoit part de près ou de loin au gouvernement prétendoit être en droit de prendre connoissance des affaires les plus secrettes. On étoit obligé de communiquer les papiers les plus importans aux membres mêmes les moins prépondérans des Assemblées Provinciales. Ceci devoit de toute nécessité être changé. Le Ministre particulièrement chargé de ce département devoit être, sous ce rapport, en relation directe avec le Stadhouder seul. Il est indispensable d'abolir ces Comités soi-disant secrets, où toutes les lettres des Ministres de la République aux Cours étrangères étoient lues, et au moyen desquels les affaires dont le secret importait le plus à l'Etat, étoient divulguées au bout de peu de jours. Si l'Assemblée des Etats-Généraux étoit constituée comme il a été proposé plus haut, il pourroit y avoir un Comité permanent pour les affaires étrangères, ayant à-peu-près les mêmes attributions que l'ancienne Bésogne secrète, à laquelle les dépêches qu'on jugeroit devoir être communiquées, pourroient l'être de l'aveu du Stadhouder ; et lequel Comité, ayant à sa tête le Prince d'Orange dans cette qualité, pourroit prendre, en cas de besoin, les résolutions urgentes, sauf à en faire rapport aux Etats-Généraux lorsqu'on le jugeroit nécessaire.

“ La direction de la Marine ne sauroit pas non plus être laissée sur le pied où elle étoit avant 1795. La nécessité de l'abolition des cinq Amirautés, telles qu'elles existoient encore alors, et de l'établissement d'un seul conseil de Marine séant à la Haye, sous les yeux de l'Amiral-Général, est aujourd'hui tellement démontrée que, malgré l'intérêt personnel des Régens, il est peu probable qu'il s'élève une seule voix en faveur de l'ancien établissement. Le projet de confier au Conseil d'Etat la direction des finances de l'Amirauté paroît très-bon.

“ Outre les grands changemens qui viennent d'être indiqués, il y en est certainement plusieurs autres qui, quoique moins importans, seroient cependant d'une grande utilité. Tels seroient : la séparation des autorités judiciaire et administrative dans tous les collèges, soit provinciaux soit de la Généralité, où ces deux pouvoirs étoient ci-devant combinés : l'établissement d'une cour de justice suprême pour l'Union : l'introduction d'un serment par lequel les Députés aux Etats-Generaux, et aux autres collèges de la Généralité, s'engageroient, en entrant en fonction, de ne consulter que l'intérêt général, abstraction faite de celui de la province ou de la ville à laquelle ils appartiendroient.

Les changemens introduits dans l'Assemblée des Etats-Généraux en rendroient peut-être quelques-uns nécessaires dans celles des Etats Provinciaux. Mais ces objets seroient bien aisés à régler, si une fois on étoit convenu des grandes reformes, et il est inutile de prolonger ce mémoire en entrant ces détails.

“ Il se présente enfin une grande question ; c'est de déterminer le mode et la forme qu'on emploiera pour proposer et faire agréer les changemens qu'on jugera nécessaires. Cela demande certainement un mur examen. On se contentera ici d'une seule remarque, c'est qu'il est infiniment à désirer qu'on fasse adopter dans le plus court délai possible les changemens qu'on proposera. Il est à prévoir qu'il pourra être question à cet effet d'une assemblée extraordinaire de Députés de toutes les Provinces. Cette voye sera peut-être jugée la plus convenable. Mais si, dans ce cas là, on ne fixe pas un terme aux délibérations d'une telle assemblée, il est fort à craindre qu'après avoir trainé en longueur, elles ne se terminent sans fruit. L'histoire de la République offre plusieurs exemples qui justifient cette crainte, et rien ne seroit plus facheux, parceque la première ferveur qui suivra une révolution étant passée, les anciens préjugés, les anciens intérêts, et les anciennes passions reprendroient le dessus, et le moment favorable seroit passé sans retour.”

(Enclosure of Lord Minto to Lord Grenville, Oct. 22, Vienna.)

MEMORANDUM by PRINCE ITALISKY, COUNT SOUVAROW RYMNITSKI.

1799, October 14. Feldkirchen.—Beau et Bon.—“ Ainsi notre opération sur Allstädten, Saint Gall, excellemment belle, mais pas bonne ! C'est celle d'Alvintzy derrière Peschiera ; c'est la dernière de Zurich.

1. “ Les Russes manquent de forces, vêtements, magasins.

2. “ Ils doivent combattre plusieurs fois sur des terrains arides, montaigneux, et dangereux, perdant conséquemment du monde, dont il en reste peu avant de parvenir à Winterthur.

3. “ Massena n'a nulle raison de nous y attendre pour nous battre en détail avec toutes ses forces. Il se jettera sur Korsakoff, qu'il approchera de plus près, puis sur Condé, et déjà il lui en serait allés.

“ Il faut donc changer de plan. Weyrother me fera l'amitié d'écrire à l'Archiduc Charles dans un style court, solide, et bien raisonné—et si on pouvait, il faut tâcher de se mettre même aujourd' hui encore en mouvement, si l'on ne f[ait] même que deux lieues de marche.”

CIRCULAR OF THE COMMISSION.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION.

PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE,
CHANCERY LANE,
LONDON, W.C.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING has been pleased to ratify and confirm the terms of the Commission issued by Her late Majesty, appointing certain Commissioners to ascertain what unpublished MSS. are extant in the collections of private persons and in institutions which are calculated to throw light upon subjects connected with the Civil, Ecclesiastical, Literary, or Scientific History of this country; and to appoint certain additional Commissioners for the same purposes. The present Commissioners are:—

Sir R. Henn Collins, Master of the Rolls; the Marquess of Ripon, K.G., the Earl of Crawford, K.T., the Earl of Rosebery, K.G., the Earl of Dartmouth, the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Fitzmaurice, Lord Alverstone, G.C.M.G., Lord Lindley, Lord Stanmore, G.C.M.G., Sir Edward Fry, Mr. John Morley, O.M., M.P., Sir H. C. Maxwell-Lyte, K.C.B., and Mr. C. H. Firth, M.A., LL.D.

The Commissioners think it probable that you may feel an interest in this object, and be willing to assist in the attainment of it; and with that view they desire to lay before you an outline of the course which they usually follow.

If any nobleman or gentleman express his willingness to submit to the Commissioners any unprinted book or collection of documents in his possession or custody, they will cause an inspection to be made by some competent person, and should the MSS. appear to come within the scope of their enquiry, the owner will be asked to consent to the publication of copies or abstracts of them in the reports of the Commission, which are presented to Parliament every Session.

To avoid any possible apprehension that the examination of papers by the Commissioners may extend to title-deeds or other documents of present legal value, positive instructions are given to every person who inspects MSS. on their behalf that nothing relating to the titles of existing owners is to be divulged, and that if in the course of his work any modern title-deeds or papers of a private character chance to come before him, they are to be instantly put aside, and are not to be examined or calendared under any pretence whatever.

The object of the Commission is the discovery of unpublished historical and literary materials, and in all their proceedings the Commissioners will direct their attention to that object exclusively.

In practice it has been found more satisfactory, when the collection of manuscripts is a large one, for the inspector to make a selection therefrom at the place of deposit and to obtain the owner's consent to remove the selected papers to the Public Record Office in London or in Dublin, or to the General Register House in Edinburgh, where they can be more fully dealt with, and where they are preserved with the same care as if they formed part of the muniments of the realm, during the term of their examination. Among the numerous owners of MSS. who have allowed their family papers of historical interest to be temporarily removed from their muniment rooms and lent to the Commissioners to facilitate the preparation of a report may be named :—His Majesty the King, the Duke of Rutland, the Duke of Portland, the Marquess of Salisbury, the Marquess Townshend, the Marquess of Ailesbury, the Marquess of Bath, the Earl of Dartmouth, the Earl of Carlisle, the Earl of Egmont, the Earl of Lindsey, the Earl of Ancaster, the Earl of Lonsdale, Lord Braye, Lord Hothfield, Lord Kenyon, Mrs. Stopford Sackville, the Right Hon. F. J. Savile Foljambe, Sir George Wombwell, Mr. le Fleming, of Rydal, Mr. Leyborne Popham, of Littlecote, and Mr. Fortescue, of Dropmore.

The cost of inspections, reports, and calendars, and the conveyance of documents, will be defrayed at the public expense, without any charge to the owners.

The Commissioners will also, if so requested, give their advice as to the best means of repairing and preserving any interesting papers or MSS. which may be in a state of decay.

The Commissioners will feel much obliged if you will communicate to them the names of any gentlemen who may be able and willing to assist in obtaining the objects for which this Commission has been issued.

R. A. ROBERTS, Secretary.

INTRODUCTION.

THE letters and reports contained in Volume VI. of the Dropmore Papers embrace a period of one year and five months—from November 1, 1799, to March 31, 1801. They conclude the histories, so far as these are related in Lord Grenville's confidential correspondence, of the second coalition against France, and the passing of the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland, begun in Volume IV. and continued in Volume V. Volume IV. records the formation of the coalition and the abortive attempt to carry an Act of Union through the Irish Parliament early in 1799. Volume V. relates mainly to the Continental campaigns of 1799. Volume VI. deals with the secession of Russia from the coalition; the new alliance of Great Britain and Austria; the abolition of the Irish Legislature in 1800; the negotiations and military operations of Bonaparte and of the allies during the same year; the peace of Luneville and the resignation of Pitt's first ministry, in February, 1801.

The radical weakness of the coalition, its want of cohesion and concord, has been explained in the Introductions of the two preceding volumes; how the British and Austrian Governments, while both leaning on the support of the Tzar, formed their plans not only without mutual communication, but in a spirit of antagonism to each other. Owing in large measure to Russian aid, Austrian plans were crowned with success beyond all expectation; British plans, notwithstanding Russian aid, ended in complete failure. We shall now see how that success and that failure contributed about equally to the disruption of the coalition as originally formed; and how by their mutual antagonism the British and Austrian Governments not only flung away a fair opportunity of accomplishing all their aims in conflict with the French Revolution, but gave the Revolution, in its completed form, of military despotism, an opportunity of establishing its supremacy in Europe for fifteen years.

The discord of England and Austria which had such disastrous results was not an effect of any irreconcilable divergence of principles or interests. It was the outcome of forty years of political estrangement, followed by four years of distrustful and unprosperous alliance, during which all the dislikes, suspicions, and prejudices of unfriendly tradition became incarnate in two able and strong-willed ministers who directed the foreign relations of the two monarchies. The transference of the Spanish Netherlands to the Emperor by the treaty of Utrecht, and the Dutch Barrier Treaty four years later, were arrangements made in the interests of England and the Dutch Republic to secure the Belgic provinces against annexation by France. But Austrian statesmen from the first regarded the acquisition of those provinces as a burden and a danger. Their ordinary revenues hardly defrayed the expenses of government, even in times of peace. Their old constitutions and privileges, guaranteed by the treaty of Utrecht, gave them immunity from arbitrary taxation, and the possession of them involved constant peril of war with a powerful and ambitious neighbour. Partly as a means of escape from this situation, also, perhaps, in the hope of being enabled by the aid of France to exchange the Belgic provinces for Bavaria with the Elector Palatine, the Empress-Queen Maria Theresa, under the guidance of Prince Kaunitz, entered into the ill-omened alliance with Louis XV., which was cemented by the marriage of the Dauphin with her daughter, Marie Antoinette. This new grouping of European powers proved in various ways hurtful to England. It took away from her an old and powerful confederate against France; and the security it afforded for continental peace allowed the French Government, during the war of American Independence, to diminish its army and enlarge its navy. At the same time it encouraged the Emperor Joseph II. to give free rein to the ill-regulated ambition and restless spirit of innovation which, in a few years, brought the Austrian monarchy to the brink of ruin. In order to extend his authority in the Netherlands, and having nothing to fear from the House of Bourbon, he not only expelled the Dutch garrisons and demolished the barrier fortresses which defended the Belgic provinces on the side of France, but, by systematic violations of their civil and religious rights, drove the Belgians to open revolt. The fatuity of his proceedings, which imperilled the chief benefit derived by England from Marlborough's victories, was only fully seen a few years later, when the French Revolution assumed a militant and aggressive character under Girondin guidance; and Joseph's successor, Leopold II., found himself exposed, both as sovereign of the Netherlands and as brother-in-law of Louis XVI., to the first assaults of Jacobin hostility. Leopold, an able and prudent ruler, contrived by skilful management to convert Joseph's most formidable antagonist, Frederick William II., King of Prussia, into an ally against the French Revolution. But as this statesmanlike policy drew away the Prussian king from the Triple Alliance, and Pitt's short-lived system of non-interference in the internal affairs of France, it gave deep offence in England. It is, indeed, a striking proof of the strength of English prejudice against Austria that, on the very eve of the Revolutionary war, the most pacific prince and the most conservative in his policy among the sovereigns of his time, figures in Lord Grenville's correspondence as the most dangerous enemy of the peace of Europe.

Leopold died before war broke out, in 1792; Prince Kaunitz retired from the political stage; and the reins of Austrian government fell to the hands of Baron Thugut. England joined the coalition of German powers after the conquest of the Netherlands by Dumouriez in the autumn of 1792, dragging reluctant Holland in her wake, and infused a fiercer spirit into the war. From the beginning of their new association against France the relations of England and Austria were a perpetual jar. In the campaign of 1792 the confederate powers, still governed by the spirit of the Emperor Leopold, had invaded France as allies of a dethroned sovereign against revolted subjects. But memories of the war of American Independence were as yet too recent and bitter to allow of any feeling of sympathy for the House of Bourbon finding admittance into the minds of George III. and the majority of Englishmen. They seem at this moment to have regarded France as an old and implacable foe in which revolution was only a new phase of wickedness, and which, whatever form of government it might choose to adopt, must, in the interests of England, be reduced to impotence. During the year 1793, George III. would not allow either brother of Louis XVI. to set foot in any part of his dominions. And the British Government was able to stamp its own policy on the coalition. The plan of campaign for 1793 proposed at Vienna was a combined march of all the forces of the allied powers on Paris—the English from the insurgent provinces of the west; the Germans from the east; the Spaniards and Sardinians from the Appennines and the Alps—to crush the Revolution in its stronghold and dictate terms of peace to France. But the English and Dutch Governments insisted on making the expulsion of the French from the Netherlands the main object of the campaign; and, as the King of Prussia took the side of the power he intended to make his paymaster, Thugut had to give way. A few months later Lord Auckland, representing England at the conference at Antwerp, carried a resolution that no peace should be made with France that did not provide “indemnity for the past and security for the future.” This resolution altered the character of the war. Begun in 1792 for the defence of monarchy and the order it symbolised, the war became in 1793 a scheme of partition. By this new programme, when the French had been expelled from the Netherlands, and that country had been more effectually secured against future aggression, the British Government was to employ its forces in destroying the naval arsenals and commerce and capturing the colonies of France; while its allies found compensation in stripping the common enemy of the territories she had annexed in Europe since the beginning of the reign of Louis XIV. And under pressure from England the Emperor agreed to relinquish all purpose of exchanging Belgium for Bavaria on condition that the Belgic frontier should be extended to the River Somme. This was Dundas’s policy, warmly approved by the King, and adopted by the Cabinet.* The War Minister himself advocated it as “the only practical policy,” on the ground that the Parliament and people of England could only be induced to bear the burthens of the conflict by showing them that the profit exceeded the loss. Mr. Windham afterwards described the system of his colleague as one of “plunder abroad and patronage at home.” Pushed too far, it saved the French Revolution. Early in August, Valenciennes and Tournay having surrendered to the allies and General Dampierre’s army having been driven in complete rout from the lines of Famars and from Cæsar’s camp, the campaign reached its crisis. France, convulsed with civil war from end to end, had no longer a force in the field which could resist invasion. The Royalists were victorious in the West. In most other departments, Federalists and adherents of the Mountain were locked in a death-grapple. Lyons, Bourdeaux, Marseilles, and Toulon had risen in revolt against the Jacobin yoke of Paris. In these circumstances the Prince of Coburg, Austrian Commander-in-Chief, following instructions from Vienna, proposed to march with the full strength of the allied forces on the French capital, and thus finish the war. But the privateers of Dunkirk had been preying on the commerce of London; and in deference to the clamour of the city, Dundas sent positive orders to the Duke of York to take that little sea-port, for the benefit of England, before engaging in any larger operations. As a result of these orders, the allied armies separated in order to fritter away their strength and spirit in petty sieges, which brought them disgrace. The generals quarrelled and sulked in winter quarters; while the Committee of Public Safety worked with revolutionary energy, rallying to its standard the patriotism and national spirit of France to save the country from dismemberment. The opportunity thus lost did not return. And from this date it seems to have become a maxim with Austrian statesmen that selfishness was the governing motive of all British policy.

It was only in 1795, when the allied armies had been driven across the Rhine; when Prussia and Spain had abandoned the coalition; when the Emperor could not equip another army, that Pitt, having to face the alternative of resigning the Netherlands to France, entertained the idea of alliance with Austria on any basis of financial aid. He had granted a large subsidy to Prussia in 1794, which King Frederick William spent in partitioning Poland; and he would willingly have renewed it in 1795, with some safeguard against misapplication. But in treating with the Emperor, it was only after long hesitation, and with manifest reluctance, that he consented to guarantee an Austrian loan of £4,400,000. Help thus afforded at a high rate of interest, and asserting a right to criticise and direct the operations of Austrian armies, excited no gratitude, and much irritation. And relations requiring easy and delicate handling were only too likely to become strained to the point of breaking in the tenacious grasp of Lord Grenville or Baron Thugut.

Baron Thugut had risen from low beginnings, by eminent merit, the appreciation of successive sovereigns and good fortune, to the highest position in Germany open to a subject not belonging to a sovereign house. The Empress-Queen, his earliest patron, as we are told, changed his name from Thu-na-gut (do no good) to Thugut (do good). His ascent to power was greatly facilitated by an unusual dearth of conspicuous talent among Austrian officials; and he seems to have been finally lifted into the office of Imperial Vice-Chancellor by the strong recommendation of Count Mercy d'Argenteau, whose own claims to it, from long and distinguished service, were pre-eminent. In that high post his superior ability, knowledge, and assiduity quickly won for him the entire confidence of the young and inexperienced Emperor Francis II.,² and complete control over the Councils of the Empire. This splendid position was not a bed of roses. Austria, slowly recovering from the disasters that closed the career of Joseph II., found itself prominently engaged in a war against France, with several doubtful allies, and not a single friend. After the Emperor Leopold's death, the King of Prussia, freed from the ascendancy of that able statesman, broke the engagements he had contracted with Austria in order to aggrandize himself in Germany and Poland. This conduct rekindled the jealous rivalries of the leading German powers, which Leopold's skilful policy for a time extinguished. England, long estranged from Austria, did not conceal a preference for Prussia. Catherine II. of Russia, intent on projects of her own in Turkey and Poland which clashed with Austrian interests, gave no support against France. At home the aspect of affairs was hardly more propitious for the Minister. Hatred and fear of the French Revolution made Francis II. and Thugut eager in pursuing the war; the latter impelled by personal ambition as well as by political conviction, though unaffected by any of the motives of religion and kinship which animated the Emperor. But all classes of the Austrian population would have gladly purchased peace by ceding the Netherlands to France. And a proud and powerful aristocracy which filled the chief offices at Court, and nearly all high public employments, looked with scorn and aversion on the low-born adventurer who had climbed into the seat of Prince Kaunitz; and lost no opportunity of thwarting a policy which kept him in power.

We have sketches of Baron Thugut in Lord Grenville's correspondence by different hands. There is a general agreement as to the leading features of his character, but in some pictures the shading is much darker than in others. His career does not entitle him to take rank as a great minister with Kaunitz or Metternich, who filled the same office before and after him; but his great ability, his unwearied industry, his intense devotion to what he believed to be the interests of his sovereign and country, were not denied by candid enemies. On the other hand, the exercise of supreme authority and the impediments, personal as well as public, which he had to encounter, seem to have brought out into greater prominence the defects of a strenuous, vehement, astute, but not lofty nature. His appetite for power grew with the possession of it. He showed himself daily more eager to concentrate the whole direction of the affairs of the monarchy in his own hands; more jealous of possible rivals; more wanting in the patience and self-restraint which Pitt considered the most essential element of statesmanship. Leading a joyless and lonely life, absorbed by cares of state and secluded in what Suvorow called his "infernal cavern," his temper grew sullen and morose. In political conflict he was cunning and unscrupulous. Rubbed against the grain, thwarted in a favourite project, he became obstinate and vindictive, and even reckless of the welfare of the State in order to gratify his spleen. Mr. Wickham, who disliked Thugut as the enemy of Archduke Charles, and made a close and severely critical study of him during several visits to Vienna in 1800, described him as being easily provoked in discussion to indiscreet bursts of anger, during which he blurted out secrets highly damaging to himself. According to the same authority passion more often than policy governed the old statesman's public conduct. On the other hand, both Sir Morton Eden and Lord Minto, who as resident Ministers at Vienna had more opportunities of forming an impartial judgment, seem not only to have conceived for the Austrian Chancellor genuine admiration and regard, but to have found themselves, often to the great dissatisfaction of the English Foreign Office, in general agreement with his political views. Much also in Thugut's action which unfriendly criticism branded as deliberate deceit, may fairly be ascribed to constitutional caution, seeking the safest outlet from a perplexed or perilous situation. His most pernicious weakness as a minister was, no doubt, an unflinching, but erroneous, belief in his own superior capacity for ordering military operations. He aspired to fill the role of Cardinal Richelieu, or Lord Chatham, without possessing the qualifications of a great war minister. In order to have full control of the Austrian armies and to shape their movements in harmony with his political designs, he removed renowned soldiers from the Council of War, and filled their places, and, as opportunity offered, the chief military commands, with his own dependents. This inordinate lust of sway, by fettering the discretion of the ablest Austrian generals, promoting others less capable but more pliable, and especially by depriving his sovereign of the services of Archduke Charles and Marshal Suvorow at critical periods of the war against France, contributed largely to the disasters that overwhelmed Austria in 1800, and brought his own political career to an inglorious end.

Lord Grenville had assumed the direction of foreign affairs in England, under many disadvantages, at the urgent request, and for the convenience of Mr. Pitt. The appointment came as a surprise to the official world. He does not appear to have been specially marked out for the post by natural or acquired fitness. His temperament and habits were rather those of a student than of a man of the world. So late as the year 1797* we find his friend and admirer, Mr. Windham, lamenting the constitutional reserve and the preference for domestic seclusion which prevented his obtaining by social intercourse the knowledge of men and of contemporary opinion so necessary for an English statesman. He had never given his mind to the study of European politics. Foreign travel had not opened to him opportunities of insight into the manners, peculiarities, and interests of other countries, or corrected the prejudices of an insular education. His diplomatic training did not extend beyond two short missions to Holland and France in 1788. Lord Auckland, whose discursive letters from the Hague glanced over the whole range of Continental affairs, seems to have been his chief guide and instructor during the first years of his career at the Foreign Office. Owing in a great measure to self-distrust, arising out of the deep and even painful sense of his own deficiencies expressed in some of his letters, Lord Grenville's influence in shaping the foreign policy of England during the earlier years of the Revolutionary war seems to have been inferior to that of Mr. Dundas. From their first association in the Cabinet, these two chief colleagues and advisers of Pitt appear to have been in constant conflict. And in the conferences of the three ministers at Wimbledon or Holwood, when all important measures of government were discussed and settled before being communicated to the whole Cabinet, Pitt, in all matters bearing on the conduct of the war, seems to have almost invariably followed the counsels of Dundas. It was not long, however, before great ability and unwearied application, always directed and sustained by conscientious motive, made Lord Grenville master of all that could be learned from the sources of official information at his command. Intercourse also with the many foreigners of distinction, such as Count Mercy, Talleyrand, Calonne, Malouet, Mallet du Pan, whom the throes of the French Revolution cast from time to time on the shores of England, enlarged and enlightened his mind and increased his knowledge. With knowledge came self-confidence. And the failure of Dundas's "practical system" to cope with revolutionary energy and enthusiasm; the entrance into the Cabinet of leading Whigs, political pupils of Burke, with whom Grenville seems to have found himself, on most questions, in close accord; the strength of his convictions and his tenacity in adhering to them regardless of personal consequences; and his conspicuous success as leader of the House of Lords, gradually raised him to a position in the ministry immediately next to that of Pitt. During the last three years of that famous administration he seems to have been able to make his own views prevail in the Cabinet, on all important questions of external policy. In 1797 we find Lord Malmesbury and Mr. Canning wondering at the extraordinary deference Pitt paid to Grenville's opinion.* And two years later we find Dundas fallen so low as to become a subject for irreverent jest to colleagues over whom he had once towered as a sort of war-god. On December 29, 1799, Pitt wrote to Grenville in reference to some plan of the Secretary for War, "Dundas's geography, you will observe, is as accurate as his language"; Dundas being as superior to grammar as any Roman emperor. In the meantime Pitt's original policy of exacting from France "indemnity and security" gave place to one, adopted too late and followed too timidly, of co-operating with the emigrant princes for a restoration of the French monarchy, with the boundaries of 1792. But, however Lord Grenville's personal position in the ministry may have varied, during the whole period of his tenure of the seals as Foreign Secretary all important papers issuing from his office were drafted by himself, and bore the stamp of his own character. It was a character thoroughly English in its qualities and its defects. Its patriotism was so ardent as to inspire a profound belief that the cause of England in all its developments, and all circumstances, was the cause of right and of civilisation. A high and even haughty spirit, which scorned anything resembling mean trickery or petty evasion, informed his public utterances, and guarded well in times of danger and discouragement the dignity of the British crown and the interests of the monarchy. And he prided himself on maintaining in international relations the high standard of rectitude by which he governed his private conduct. It may be said that no English statesman of his time stood higher in public confidence for enlightened views, personal integrity, and fidelity to principle ; although, owing, perhaps, to his secluded habits and a want of popular fibre in his nature, his personal influence fell short of his reputation ; and, beyond the limits of his own social circle, he was respected rather than loved. On the other hand, the very fervour of his patriotism, combined with narrow sympathies, and not enough of imagination to supply the absence of personal experience, made him often unable to appreciate justly the character and situation of a foreign adversary, or to form a correct estimate of forces opposed to him. It made him prone to undervalue an antagonist ; to class Continental statesmen, bred amidst other traditions, representing other national interests, who did not concur in his political views as “ knaves or fools.” For the same reason he was habitually over-sanguine in everything that concerned military enterprises in the planning of which he took part ; easily believing what he wished to believe ; easily forgetting what he did not wish to remember ; jumping eagerly to favourable conclusions in ignorance or neglect of unpleasant, but essential, facts. His public spirit contained a considerable alloy of arrogant dogmatism inherited from his father. He was too much inclined to play the pedagogue. From his vantage ground of moral elevation he castigated neglect of obligation on the part of an ally, or tortuous policy which did not serve English interests, with a zeal which sometimes inflicted irreparable injury on the cause it meant to vindicate. We have seen that the Duke of Brunswick, writing to his sister the Princess of Orange after the treaty of Basle, attributed the secession of the King of Prussia from the first coalition to the offensive tone of Lord Grenville’s despatches. And although so severe a critic of conduct in others which had an injurious effect on English interests, his ethical code allowed him very wide latitude in promoting those interests. The plan devised by Pitt and him in 1796 of obtaining help from the King of Prussia by pandering to that monarch’s cupidity at the expense of petty German states which had given no provocation but helplessness, was stigmatised by George III. as “ immoral ” and “ unjustifiable.”* It was only by the severest pressure that the two Ministers extorted the King’s consent to what he termed their “ Italian politics.”† Pitt sometimes interfered by way of suggestion, and with a studious avoidance of all appearance of dictation, to tone down passages in Grenville’s drafts, which appeared to him unwise or unseasonable. So late as November, 1800, we find him remonstrating against the “ dry and peremptory tone ” of a paragraph dealing with the dearth of food, in a “ King’s speech ” prepared by the Foreign Minister, as unsuited to an occasion of great public distress. In fact, though never wilfully unjust, Lord Grenville too often tempered justice with severity. His natural bent seems to have been to coercion rather than conciliation ; and when the combative mood prevailed, it was harsh and inexorable. Lord Cornwallis wrote to Colonel Ross in 1800 that he had left the Cabinet with little regret, because its decisions were so much swayed by Lord Grenville’s “ unplacable ” temper.‡

* Page 140, Vol. III. † Introduction to Volume III. ‡ Cornwallis Correspondence.

The troubled course of the Anglo-Austrian alliance, under the direction of Lord Grenville and Baron Thugut, down to the enforced submission of the Emperor at Leoben ; the estrangement of the two powers ; their junction with Russia to form the second coalition, without mutual concert or common plan, and with a strong disposition to thwart each other, have been related in the Prefaces of Volumes IV. and V. In all these bickerings and jealousies there had been no cause of complaint that a little of mutual trust and goodwill might not have prevented or removed ; no divergence of interests which might not easily have been adjusted. Lord Grenville's peremptory demand of the ratification of a financial convention, very disadvantageous to Austria, at a moment when that monarchy lay exhausted in the armed grip of France, was not a friendly, nor even a considerate, proceeding. An evasive answer, venial in the circumstances, brought lectures and taunts which goaded Thugut to sullen defiance and flat denial of plain obligation, even after the peace of Campo Formio had left him without excuse. In truth, so filled was the Chancellor's mind with distrust of what he termed in jibe "the disinterested policy of England" that, as we have seen, not even his pressing need of additional financial aid, when a renewal of war with France became imminent, could overcome the fear which possessed him that the British Government would use the ratification which it insisted on as a preliminary to amicable discussion, to distress the Emperor, and obtain control of the Austrian armies for its own particular purposes. On the other hand, Lord Grenville's attitude is fully explained in a letter to Mr. Windham, dated September 2, 1799. "My opinion," he wrote, "has long been fixed that good words and liberal conduct are both thrown away on Austrian politicians, and that all our measures towards them should be regulated solely by the view of what we think best and most becoming for ourselves." He seems to have had a more jealous sense of what was due to the British crown than George III. himself. And there can be no doubt that previous to the renewal of Continental war with France in 1799, he not only, owing to ignorance of the defects of the Russian military system, overrated the advantage to England of an alliance with the Tzar, but was unconscious of the increased strength and importance Austria had derived from the support of Russia, from armies thoroughly re-organised under able commanders and excellent staffs and from a rapid decline in the military power of France.

Unfortunately for the stability of this strange experiment in political construction, the third partner on whom the others depended as the regulating power of the second coalition, to control and harmonize its operations, avert collision, and mitigate friction, was constitutionally incapable of governing himself, and became by force of circumstances another element of discord. Paul I., Emperor of Russia, had reached middle age when he ascended the throne ; but no sovereign of his time was so little qualified by education and experience for the exercise of supreme authority. His mother, Catherine II., for reasons of state, had jealously excluded him during her lifetime from all share in the government and all high military command. His resentment at the insignificance to which her policy condemned him, though carefully stifled during her reign, displayed itself on his accession to the throne in the banishment of nearly all the able servants of the Crown, as well as Court minions, who had enjoyed her confidence or favour. Competent witnesses allow him many admirable qualities : deep religious sentiment, love of justice, generosity, chivalrous feeling. But through them all there ran the taint of mental insanity, inherited from his father, and which irresponsible authority developed. His mind too easily harboured suspicions, and became the prey of morbid emotions, which, though repressed for a time, sometimes mastered him, and hurried him away far beyond the bounds of prudence and good sense. Unguarded contradiction threw him into transports of passion, in which he lost all self-restraint. And although he generally showed himself eager when reflection came to repair an injury or act of injustice, the sting of his reckless violence rankled and awakened a sense of insecurity in those most exposed to it, which finally cost him his life. In politics, as in everything else, he was the child of impulse, the sport of capricious fancies, often good and noble, but ungoverned in action, and transient in influence. He entered the coalition in the spirit of a knight-errant rather than in that of a statesman, in answer to appeals from all parts of southern Europe to redress the wrongs inflicted by the French Revolution and restore the old order it had overthrown. Of all the lost or injured causes that claimed his protection, none seems to have so appealed to his imagination, or lain so near to his heart, as that of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, which reflected, however faintly, the faith and self-devotion of the crusader to an age of scepticism and selfish ambition. Early in his reign he had constituted himself protector of the Order ; and later on, by some form of irregular election, its Grand Master extraordinary. General de Stamford thus sketched the Russian autocrat in a letter from St. Petersburg to Thomas Grenville, dated, June 29, 1799. "L'Empereur est un prince tel qu'il le faut pour le salut de l'Europe ; c'est un ame de feu, pleine de noblesse, sensible à l'honneur et à la gloire, et n'ayant en vue qu'e de faire triompher la cause dont il a embrassé la défense ; mais ces sentimens veulent être ménagés ; un mot, une expression inconsidérée, la moindre contrariété dans sa volonté, cette volonté prévenue ou trop pressée, peuvent tout-à-coup arrêter chez lui les résolutions les plus importantes. Il souffre l'observation quand elle est juste, et il se rend ; mais il faut une grande délicatesse pour oser la lui présenter, et pour qu'il n'en soit pas blessé au début."

The chief Continental interest of Great Britain in 1799 was, as it had been in 1793, the permanent separation of the Netherlands from France. Pitt's plan of effecting this object in 1793 was to restore the Belgic provinces to the Emperor, considerably enlarged and strengthened by an annexation of French territory. Since then the policy of dismembering France had been abandoned ; and as the Emperor would only take back Belgium in its old form, with the view of exchanging it for some more advantageous possession, it became expedient to secure British interests by some more durable settlement. Weighty considerations pointed to a union of all the Low Countries under the sway of the Prince of Orange as the most eligible arrangement for this purpose. It was the one most likely to enlist the active co-operation of the King of Prussia, by whose aid the expulsion of the French could be most easily and speedily effected. And it might help other English aims hardly inferior in importance. In 1795 the Prince of Orange, after his flight to England, at Lord Grenville's request, sent instructions to the governors of Dutch colonies to deliver them up to the British Government, in order that they might remain in the safe keeping of an ally until the Stadtholderate was restored. The Cape of Good Hope and Ceylon surrendered, subsequently, to British expeditions; but as to how far these capitulations were influenced by the Prince's letters the Dropmore correspondence supplies no information. During the conference at Lille, in 1797, Lord Malmesbury, by Grenville's instructions, insisted on retaining both colonies as British conquests; and the Dutch Revolutionary Government would on no account consent to cede either of them. That this attitude represented national feeling in Holland Lord Grenville appears to have been fully aware. In reply to a letter from Dundas lamenting the delay that had occurred in annexing also the Dutch settlement of Java, he wrote, on May 13, 1799: "I have always thought the conquest of Java an object of great importance. . . . If the Stadtholder is restored, one of the greatest difficulties we should have to encounter will be the demand for the restoration of Ceylon and the Cape, which, from what I have already seen, will, I am certain, be pressed by Prussia as well as by the Dutch. It would be a great means of putting this by if we had Batavia and Surinam to restore to them." And he seems to have thought that by a union of the whole Netherlands under the Prince of Orange a state might be formed of sufficient strength to repel, or at least withstand, the first rush of French aggression; and that the Dutch might be reconciled by an extension of territory in Europe to sacrifices so advantageous to English interests in the East. The two main objects of British Continental policy at the beginning of 1799—(1) union of the Dutch and Austrian Netherlands under the Prince of Orange; (2) the reduction of France to the limits of 1792, a restoration of monarchy being implied—having been submitted in confidence to the Tzar, were adopted by him as a basis for common action and as leading points in the programme of the coalition. To confirm Paul in his good dispositions the British Government pledged itself to hand over Malta to him when taken from the French, for the Knights of St. John, and to promote the formation of an English branch of the Order.

The first point of the Anglo-Russian programme does not appear to have been communicated, or at least only very partially revealed, to the Austrian Government. In regard to the second, Baron Thugut fully concurred in the purpose of reducing France to its monarchical limits. The conquests of the Revolution had been made at the Emperor's expense. Lombardy, lost at Leoben, had been the richest province of his dominions. Subsequent aggressions of the Directory in Switzerland and Italy had almost annihilated his family interests in those countries and whatever remained of the ancient prerogative of the Imperial Crown. Belgium, though not profitable to Austria in itself, had its value as an article of barter in the political market. A permanent extension of France to the left bank of the Rhine meant the destruction of the Ecclesiastical Electorates, staunch adherents of the House of Hapzburg in the Imperial Diet. But Francis II. and Baron Thugut had lost all faith in the cause of French monarchy, as represented by the emigrant princes; and would not willingly compromise Austrian interests by espousing it. When the campaign of 1799 opened, their plans and efforts were directed solely to recover all that Austria had lost in conflict with the Revolution. The refusal of concert by the English ministry gave the Emperor liberty of action; the alliance of the Tzar gave him security against Prussian machinations in Germany, and a reinforcement of 22,000 troops under Marshal Souvorow, whom he appointed Commander-in-Chief of his forces in Italy.

Pursuing his own policy, as has been told elsewhere, Thugut held the Archduke on the defensive in Switzerland; while Souvarow's victories accomplished his main object, of restoring the Emperor's supremacy in Italy. But here the policy of Austria came into collision with that of Great Britain. "I have never," Lord Grenville wrote to his brother, June 3, 1799, "felt so confident in my life on any one point as I do that the success of the whole war, and every part of this war, depends on pushing the campaign with vigour in Switzerland." And the English plan for expelling the French from the Netherlands by enlisting the action of a subsidised Prussian army, supported by a large Russian corps on the Middle Rhine, having been frustrated by the pacific temper of the King of Prussia, the British Government obtained the concurrence of the Tzar in two new plans for accomplishing their common objects—(1) an Anglo-Russian expedition to Holland; and (2) the assembling in Switzerland of an army of 80,000 or 100,000 men, Russians, Germans, Swiss, and French, under the command of Marshal Souvorow, to expel Massena from Switzerland with the co-operation of the Archduke, and then march into France to restore the monarchy. The Preface to Volume V. of the Dropmore Papers gives a brief account of the failure of the military operations thus concerted. But a knowledge of the intentions involved in the British plans, and of the conditions under which they were framed and pursued, as revealed in Lord Grenville's confidential letters, is necessary for a correct understanding of that failure and of the events that followed it.

First, as regards the invasion of Holland.

Confidential information sent to him earlier in the year by his brother, Thomas Grenville, British Minister at Berlin, and derived from emissaries and adherents of the House of Orange in the Dutch Republic, enabled Lord Grenville to reckon on the following circumstances as favouring an Anglo-Russian expedition—general impatience throughout the Netherlands of French dictation and rapacity; the reduction of the French army of occupation in the Dutch Provinces to 5,000 or 6,000 men; disaffection to the revolutionary government in the Dutch army and navy; an eager disposition in the Orange party to take arms, if supported by a foreign force. Reasoning from these facts, he seems to have convinced himself and Pitt that the British Government could, by means of the army of from 40,000 to 50,000 troops at their disposal—18,000 Russians and about 30,000 English—possess themselves of the entire Netherlands in the course of a short autumn campaign; restore the Dutch Stadtholderate on their own terms; and dispose of Belgium in the manner most conducive to British interests, without the co-operation of Prussia, and in defiance of Austria. On July 27, 1799, he wrote as follows to Dundas:—"The more I think over the subject of the Netherlands the more I am persuaded that the only right suggestion is that which the King made to me on Wednesday, that we should make our force sufficient to be quite certain (at least as much so as the thing will admit) of occupying that whole country ourselves before the winter. It is only in that way that we can put ourselves in a situation to talk to Vienna in the only style which ever succeeds in making them hear reason. If we ultimately decide on giving these provinces back to Austria it should, I think, only be in consideration of co-operation afforded (not promised) for an attack on France." Dundas's answer on July 29 inclined to the opinion that Grenville's expectations of rapid success without Prussian aid were too sanguine, and expressed doubts as to the dispositions of the Dutch. Replying on July 30, Grenville insisted that Sir Ralph Abercromby, in command of the vanguard of the expedition, "would neither do justice to himself nor to us" if he acted with the caution becoming a general invading a hostile country instead of with the confidence of one who can count on meeting only feeble resistance and a whole population ready to welcome him as a deliverer. "Look," he continued, "at the campaign of 1787; how little time it cost the Duke of Brunswick, with all his doubts and hesitations, and cautions and precautions, to march with 25,000 men (no more) from Wesel to Amsterdam; and then let any man tell me what there is in the present circumstances to stop British generals and British soldiers, with the country unanimously in their favour, and with the threatened if not active co-operation of the whole Prussian army." On the same day he wrote as follows to Thomas Grenville, at Berlin:—"I do not now think we shall have a Prussian declaration to assist our expedition, and I am confident, contrary to what seems to be your opinion, that we shall not want Prussian aid to enable us to hold Holland; nay, that we shall do better without it. I still wish to purchase both the declaration and the assistance, in order that the Prussians, by occupying the Meuse, may enable us to occupy the Netherlands, and having thus eleven points in our favour, to talk to our good allies as to the ultimate arrangements to be made respecting those provinces, in the safety of which we have, after all, more concern than all the Powers of Germany together." Dundas gave way. After repeating his own views on the Dutch situation very forcibly on July 31, he continued—"You may rest assured that I am decided to act upon your ideas (in which Mr. Pitt perfectly concurs) rather than upon any doubts of my own. Upon this ground it is my intention to give a final instruction to Sir Ralph Abercromby before he sails, encouraging him, even if it should be contrary to mere military ideas, to act upon the reasoning of your letter ; looking upon himself as going not to conquer a country, but to aid the counter-revolution ready to burst out in it." At or about the time when these letters were written, Lord Grenville was in possession of information from Holland of a more trustworthy character that he could expect to find in reports of Orange partizans. It is contained in a mémoire furnished by an independent agent whom General de Stamford despatched to the United Provinces at Thomas Grenville's request, and was forwarded by the latter to London on July 21.* According to this account there were three distinct parties in the Dutch Republic : the Patriots or Democratic Republicans, now in the ascendant ; the Aristocratic or Federal Republicans, historical adversaries of the House of Orange ; and the adherents of the Stadtholderate. They had each different views and interests, and agreed only in disliking French domination. Patriots and Federals, who now filled the offices of state, would combine to oppose a restoration of Orange rule. Outside of these parties there was a large population of Catholics who had been freed by French conquest from civil and religious disabilities, and who, though not French partizans, would not support any attempt to restore the old intolerant system. Public opinion, the writer found, was in a state of chaos ; and it would require much management to frame any settlement likely to secure general acquiescence. Lord Grenville, however, does not seem to have attached much value to this communication. It considerably diminished the importance of the Orange party with which alone the British Government would enter into alliance. What appears more extraordinary is his assumption that Dutch dissatisfaction with France meant unlimited submission to Great Britain ; a theory that can only be explained by misapprehension, or rather obliviousness on his part, of events recorded in his own correspondence, and in which he had been officially and even personally concerned. "We are now," he wrote to his brother on July 30, the letter already quoted, "looking to a counter-revolution in Holland ; we have in that case the same difficulties to overcome, which we did not overcome, but yielded to, in 1787 and 1788. Lord Malmesbury was then much more occupied with his own honours than with the permanence of the system he had re-established. You know in what hands the direction of foreign affairs here was then placed. Everything was left to take its course, and a worse course things could not have taken. So far from improving the advantages which that revolution had afforded him, the Prince of Orange was found in every respect weaker and more unprovided in 1794 than he had been in 1786. This we must now prevent . . . You must prepare yourself, therefore, to receive a proposal in form that, as soon as any appearance of Stadtholderian Government shall have been re-established at the Hague, or elsewhere, you should proceed to take upon you the character and functions of Ambassador Extraordinary, charged with the whole political direction of that shapeless mass, which we must, now or never, reduce into a form of efficient and permanent utility to ourselves, instead of leaving it, as it has been for a century, a dead weight on our exertions whenever it has not been turned against us." And pursuing the same subject in another letter to his brother, he laid down as the British terms of peace with the Dutch after the re-establishment of the Stadtholder, "restoration of the Spice Islands (except Ceylon) and of Demarery, and guarantee of their constitution and territory, on condition of (1) offensive alliance; (2) actual co-operation in this war till peace be made by common consent; (3) express renunciation, and under very strong conditions, of claim of neutral commerce while we are at war; and more than this, I think, we have not to ask of them. Negapatam might be thrown into the bargain as a factory only, but subject to our paramount jurisdiction and control; Ceylon, the Cape, and Cochin would not be heard of."

In the foregoing letter to his brother dated July 30, Lord Grenville, as may be seen by a reference to the Introduction of Volume III. of the Dropmore Papers, did great injustice to Lord Malmesbury, and even to his own predecessor, the Duke of Leeds. It was, no doubt, the unintentional wrong of lapse of memory, caused by the stress and excitement of the political situation. Malmesbury, or Sir James Harris, as he was then called, had no means whatever of exacting conditions from a government which the King of Prussia had restored; and he did more for England by clever diplomacy than probably any other English ambassador of his time could have accomplished. As regards the Duke of Leeds, Pitt, at the end of 1787, appears to have taken all important business relating to Holland out of the hands of the Foreign Secretary, and confided it to those of Grenville himself. When the Stadtholderate was restored in 1787 Harris and Van der Spiegel, Grand Pensionary of Holland, were equally desirous of renewing the political alliance which had existed between England and the Dutch Republic from the reign of Charles II. to 1780. It was recognised on both sides that the chief obstacle to be overcome was the intense exasperation aroused among the Dutch by what Harris himself termed the "bullying and oppressive conduct" of Lord North's administration, which dissolved that alliance. In the war that followed between England and Holland the only permanent English conquest had been Negapatam. It was of little value, as Pitt declared some years later when proposing to relinquish it. But its loss kept alive the memory of what the Dutch resented as a national wrong. And the negotiators agreed that a voluntary restoration of the place, as a mark of friendship on the part of Pitt's Government, would go far to allay the deep distrust of English designs that existed in the Republic. In a letter to Grenville and Pitt dated 27 December, 1787, urging concession on this point as essential to any cordial alliance, Harris wrote:—"My great object is, if possible, to connect this country by indissoluble ties to Great Britain. This is to be effected partly by affection . . . and partly by specific engagements. Affection will follow complaisance, gentle usage, and not too rough and unqualified an exercise of our influence. The reverse lost us the Republic."* The British Cabinet apparently preferred driving a hard bargain with a Government depending for existence on foreign support. It would only consent to exchange Negapatam for the more valuable settlements of Trinkomali and Rhio, a proposal to which Van der Spiegel could not venture to listen. And the Dutch Minister only succeeded in obtaining the consent of an assembly of the States-General, packed with his own political friends, to the defensive treaty he concluded with Harris, after long and violent opposition. Shortly afterwards Harris, taking advantage of the opportunity afforded by a private visit of the Frederick William II., King of Prussia, to his sister at Loo, persuaded him to enter into a triple alliance with Great Britain and the United Provinces, without consulting his ministers. This arrangement, very unpopular in Prussia as departing from the policy of Frederick the Great, greatly raised the credit of Pitt's ministry on the Continent, and restored England to the place in the European commonwealth she had lost by the war of American Independence. It was for these services that Harris was created Lord Malmesbury. In the same year he separated from Pitt on the Regency question, and was succeeded by Lord Auckland as ambassador at the Hague. The new envoy fully concurred in the opinion of his predecessor and of the Dutch Pensionary, that the defensive alliance they had concluded could not be durable unless strengthened by a commercial treaty, in which the clashing interests of the two peoples should be reconciled by mutual concessions. Auckland had been chiefly concerned in framing a commercial treaty with France in 1786, and no one was better qualified for the more difficult task of treating with Holland which Pitt now committed to Grenville and him. His confidential letters to Grenville, contained in Volume II., give a full account of sterile labours in this new field of pacific effort. The chief point at issue was neutral trade, a main source of the power and prosperity of the Republic, which, in virtue of the treaty of peace concluded with England in 1674, the Dutch had pursued without molestation for one hundred years, down to the war of American Independence. Van der Spiegel, Auckland insisted, offered concessions on this question which no Dutch Government had ever been even asked to make before; and the British Cabinet, inspired by Lord Hawkesbury, answered by demands utterly unreasonable under the circumstances, and which no Dutch minister could possibly concede. As Pitt sided with the President of the Board of Trade, the Dutch negotiation fell through, and with it, as Van der Spiegel lamented, all well-grounded hope of any permanent alliance. The same exacting spirit manifested itself in the political relations of the two Governments, especially after the King of Prussia abandoned the triple alliance. And for the close and cordial union of two nations, designed by Malmesbury and Auckland, was substituted a somewhat galling protectorate, exercised by the Government of Great Britain over a ruling but discredited party in Holland. It was not, therefore, according to the testimony borne by Lord Grenville's own correspondence, owing to neglect on the part of Lord Malmesbury, but rather to the rejection of his advice by the British Cabinet, that "the Prince of Orange was found in every respect weaker and more unprovided in 1794 than he had been in 1786." From later letters of Auckland we know how reluctantly the Government of the Stadtholder, conscious of its own weakness, joined England in war against France, and only when it learned that the French Government would not treat with it separately; how languidly it carried on the war, notwithstanding Lord Grenville's expostulations; how much Dutch ill-will to the English army of the Duke of York facilitated Pichégu's rapid conquest of Holland. George III. wrote to Grenville as follows on December 7, 1794:—"Yesterday my son, the Duke of York, arrived; his account of the unfriendly conduct of the Dutch is far beyond what I before imagined; and what is worse, that the friends of the House of Orange are not behind-hand in animosity to the most violent patriots." Yet, strange as it may seem after this recent experience, Pitt and Grenville appear to have believed that an expeditionary army of less than 50,000 men, of which, as Windham, then Secretary at War, wrote on August 10, "a great part are in a state which no officer could describe as fit for service," could, without aid of any kind from Prussia, bring the Dutch not only to relinquish what they prized most, their chief colonies and their neutral trade, but to incur again the cost and danger of war with France in order to exchange a French for an English yoke. For the Prince of Orange inspired no enthusiasm. His son was unpopular, and the project of uniting all the Netherlands in one state, by which it was apparently hoped to reconcile the Dutch to the sacrifices demanded of them, seems to have found little favour even among the partisans of the House of Orange. Van der Spiegel, still the foremost statesman of that party, objected to it in a memoir sent to Lord Grenville as opposed to the traditions, feelings and interests of the United Provinces.* And before the summer was over Lord Grenville had himself learned that, without the concurrence of the Emperor, the project was impracticable. A letter from Thomas Grenville, dated August 3, 1799, gives us a glimpse of what seems to have been the main current of Dutch political feeling at this time. It ran in favour not of alliance with either France or England, but of being included with North Germany in the neutral zone protected by the King of Prussia. An arrangement of this sort, then under discussion at Paris, would free Holland from foreign occupation, give it peace, increased security for its trade, and some hope of recovering its colonies at the end of the war. The proclamations issued by the Prince of Orange and General Abercromby, by omitting all reference to the points about which the mass of the Dutch population were most anxious, told them that they had nothing to gain from the Anglo-Russian expedition. The English commanders, instead of eager welcome, had to encounter a chilling apathy which froze any spirit of enterprise Dundas's instructions may have infused into them. They had more troops than could be moved in North Holland, yet they did not venture to despatch a few thousand men to help the Orange leaders in Groningen and Friesland although the British Government had pledged itself to send this aid, and a fleet of vessels was kept in readiness, at a cost of £200 a fortnight, to transport it across the Zuyder Zee.† On the other hand, the partizans of the Stadtholder in those provinces, whose compressed zeal, according to Mr. Grenville's earlier reports, was on the point of exploding in premature insurrection, refused to budge an inch until the British succour promised to them arrived from the Helder.*

Second, as to the British plan of campaign in Switzerland.

When the Tzar, at the request of the British Government, communicated this plan to the Emperor Francis II., in order to obtain his co-operation, it met with little favour at Vienna. Austria had old connections with Switzerland, where the conservative party had been accustomed to look to the Emperor for support and protection. And although Baron Thugut would not, with more important interests at stake, risk the loss of an army to restore the cantonal governments overthrown by the French, he looked on it as a task deferred, and resented English interference. He knew also that Archduke Charles and his army at Zurich, proud of recent victories, chafing under the restraints imposed on them by his policy, and intensely jealous of Souvorow's laurels in Italy, would not willingly submit to play a minor part in the campaign against Masséna, which they had opened so brilliantly. There were other strong military objections to the English project. Switzerland, which hardly produced sufficient food for its own consumption, could not support three foreign armies. The original plan of operations in Holland, which was communicated to the Austrian Government before war began, placed the Russian troops commanded by General Korsakow on the Middle Rhine to help Prussian operations; and the march of these troops to Switzerland, in consequence of an adoption of new plans by England and Russia, exposed southern Germany to a French invasion. One point, however, in the new scheme—the removal of Souvorow and his Russians from Italy—was most welcome to the Imperial Chancellor as a means of escape from a position of extreme embarrassment. When the Emperor Francis, as a compliment to his northern ally, appointed Souvorow commander-in-chief of his Italian army, Thugut had expected from the Russian marshal the same submission to the orders of the Aulic Council exacted from all other Imperialist generals, not excepting Archduke Charles. He was a timid war minister, slow to incur risks even for large results. Souvorow's instructions from Vienna made the capture of Mantua the main object of the Italian campaign, and forbade him to cross the Adda till that fortress had surrendered. But the Russian marshal, as he told Lord Mulgrave, had accepted an Austrian command in order to crown a long career in arms with the glory of restoring the French monarchy; and in that and all other respects to fulfil the intentions of his own sovereign. Leaving part of his army with General Kray to besiege Mantua, he marched forward with the rest from victory to victory, finding ample supplies of all kinds for waging war at the expense of his enemy in the captured fortresses of Milan, Turin, and Alessandria. All his battles and sieges were won in spite of prohibitions from the Austrian Council of War and obstruction on the part of subordinates devoted to Baron Thugut. It would be difficult to say whether the Imperial Government was more incensed by this assumption of independence or elated by successes which promised to accomplish in a single campaign an old and favourite aim of Austrian policy, the bringing of all Italy, directly or indirectly, under the sway of the Emperor. But Souvorow's unauthorised proclamation restoring the government of the King of Sardinia was regarded by Thugut as an offence of the deepest dye, without any extenuating circumstance. It was, in fact, a public protest by an Austrian general against what had now become the fixed purpose of the Vienna Cabinet, to keep all Italy north of Naples, and particularly Piedmont, with its fortresses, in Austrian hands, either as permanent possessions or to supply the needs of the Imperial exchequer till the conclusion of peace. At the same time Souvorow's complaints of the impediments thrown in his way by Austrian jealousies and ill-will, and the immediate annulling of his proclamation by the appointing of an Austrian governor of Piedmont, greatly exasperated the Tzar. On all these accounts it was felt at Vienna that the removal of the Russians' from Italy had become a political necessity, and should only be deferred until Austrian interests had been secured by the surrender of Mantua and the besieged fortresses of Piedmont. Thugut, therefore, to gain time for these military results before replying to the Tzar, suggested to the English minister, Sir Morton Eden, that the British Government should send a military officer to Vienna or to the headquarters of Archduke Charles, at Zurich, to discuss its plan of campaign in Switzerland. Lord Grenville, assuming the question of Austrian co-operation to be now conceded, appointed Lord Mulgrave to proceed to Zurich to superintend the formation of the army intended for Souvorow, and enter into communication with the Archduke. Before leaving London Mulgrave had a conversation with the Austrian minister, Count Starhemberg. The Count's father, Prince Starhemberg, was a leader of the Austrian aristocracy opposed to Baron Thugut; but the diplomatist himself zealously promoted the war against France. He urged Mulgrave to go in the first place to Vienna. Thugut, he said, was le vrai général; nothing of importance could be settled with anyone else. Mulgrave reported this counsel to Grenville, who had gone to Dropmore; but the latter would not listen to it.* "When it was proposed to us," he answered, "to send an officer in your situation, Thugut mentioned that we should send him either to Vienna or to the Archduke's headquarters. He would obviously have preferred the former, and we had strong reasons to prefer the latter, and therefore took him at his word without further discussion. We have an interest in thwarting that system of directing military operations from Vienna, because it has never been employed but to our disadvantage; and we were very desirous of engaging as a party to our measures the person who is to execute them. We have besides a much more advantageous situation with respect to Russia by treating on this subject at the army than by discussing it at Vienna. Korsakow is in a manner placed under our orders. . . . and this gives us two voices out of those [three ?] in the concert.. . . My wish is, therefore, very strongly, that you may not find it necessary to go to Vienna. . . . You must always remember that by doing so you will incur great risk of disobliging the Archduke, and that the private interests of the latter lead to his pushing this campaign actively, while all Thugut's jealousy inclines him the other way."* This disposition, which he was not slow to divine, to thwart his policy by what he would call an intrigue with Archduke Charles, his most formidable antagonist, appears to have roused into fierce opposition all that was combative in Thugut's nature. When Lord Grenville's decision was known at Vienna orders went from the Council of War to the Archduke to engage in no operations without its sanction. In answer to the communication from St. Petersburg the Emperor, on August 6, 1799, expressed acquiescence in the removal of Souvorow and his Russian troops to Switzerland and confidence that the Marshal would be able, with the force under his immediate command, to drive out Masséna. The new plans adopted by his allies, he continued, had made a change in his own necessary for the protection of Germany and of his particular interests. War with France restored his rights in Belgium, which he did not intend to relinquish to England and Russia. He had, therefore, determined to move the Archduke's army from Switzerland to Mayence to defend Swabia, occupy Belgium, and thus co-operate with the Anglo-Russian expedition to Holland. And in order, still further, to aid Paul's plans, an Austrian corps of 30,000 men would be stationed on the Upper Rhine to co-operate in Souvorow's invasion of France by besieging Belfort and Thuringin at the proper season—namely, in the following year. Thugut had already sent Count Dietrichstein at the end of July with orders to the Archduke to withdraw with all his troops to Mayence when Korsakow's Russian corps arrived at Zurich. The Emperor, Dietrichstein explained, on arriving at the Austrian headquarters, had given this order for political reasons, constrained to it by the pressure put upon him by his allies, particularly by the Government of Great Britain. News arriving soon after at Vienna of the surrender of Mantua, the Emperor wrote to Souvorow to hand over his Italian command to General Melas, and lead his Russian bands into Switzerland. And when Lord Mulgrave reached Berlin on his way to Zurich, in the middle of August, he was met by despatches from Lord Minto, now British Minister at Vienna, announcing Baron Thugut's declaration that military concert with England was at present "unnecessary, the plan of operations being not only determined upon, but what remains of it about to be executed." Mulgrave, however, by the advice of Thomas Grenville, pursued his journey.†

* Mulgrave to Grenville, August 2, 1799. Vol. V.

The order to evacuate Switzerland at the bidding of the English and Russian Governments caused deep resentment in the Archduke's army. Mr. Wickham, British Resident Minister, hitherto a welcome visitor at the Austrian headquarters, suddenly found himself received there with lowering brows and sharp reproaches. And in answer to his protestations of disbelief in Dietrichstein's statement, the Archduke read out to him a passage to the same effect in a letter he had just received from his brother the Emperor. But preparations for departure were suddenly arrested by a vigorous attack of Masséna, which drove in the whole Austrian line, expelled General Jellachich from the little Cantons, captured the St. Gothard Pass, and thus interrupted Austrian communication with Italy.* Wickham's report of Dietrichstein's mission was read in the British Cabinet with anger and consternation. This last move of Baron Thugut had completely dislocated its Swiss plans. Lord Grenville at once instructed Minto to give formal contradiction to the Count's misrepresentations, and to quit Vienna unless the order to the Archduke was immediately recalled. He also invoked the Tzar's interference to save the Russian armies from destruction. Thugut at first refused to listen to Minto's demand. When, however, accounts reached him of Masséna's offensive movement he gave way so far as to promise that the Archduke should remain in his defensive position at Zurich without taking part in any plan of active operations. But hardly had this concession been extorted from him when news of a French foray into Wurtemberg gave him an excuse for withdrawing it.

When Mulgrave reached Switzerland he found the Austrians moving off to Germany. In a short interview he convinced the Archduke of the injustice done to the English Cabinet by Dietrichstein's statement, but was unable to arrest his march. General Korsakow had already arrived at Zurich, but, meeting with an ungracious reception at the Austrian headquarters, drew off his men to a distant position. The Archduke, however, left an Austrian corps of 23,000 men under General Hotze in the Grisons to hold the French in check until Souvorow brought his troops from Italy. Discord, confusion, and discouragement met Mulgrave at every turn. "The jealousy and hatred," he wrote to Grenville, "arising from envy and conceit, that the Austrians feel towards the Russians is beyond all example; and I am convinced that they would be much more gratified by a serious calamity happening to the Russians than by any success that could be obtained even by themselves against the enemy."† Korsakow's army, estimated on paper as 45,000 men, did not exceed 30,000; and 10,000 of these, being Cossack cavalry, were useless in a mountainous country. The infantry was admirable, but had neither magazines, proper equipments, nor a competent commander. Swiss recruiting had failed. In all the cantons, not excepting the two lately occupied by the Austrians, the government was revolutionary. In the mountain districts, old strongholds of the conservative cause, the flower of the male population had fallen in a desperate struggle against the French or taken service under the Emperor. And the arrogant temper of Colonel Crauford, the British commissary, gave general offence. Instead, therefore, of 70,000 or 80,000 troops in British pay, as Lord Grenville had calculated in London, Souvorow would hardly have 40,000 under his command, including those he might bring from Italy. And the greater part of this army was now exposed to imminent danger of destruction, in an indefensible position at Zurich, by the folly of General Korsakow, who refused to move to safer ground. Mulgrave, therefore, hurried down into Italy to warn Souvorow of the situation he would have to face after crossing the Alps. He found the marshal in very depressed spirits. Complaints from the King of Sardinia had filled the Tzar's mind with distrust of Austrian designs, which evasive answers from Vienna served to confirm. He therefore proposed that the allied powers should send representatives to a conference, in which the particular aims of each and the general aims of the coalition should be clearly defined. Lord Grenville accepted this proposal. Baron Thugut refused, on the plea that any discussion of terms of peace would be premature until another campaign brought the end of the war into nearer view. Paul, highly incensed by this answer, declared that no more Russian blood should be spilled to feed Austrian rapacity. He announced his intention of continuing war against France in concert only with George III., and sent an order to Souvorow to quit Italy at once. The Russian marshal opened his mind to Mulgrave with the same frankness as later on, with more time at his disposal, in conference with Wickham. And the substance of his remarks in these various conversations, so far as they bore on the British project of a Swiss campaign, is given here. He condemned the British plan of conquering Switzerland by means of an army composed mainly of Russian troops as utterly impracticable. The Russian military system, he explained, was still in a rude stage of development. It provided neither staff, commissariat, nor magazines. His officers were only instructed in regimental duties. The pay of all ranks was miserably insufficient, that of the soldier being only equivalent to 1½d. a day. Russian armies had been accustomed to fight on open plains and to live at free quarters on the enemy's country. They knew nothing of mountain warfare, and must starve in Switzerland, already eaten bare by the French. The proper plan would be to use the Swiss and German levies of the English Government in strengthening the army of the Archduke against Masséna, and to leave himself in Italy to complete the conquest of that country and enter France by forcing the passage of the River Var. It was only by having at his command Austrian military appliances and a trained Austrian staff, which had served him with great devotion, that he had been able to accomplish so much during the present campaign. He had answered a letter from the Emperor Francis II. depriving him of his Italian command by a remonstrance. But the orders of his own sovereign must be obeyed without a murmur. In order to give effect to them he had adopted a plan drawn up by his Austrian chief of the staff, Weinrotha, of a combined attack on Masséna's position by Korsakow, Hotze, and himself, in front, flank, and rear. The date fixed for its execution was September 26th. Of the hazards and uncertainties of this plan by which three bodies of troops, widely separated from each other and without any connecting link, were to advance against an enemy greatly superior in strength, he seemed to be fully aware. And he insisted on the necessity of the Archduke's immediate return to Switzerland to co-operate with him. Mulgrave's report of this interview expressed profound admiration of the old warrior's genius; of the clear insight and wide grasp of the military situation displayed in his discourse.* But it was with great misgiving as to the issue of the enterprise in which Souvorow was now engaged that the British envoy set out for Vienna to urge compliance with his demand for Austrian co-operation. He arrived in that capital to find his worst fears verified. Souvorow was delayed three days at the foot of the St. Gothard waiting for means of transport. Having forced his way across the pass, he reached Altdorf by the Devil's Bridge on September 28, to find that Masséna, anticipating him, had attacked and routed the armies of Korsakow and Hotze on the 24th, and was inclosing himself in an iron circle from which escape seemed almost impossible. Fighting his way with great loss to Glarus, he led his men thence over one of the most frightful of Swiss glaciers into the Grisons, and finally arrived at Coire without guns or baggage after a march hardly paralleled in military annals. This decisive defeat was also the death-blow of the Anglo-Russian expedition to Holland, the Directory being now able to send large reinforcements to General Brune. In the conflict between Austrian and English policy in the Netherlands and Switzerland, Thugut had won on both issues. But all the real gain went to France. There is every reason to believe that England and Austria, acting in cordial concert with each other and with Russia against the common foe, might have accomplished with ease in the summer and autumn of 1799 all the aims which were achieved only after fifteen years more of desolating warfare, at a cost of blood and treasure probably unsurpassed in any equal period of European history.

Baron Thugut does not appear to have been much alarmed at first by the prospect of losing a Russian alliance, which had become a hindrance rather than a help to Austrian policy. The Emperor and his minister, flushed with success, confident in the strength and spirit of victorious armies, and growing daily more impatient of dictation from St. Petersburg, which opposed a peremptory veto to their Italian projects, had already determined to dispense with Russian aid in every field of Austrian military operations, except in proportions and on conditions which should bring it completely under their own control. Above all things, Souvarow should not again be placed in command of Austrian troops. At the same time Thugut's acute perception, however clouded by the fumes of political conflict, could not be altogether blind to the risks Austria incurred by setting the Tzar at defiance. A sense of isolation and an urgent need of financial aid led him to seek a secret understanding with the British Government, which had no interests in Italy antagonistic to those of the Emperor. Lord Grenville had early in the summer sent Lord Minto as British minister to Vienna to recover ground supposed to have been lost by Sir Morton Eden's credulity and want of back-bone, and to assert British interests by more vigilant and masterful action. But it seemed to some of his diplomatic colleagues that, in the course of a few weeks, Minto fell as completely as his predecessor had fallen under the Chancellor's spell, and accepted his statements with equal facility. In confidential discussions during the last fortnight in August, Thugut proposed to Minto that the British and Austrian Governments should endeavour, without consulting any other power, to come to an understanding by frankly disclosing to each other the political objects each had specially in view. If agreement could not be arrived at, he said, mutual confidences might be forgotten. The Emperor, Thugut confessed, meant to keep all upper Italy to the River Var, and the three Papal Legations. He did not want Bavaria, nor even the Netherlands, unless enlarged and fortified by the addition of French Flanders. The Netherlands might be given to the King of Sardinia as compensation for loss of Italian territory, or even to the Prince of Orange on condition that England transferred to them the burden of Austrian loans. He asked the British Government to lend its support to these arrangements.

When Minto brought forward the unratified convention of 1797, as an insuperable obstacle to political concert, Thugut replied that the Emperor feared to ruin his credit in Germany by avowing that he had borrowed money at such high interest in the English market. If, however, the British Government would engage to keep the transaction secret till the close of the present war, ratification might be obtained.*

There is reason to doubt whether Thugut, in this apparently frank revelation of rapacity, made a full avowal of the ambitious designs he had formed in the intoxication of rapid conquest. A few months later Lord Keith, commanding the naval forces of Great Britain in the Mediterranean, sent Dundas from Palermo the substance of what purported to be a memorandum on Italy, presented by the Imperial Chancellor to his sovereign.† In this document the policy is insisted on of bringing all the states of that peninsula under the Emperor's sway, either as absolute possessions or as dependencies. In the latter category figure the Kingdom of Naples, the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, and whatever remnant of territory Austria might leave to the Pope. The communication seems to have been made to Lord Keith by the Queen of Naples, sister of the Empress, both of these ladies being political antagonists of Baron Thugut.

The British Cabinet was quite willing, so far as the Emperor Paul could be induced to consent, to give Austria a free hand in Italy. It was desirable for British interests that stronger barriers should be raised in every quarter against French aggression. Pitt even considered that compensation for the King of Sardinia was rather a matter of favour than of right. As for the wishes or interests of the populations affected by these territorial changes, if they entered at all into the calculations of statesmen at that time, they weighed as chaff in the balance of political advantage. But English distrust of Thugut's methods had not been diminished by Dietrichstein's mission to Switzerland and the explanations of it given at Vienna. Thugut, indeed, vehemently repudiated all responsibility for his emissary's language, but no one seems to have attached any credit to the denial. And the British Cabinet, though placing a much higher value on Austrian co-operation than it had done earlier in the year, still looked on a Russian alliance as the main plank—in fact the only sound plank—of its Continental system. Lord Grenville, therefore, instructed Lord Minto to inform Thugut that the British Government would enter into no negotiation with that of the Emperor without the concurrence of the Tzar, its best ally; and that the financial convention, when ratified at Vienna, must be laid before the British Parliament. These conditions being satisfied, it would do everything in its power to promote Austrian interests in Italy.*

The season for military operations on a large scale in 1799 having now passed, the British Government prepared a new plan of campaign for 1800, which Lord Grenville sent to Mr. Wickham to be laid before Souvorow. Following nearly the same lines as that which had failed so signally, it proposed to assemble in Switzerland an army of 100,000 men in British pay, under the marshal's command, composed as to two-thirds of Russians and as to one-third of Germans, Swiss, and French. But to supply deficiencies of the Russian military organisation there was to be an English commissariat and a staff of English, German, and French officers formed by Lord Mulgrave, who was to fill the post of adjutant or quartermaster general, besides taking command of the Swiss.

Souvorow reached Swabia in very bad humour with the Austrian officials, whom he held responsible for his defeat; with Thugut for removing him from Italy and exposing his army to destruction, with Melas for delaying his march by not furnishing means of transport, with the Archduke for returning too late to Switzerland to give him support. The infantry under his command, including Korsakow's troops, now a mere mob of marauders, did not exceed 28,000 men. They were in absolute need of rest, re-organisation, and re-equipment. Nevertheless he immediately proposed to the Archduke a combined attack on Masséna, who now occupied the position at Zurich so long held by the Austrians. The Archduke, fettered by instructions from Vienna, offered in reply to distract the attention of the French by a demonstration in force, while the Russians assaulted the fortified lines of a victorious and much stronger enemy. This answer, and still more the form in which it was conveyed, stirred the smouldering antagonism of the two generals to open quarrel. Souvorow, on assuming the chief command in Italy, had been made an Austrian field-marshal by the Emperor Francis II. For his subsequent victories his own sovereign had created him prince, with the title of Italiski. The Archduke, animated by jealousy and dislike, would only allow him, in official communication, the rank of Russian Field Marshal. And Souvorow, fiercely resenting the omission of his other titles as a deliberate slight, returned insult for insult, refused an invitation to a personal conference, and prepared to withdraw his troops into winter quarters at Augsburg. This trouble was still brewing when Wickham paid the first of several visits to the marshal to arrange with him a new plan of campaign. The British minister had already conceived almost unbounded admiration for the Austrian army, and particularly for its commander and its staff, with whom he had associated for some months, on a footing of intimacy. It would not be surprising, therefore, if their prejudices and animosities should in some measure, without his knowledge, have coloured his views of the Russian army and its general. His letters certainly deal faithfully with everything in Souvorow's character or conduct that seemed to his sharp scrutiny to savour of eccentricity or invite censure. But they testify, more grudgingly perhaps, but not less amply, than those of Lord Mulgrave, to the extraordinary vigour of mind, clearness of view, and firm grasp of the whole military situation displayed in the Marshal's conversation. And the impression of the old warrior they leave on the reader's mind, as of one easily roused to anger but easily appeased, frank and courteous to strangers, and greatly beloved by all who lived in close relations with him, is certainly pleasing. Souvorow listened attentively, but without approval, to the plan sketched by Lord Grenville; and repeated to Wickham the objections he had already stated to Lord Mulgrave. The idea of a composite staff, hastily gathered from all nations, moved him to mirth. The Swiss and Bavarian levies, he said, should be given to the Archduke to strengthen his army. "I want to go to Italy because my troops and officers are not fitted for mountain warfare. I want to march into France by Dauphiné while the Archduke operates in Switzerland and Franche Comté." If this arrangement could not be made, he still insisted on having an Austrian staff of his own selection and a mixed army of Russians and Austrians under his command. Into the burning question of the pillage and indiscipline of his troops, which provoked loud outcries in Switzerland and Germany, and gave Baron Thugut just ground of complaint, he would not enter. But some of his officers were less reticent, and they enabled Wickham to form some estimate of the difficulty of applying a remedy. The Russian soldiers had been used in their Eastern campaigns to live by pillage. Without better pay and a commissariat they must plunder or starve. His army was a favourite hobby of the Tzar. He was so proud of it, so assured of its perfect organisation by old generals who flattered his foibles, that Souvorow himself did not dare to suggest improvement. It was only from Count Woronzow in London that any hint of deficiency would be tolerated, and then only as an echo of English opinion. Wickham, therefore, proposed to Lord Grenville to make use of Woronzow's reports to open the Tzar's eyes to the wants of his troops. In the meantime the atmosphere in which the Minister lived was hot with strife. The Archduke protested loudly against the withdrawal of the Russians to Augsburg, leaving him to face Masséna alone. Italiskí replied with taunts. Grand Duke Constantine Paul's second son, now serving his apprenticeship to arms, a half-crazed malignant savage, blew the coals of discord with all his might. Wickham, in despair, hastily summoned Lord Mulgrave back from Vienna to mediate between the enraged chiefs. But Mulgrave, finding that he could do nothing with Thugut, had already gone to Berlin on his road to England. Then a passing dread at Vienna of the Tzar's rising anger allayed the storm. The Archduke lowered his tone to entreaty, and the arrival on the scene of Prince Esterhazy, bearing the order of Maria Theresa and friendly greetings from the Emperor Francis to Souvorow and the Grand Duke, seemed to have reduced conflict to general accord, when an insulting expression applied to him by the Archduke, coming to Italiski's knowledge, provoked a furious retort which put an end to all hope of co-operation between the two commanders. Luckily for Germany the unprovided state of Masséna's army disabled that skilful general from profiting by the discord of his enemies.*

Having learned from Lord Minto that the Imperial Government could not be forced or persuaded to allow Souvorow to resume command of its armies in Italy, and from Mr. Wickham the result of his conferences with the Russian marshal, Lord Grenville drew up a new project of concert against France, and sent it early in November to Sir Charles Whitworth to be laid before the Tzar. By this scheme the Russian troops to be assembled in Switzerland were to be paid at the rates current in German armies. In order to secure the co-operation of Austria, Baron Thugut was to be asked to furnish the general plan of campaign for the coming year, which would be transmitted to St. Petersburg for Paul's approval. And as an additional means of binding the Emperor Francis to act in strict concert with his allies, it was suggested that he should be allowed to retain possession of Piedmont and Savoy, the King of Sardinia receiving Tuscany and the Papal Legations in exchange, and the Austrian Netherlands being handed over to the Grand Duke of Tuscany. In return for this concession to its Italian aims the Austrian Government was to satisfy Souvorow's requirements of an Austrian staff of his own selection and a body of 30,000 Austrian troops under his exclusive orders, and to furnish the magazines, guns, and whatever else might be needful to equip his army for a campaign. To act in co-operation with Souvorow, Lord Grenville added, the Archduke would have 100,000 men on the Rhine and Melas 80,000 in Italy, and 70,000 British troops would be available for descents on the coasts of France to support Royalist insurrections. The internal discord of the Republic and the impaired strength of its Government opened, he considered, a certain prospect that these forces, acting cordially in unison, would accomplish all the aims of the coalition in the course of another campaign. It was also suggested that the 15,000 Russian troops which had returned to England from Holland might be employed in the Mediterranean to conquer Majorca for the Tzar. Whitworth was enjoined to do all in his power to reconcile Paul to these proposals and to remove any jealousies or suspicions that insinuations hostile to England might have sown in the autocrat's mind. He was to state that the British Government would take no step in foreign policy without the Tzar's concurrence; to repeat in the most emphatic manner that it had no selfish designs on Malta, but would place that island, as already agreed upon, at the Tzar's disposition, and would soon propose the formation of an English branch of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem. To give more effect to Whitworth's representations Lord Grenville despatched Sir Home Popham, who had won Paul's favour when negotiating the Dutch expedition earlier in the year, on a second mission to St. Petersburg.

Concurrently with these instructions to Whitworth, others went from Whitehall to Lord Minto to apply to Baron Thugut for a plan of campaign, and to require of him the Austrian staff, troops, and military equipments needed for the formation of Souvorow's army in Switzerland. If this demand were refused Minto was to announce that George III. would take no further part in the war on the Continent, and would advise the Czar to follow his example. In the communication to the Tzar we find Lord Grenville, for the first time, urging the necessity of concert with Austria, which Paul had vainly insisted on, when the coalition was forming. It does not seem probable that the modified English project would have been acceptable to either of the powers to which it was addressed; but hardly was it launched when a blast from St. Petersburg swept it into the limbo⁴ of political abortions. Paul's anger had been so excited against the Austrian Government by complaints from Italy, and the evacuation of Switzerland by the Archduke, that news of the defeat of his armies by Masséna produced an explosion of resentment which found vent in a peremptory order recalling Souvorow and his troops to Russia, and in letters to the Emperor Francis II. and King George III. His letter to the Emperor declared their alliance suspended until satisfaction had been given for recent disloyal action, by the dismissal of Baron Thugut from office, and the renunciation of Austrian projects of annexation in Italy. That to George III. announced the rupture of Paul's alliance with the Emperor, and proposed a new league of Great Britain, Russia, Prussia, Denmark, and Sweden to curb the rapacity of Austria, while continuing war with the Republican government of France. Having himself broken off relations with the King of Prussia for not joining the coalition, Paul suggested that Thomas Grenville should be sent back to Berlin to smooth the way for a reconciliation. With the same object in view he had ordered, he said, Baron Krudener, his Minister at Copenhagen, then returning home on leave of absence, to halt at Berlin, and take advantage of any opening for a renewal of friendly intercourse.* This letter does not appear to have been answered. It had, indeed, a very different effect on British policy from that intended by its author. The quarrel of the Emperors and the recall of Souvorow put an end to British plans of campaign in Switzerland. Lord Grenville therefore reduced the application for Russian troops he had made through Whitworth and Popham to 15,000 or 20,000 men to reinforce the army of Archduke Charles, and 30,000 or 40,000 more, including those already in England, to serve in British expeditions to France and Holland. About the same time—November 26—he instructed Lord Minto to ask Baron Thugut for frank explanations with a view to concert between Great Britain and Austria in carrying on the war against France. On the other hand, jealousy of Austria, always a ruling motive of Prussian statesmen, and now common to Russia and Prussia, could not fail to bring these powers again into accord. Baron Krudener, breaking his journey at Berlin, was welcomed by Count Haugwitz, and the conferences that followed between these ministers restored the amicable relations of the sovereigns they represented.

regret for Paul's dissatisfaction, but ignored his complaints and his demand for reparation, and insisted on the right of Austria to an extension of dominion in Italy. Earlier in the year Count Dietrichstein had arranged a marriage between Paul's daughter, the Grand Duchess Alexandria, and Archduke Joseph, Palatine of Hungary. It was a scheme of Baron Thugut to draw the Tzar away from George III. into closer relations with the Emperor. But although Paul, from affection for his daughter, would not now break off this match, he did not allow it to affect his political attitude. He refused to receive Dietrichstein at his Court, and in a rejoinder to the Emperor declared in emphatic terms his intention to oppose Austrian encroachment on Sardinian or Papal territory. Shortly afterwards, Lord Grenville's representations, supported by the reports of Count Woronzow and the counsels of Count Panin, now Russian Vice-Chancellor, shook the resolution Paul had taken to withdraw from the coalition. At the end of November he sent permission to Souvorow, who was returning home by slow marches, to halt in Bohemia, while negotiations went on at Vienna. But the Emperor and Thugut, now irritated to the pitch of defiance by interference with their Italian projects, refused at first to allow any Russian troops to remain in the Empire. Minto, in great alarm, interposed as a mediator, and hurried off to Prague to patch up a compromise. He found that he had undertaken an impossible task. Souvorow insisted on Lord Grenville's proposal—the command of a mixed army of 100,000 men, with an Austrian staff. Thugut would not give any Austrian troops, nor allow more than 20,000 Russians to remain in Germany. Fruitless altercations consumed several weeks, and were ended in January, 1801, by news of an incident in Italy which brought the two empires to the very verge of war. Ancona, after a long blockade by an army commanded by the Austrian General Froelisch and a Russian naval squadron under Admiral Ushâkow, surrendered to the former, who accepted, without objection, articles of capitulation drawn up by the French commandant in terms grossly offensive to Russia. He followed up this display of ill-will by ordering Russian flags to be torn down from the public buildings of the town and the ships in the harbour. Paul, on receiving his admiral's report, demanded an apology from the Austrian Government and the dismissal of General Froelisch. Thugut, influenced apparently by the spirit of contradiction which sometimes possessed him, threw all the blame on the Russians. Thereupon Paul, justly incensed, ordered Souvorow to return at once, and forbade Count Cobentzl to appear at his Court until the redress he had demanded was given. His hatred of Jacobin government restrained him from resorting to violent measures which might prevent or delay the restoration of the French monarchy. But he arranged with the King of Prussia for joint action to frustrate Austrian projects of annexation, when the time came to settle the terms of a general peace.

Meantime Thugut had produced his plan of campaign at the beginning of December. It discarded Souvorow and excluded Russians from the chief fields of military operations on the Continent. The Austrian armies, it declared, would be quite able to expel the French from Italy and Switzerland if the British Government reinforced that of the Archduke with the 30,000 German auxiliaries Mr. Wickham was about to levy ; or, what would answer better, gave a subsidy to the Emperor to enable him to levy them himself. Russian troops, it added, could be used by the British Government with great advantage to the common cause in expeditions to Holland and the coasts of France, with which the Austrian armies might co-operate. In forwarding this sketch to Lord Grenville, Lord Minto reported in cipher that the Austrian Chancellor showed himself more eager every day to come to a thorough understanding with the English Government. In fact, notwithstanding the dogged obstinacy with which he clung to his projects and his antipathies, Thugut could not altogether shut his eyes to the peril involved in the improving relations of Russia and Prussia or his ears to Lord Grenville's repeated warnings against driving the Tzar to extremities. Then, again, financial difficulties weighed on him more heavily every day. His expectations of relief from the resources of Italy had been disappointed. Not only had French requisitions impoverished the country, but a spirit of passive resistance, aroused by the arrogance and ineptitude of Austrian officials, by old dynastic attachments, and by national aspirations, sealed up the ordinary sources of revenue in some of the occupied States. Slowly and with evident reluctance during the early part of December he receded from untenable ground. He reduced the Austrian demand of all Piedmont and Savoy to one for the Novarese, including Alexandria and other fortresses, for which the King of Sardinia should receive full compensation from Genoese territory. He agreed to make the restoration of the French monarchy a leading article of the common programme. Finally, he consented to ratify the financial convention of 1797. Having thus cleared his ground, he proposed as terms of alliance and concert—(1) that the British Government should relieve the Emperor of the burden of the last Austrian loan ; (2) that it should advance to him £1,600,000, soon afterwards raised to £2,000,000, of which £200,000 was required at once for pressing needs ; the whole to be repaid from a new Austrian loan to be floated after the close of the war with the help of British credit ; (3) that it should support the Emperor in the acquisition of the Papal Legations, the Novarese with its fortresses, and the city and territory of Genoa.

These proposals of Baron Thugut, coming immediately after the Emperor Paul's letter to George III., were followed by a complete change in the political attitude of the British Government towards its Imperial allies. The chief agent in effecting this alteration, so far as individual influence operated, was Mr. William Wickham. His mission to Switzerland in 1796-7 had won for him unbounded confidence from Lord Grenville. He returned to that country in 1799 invested with extraordinary powers, and instructed to act at once on his own judgment in all matters requiring prompt decision. Whatever arrangement Wickham should make, Lord Grenville wrote in confidence, he was prepared to approve as the best that could be made in the circumstances, and to give it full support. In the course of this second mission the British minister formed or renewed intimate personal relations with nearly all the Continental leaders of the coalition against France—with Archduke Charles and Prince Italiski, with Baron Thugut at Vienna, Count Montg  las at Munich, and Advoyer Steiguer in Switzerland ; with the chiefs of the Royalist party in eastern and southern France, Pichegru and Willot its generals, M. D'Andr   its most influential and trustworthy agent, Count de Pr  cy the heroic defender of Lyons. These connections enabled him to throw light on various subjects of high importance, of which the British ministry had only very imperfect knowledge. It was mainly from Wickham's reports of the defects of Russian military organisation and the open hostility of the Russian and Austrian armies, that it learned the impracticability of its plans of campaign in Switzerland. Glowing descriptions in the same reports of the superb condition of the Austrian armies, under able commanders and staffs of extraordinary merit, taught it to form a new and quite different estimate of the comparative importance of Russia or Austria as an ally for accomplishing British aims on the Continent. It was also through Wickham that the Cabinet obtained its most valuable information in regard to the state of France. M. D'Andr   had for many years carried on secret correspondence with prominent men of all parties in Paris. Trimming politicians—and this category included nearly every Republican of note, not a regicide, under the Directory—who shrank from communication with ordinary Royalist agents as perilous indiscretion, confided without fear in D'Andr  , whose wary prudence, though often severely tested, was never found wanting. With like confidence D'Andr   freely disclosed to Wickham information which he withheld from babbling courtiers of the emigrant princes. Through this channel Grenville obtained copies of confidential reports to the French War Office of the diminishing strength of the Republican armies, and undoubted evidence of the internal distraction and financial distress which crippled the Directory. And it was these circumstances—the military superiority of Austria and the opportunity offered by the weakness of France—together with a conviction, founded on the pacific temper and failing revenue of England, that this opportunity must be promptly seized if their own Continental aims were to be accomplished, that shaped the action of the British Government at the beginning of the year 1800.

As an adviser under ordinary circumstances, and in matters with which his mission was concerned, Wickham appears to have been not undeserving of the trust reposed in him by Lord Grenville. He was able, zealous, hard-working, and personally devoted to his official chief ; an acute judge of men and political conditions, and skilful in turning them to advantage. Unsparing of himself, he was by his own confession irritable and exacting in his relations with subordinates whose methods did not please him or whose labours fell below his own high standard of public duty. We may also allow him the credit he claims for himself of being patient and wary in dealing with adversaries. And although his personal integrity was spotless, he seems, when British interests were to be advanced, to have been hardly less hampered by scruples than Count Haugwitz or Baron Thugut. In fact, his qualities as a public servant made him a type of what is called efficiency. He had also the defects of these qualities. His self-confidence led him to form estimates which sometimes proved exaggerated, of the influence he exercised over men and events. Intensely practical, his mind seems to have been but slenderly endowed with the faculty of imagination, and therefore wanting in the insight which recognises genius of a high order, with its power of creating resources and opportunities, inspiring men, moulding events, working miracles. He read Baron Thugut in his changing moods like an open book. He could discern the great abilities and sterling qualities concealed from ordinary observers under the dull aspect of Archduke Charles. The superb order, exact discipline, and military pride of the Austrian army, the scientific methods of its staffs, "unequalled in Europe, and from whom it is more than probable that some of the first generals of modern times will spring," appealed so convincingly to him that he accepted it, at its own valuation, as practically invincible. But Souvorow remained to the end of their intercourse more or less of a mystery to him. It never seems to have entered into his calculations that the substitution of Melas for the Russian marshal as commander-in-chief in Italy could sensibly affect the fortunes of the war. Yet Souvorow's victories had been to a great extent instrumental in raising the military spirit of Austria from a state of profound dejection to that condition of arrogant self-reliance which so moved his admiration. Far more hurtful to the cause for which he laboured was Wickham's failure to see any particular significance in Bonaparte's return to France to grasp the reins of government. It hardly appears to have occurred to him that France under Bonaparte was a more formidable adversary than under Barras. This was, of course, blindness common to the whole British Cabinet. There is nothing more noticeable in Lord Grenville's correspondence at this time than the absence of any recognition of merit in Bonaparte. He is mentioned only to be depreciated. When he became First Consul, Sa Mājestē très Corse, figures in letters between Lord Grenville and his brothers as a ridiculous pretender. When the victorious Consul had pulverised the coalition, he became to them all an object of virtuous hatred, an incarnation of evil. But for Wickham, who lived in a broader and less prejudiced atmosphere, and who had seen, at the time of his first Swiss mission, all that he had been able to accomplish during many months of assiduous labour and secret intrigue completely demolished by Bonaparte's marvellous achievements in Italy, there was less excuse.

An instance of Lord Grenville's confidence in Wickham's judgment occurs in connection with a curious negotiation carried on during the year 1799 by the secretary of the Director Barras with the Royalist agents, M. Fauche-Borel and Count de Maison-fort, for the restoration of the French monarchy. The conditions agreed upon are set down at full length on pages 177-184 of Vol. V. The Emperor Paul, at the instance of Count de Provence, afterwards Louis XVIII., requested the British Government to advance the sum of twelve millions of francs demanded on behalf of Barras. Lord Grenville had no faith in the project, which was to be effected by one of the Republican armies, purged by Barras of its Jacobin elements and placed under the command of General Pichégrou, with the support of the Russian army of General Korsakow. But he referred the whole matter to Wickham, with liberty to decide as he should think fit. What Wickham thought about it does not appear. All the papers relating to the scheme fell into Masséna's hands, together with Korsakow's personal effects, after the battle of Zurich, which crushed it out of existence. Among the incidents connected with the revolution of the 18th Brumaire nothing caused more general surprise than the tame submission of the redoubtable Barras, who had raised himself to power, and kept it, by three successful coups d'état, to expulsion from office without even an attempt to make terms for himself. The explanation seems to be that Talleyrand, who had been privy to the negotiation with Count de Provence, revealed it to Bonaparte, and thus delivered the peccant Director into the hands of his former protégé, the "little Corsican officer" of the siege of Toulon and Vendémiaire 13.

Although Wickham miscalculated the military power of Austria without Souvorow, and against Bonaparte, the advices he forwarded from France, however coloured by the passions and hopes of the Royalist party from which they emanated, could hardly exaggerate the distress and weakness of the Republic during the last days of the Directory. It was a condition of hopeless bankruptcy, of military inefficiency, of universal discontent rising to armed revolt in eighteen departments of the West. Impecuniosity was a chronic malady of the Republic, comparatively harmless in days of revolutionary fervour, fatal in days of national depression. It had originated in two fiscal innovations introduced by the National Assembly—one abolishing internal indirect taxation, which had supplied one-third of the revenue of the French monarchy; the other transferring the assessment of direct taxation to local authorities chosen by popular election. As these bodies neglected a thankless duty, the collection of national revenue annually fell more and more into arrear, and the widening gap between public receipts and public expenditure was covered by enormous emissions of assignats, which swamped the money market, and fell rapidly in value as a medium of exchange. During the dictatorship of the Committee of Public Safety, revolutionary energy overcame all difficulties by placing the whole property and population of France under requisition for the public service. But in the re-action that followed the downfall of Robespierre, wholesale confiscation had to be abandoned. The governing authorities had recourse to new issues of paper money, and when these lost all value as national currency, to repudiation of public debt. During the year 1799 all the proceeds of taxation and all the resources of public credit had not sufficed to provide for one-half of necessary public expenditure. Every branch of the service was starved into inefficiency; army contractors, public functionaries, and other creditors of the State were not paid at all, or paid only by "bills of arrears," to be held over till money came into the Treasury, or exchanged for unsaleable national domains. Rich speculators bought up these bills for half the nominal value, and made immense profit by returning them to the Exchequer in payment of taxes. A progressive forced loan, designed by the Directory to fleece these capitalists, failed in its object, and swelled public clamour. The armies unpaid, ill-fed, unsupplied with winter clothing or munitions of war, could hardly be held together. Especially the soldiers of the army of Italy, cooped up early in autumn by the Austrians in the barren mountains of Liguria, and closely blockaded along the whole coastline by English frigates, perished in great numbers of cold and hunger. Reinforcements supplied by conscription almost immediately abandoned their colours, and covered the roads, particularly of southern France, with brigands and sturdy beggars. And although the victories of Masséna and Brune and the discord of the allies allowed the Directory ample breathing-time in the autumn, it found itself unable to despatch troops to the revolted provinces of the west, where a spirit of resistance, provoked by the law of conscription, and fanned into fury by the law of hostages, blazed up in insurrection from the English Channel to the Garonne. The French 5 per cent. rentes fell to 7. After the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, Gaudin, whom Bonaparte made Minister of Finance, found less than £7,000 in the Treasury. Government lived from hand to mouth, as best it could. In the Minister's own words, finance no longer existed in France.*

A leading feature of the original British plan of military operations for 1799 was the despatch of a body of troops to Brittany in the autumn. When the army employed in the expedition to Holland returned to England at the end of October, Lord Buckingham urged that it should be sent at once to help the French royalists. More timid counsels prevailed. Lord Grenville replied that Government could not risk the loss of the 30,000 effectives who had come back from the Helder in an enterprise full of hazard at that late season. Its policy must be to nurse the military strength of the country during the winter, so as to have 70,000 men available for foreign service in the spring of 1800. In the meantime liberal supplies of money, arms and ammunition should be sent to Brittany to feed the insurrection. At the end of November he announced that two such consignments had already reached the French coast.†

On November 30, 1799, Lord Grenville officially informed Wickham that reports of the disaffection of General Masséna and his army to the new French Government had reached England, and authorised him to purchase their aid on any terms that might secure it. Wickham was also instructed to induce deserters from the Republican armies to take service under Louis XVIII. by offering them French military pay at the current rates. Count d'Artois, it may be stated, had been empowered to recruit the royalist forces in western France in the same manner to the extent of 70,000 men. A long confidential letter accompanied this despatch. It expressed Lord Grenville's "infinite obligations" for intelligence and advice which had been "his chief guide and direction" in recent difficulties, and had saved him from the error of trusting in Souvorow as the instrument designed by Providence to give victory to Great Britain in a final effort against France. For however able the British Government might be to carry on a defensive struggle for many years, one more Continental campaign was the limit of its power for offensive warfare. He felt confident that, even without Russian aid, Austria would be able to reduce France to the frontiers of 1789, perhaps to restore the French monarchy, if Thugut could be brought to pursue a straightforward course. The English Government on its side was silently preparing for "an immense effort" in the following spring to support the royalists of western France. Bonaparte could only maintain his power by using French armies to repress his Jacobin enemies. This necessity must leave him without troops to oppose western insurgents, or Austrian foes advancing from the east. His only resource, therefore, lay in a negotiation for peace. If this expedient failed him, as it must "if there was a grain of sense in Austrian councils," he should have to choose between deportation to Cayenne and submission to Louis XVIII. In order to force the Consul quickly to one of these issues, Wickham was urged to raise insurrections during the winter in the south and east of France, which might distract attention from La Vendée and co-operate with British expeditions in the following spring. In carrying out these instructions he was to act on his own judgment without fear or delay, and to continue supplying the Cabinet with information and advice.*

On December 13 Wickham replied to these communications by a public despatch and a private letter. In the former he reported that, with the approval of Archduke Charles, he had commissioned General Pichégrou to enrol an army of French deserters to act with the Austrians in Franche Comté; and General Willot to collect another army of the same material in Dauphiné. Willot would concert operations with General Melas and with the British commanders in the Mediterranean. Count de Précý would raise Lyons and the surrounding districts. Trustworthy intelligence had enabled him, Wickham wrote, to form an estimate of the comparative strength of the opposing forces in the next campaign. The Archduke would have under his orders 100,000 Austrians on the Rhine, and Melas the same number in Italy. To the Rhine army Wickham hoped, by Swiss enrolments and German treaties, to add 40,000 men in British pay, and 20,000 Sardinians might also be taken into British pay to reinforce the army of Melas. On the other hand, the military strength of France was greatly exaggerated in official returns. The army of Italy, exceeding on paper 60,000 men, had only 30,000 effectives. Bonaparte by great efforts might be able to place in the field from 150,000 to 180,000 men altogether, a force inferior to the Austrians in numbers, and still more in quality and equipment. As to financial resources, a leading banker of Paris calculated the extraordinary aid the Consul might be able to obtain, by using every means at his disposal, at three and a half millions sterling; a sum utterly inadequate to supply the needs of the French armies. In conclusion, the despatch stated that the new French Government would probably have general support for a time. "It seems possible that the war will be conducted with more talents and energy than has lately been the case." But Bonaparte "cannot steer long between Jacobins and Royalists." If he fails to obtain peace he must lean for support on the former, and forfeit public favour, as he can only carry on war by resorting to revolutionary methods.

In his private letter of the same date Wickham wrote—The question (of carrying on war) is reduced to this: "are you prepared to throw yourselves into the arms of the House of Austria or no? If not, renounce at once every idea of a Continental war against France, for you can neither carry it on without Austria nor force her to carry it on in any other than her own way." Lord Grenville, he continued, must alter his methods, must flatter and cajole and feign confidence, instead of dictating military operations and criticising political action. By doing with a good grace what he cannot help, giving Austrian strategists a free hand, by praising and occasionally pensioning them, he can exercise considerable influence over the movements of Austrian armies. Above all things, it was necessary to avoid showing distrust of Baron Thugut, however tortuous and irritating the Chancellor's conduct might be. His quarrel with the Russians had fixed him on his throne for ever; reconciling to him his bitterest ill-wishers, the army of the Rhine and the states of south Germany, which had hated him for hating their favourite, the Archduke. He now reigned without rival or possible successor. The British Cabinet, as we shall see, followed this counsel, though in some respects with halting steps.

When Lord Grenville instructed Sir Charles Whitworth in November, 1799, to ask for Russian auxiliaries not only to take part in British expeditions to the coast of France, but also to reinforce the Archduke's army on the Rhine, he must have felt that he was making a hazardous experiment on the Tzar's temper. Writing at the same time to inform Lord Minto of his efforts at St. Petersburg in favour of Austria, he added—"Far from blaming the Emperor of Russia, I must say if I were a Russian minister I should be very deaf to the remonstrances of England on the subject." And this was before news had come of the outrage at Ancona, which aggravated previous injury by public insult. The tacit refusal of the British Government to espouse his quarrel with the Emperor Francis, still more its application to him, urged by Whitworth with indiscreet zeal, to stultify himself in the face of Europe by helping Austria to despoil princes whom he had pledged himself to protect, could not fail to incense Paul, and call down his anger on the diplomatist who identified himself with such a proposal. Ill-feeling also arose out of the failure of the joint expedition to Holland, which prevented any further association of English and Russian troops in a common enterprise. In his reports, official and private, of the attack on Brune's positions near Bergen on September 19, the Duke of York had cast the whole blame of defeat on the headlong indiscipline of the Russian column led by General Hermann. On the other hand, the Russians complained that, having occupied Bergen, they were left without British support, to be crushed by an overwhelming concentration of French troops. And as Mr. Windham remarked in a letter to Lord Grenville, the absence of any report of the movements of the column contiguous to the Russians, and under the immediate command of the Duke, left it open to doubt whether, though the Russians advance had been precipitate, that of the English might not have been tardy. Whatever the merits of the case, Hermann's defeat and capture occasioned recriminations in the allied army which had an injurious effect on its subsequent operations. After the return of the expedition to England, General Essen, Hermann's successor, both in general conversation and in a report to his sovereign, attributed the bad success of the military operations to the incapacity of the Duke of York. His language aroused great resentment at the Court of George III. and in the highest English military circles. And although Paul, in consequence of advices from Count Woronzow, dismissed both Hermann and Essen from his service, the accusations of the latter general, constantly repeated at St. Petersburg, appear to have rankled in his mind. Under these adverse influences, while Dundas, hitherto an advocate for treating only with Russia as an ally in Continental affairs, now declared that Russian soldiers could only be used with advantage in small detached bodies, drilled and commanded by English officers, the Tzar, when authorising the employment of Essen's troops in an expedition to Brittany, made the condition that they should not be commanded by an English general, and especially not by the Duke of York. About the same time Count Tolstoi, a Russian officer who had been attached to the headquarters of the Archduke at Zurich, returned to St. Petersburg. Questioned by the Tzar, he blurted out the whole truth of the deficiencies and depredations of Korsakow's army. Paul's resentment seems to have fallen on the Russian generals who had shrunk from incurring his anger by dispelling his illusions. Souvorow sank into the grave under the shock of a curt message from an ungrateful master announcing his disgrace. Other Russian generals were deprived of their commands. And Count Vioménil, a French émigré, was placed at the head of the 15,000 Russian troops wintering in the Channel islands, with authority, under Count Woronzow's direction, to form a French staff, and supply whatever else was necessary to make them a fighting machine formidable only to an enemy. The disinclination, however, of the British Government to send any of its troops to act with those of Vioménil, on the ground of incompatibility of temper, put an end to the project of an expedition to Brittany, and the Russians returned home in the spring of 1800. Other causes of dissatisfaction at the Court of St. Petersburg were the refusal of George III. to allow British officers who had served in Holland to wear Russian decorations sent to them by Paul, and the convention of El Arish for the evacuation of Egypt by the French, signed on board Sir Sidney Smith's ship the Tigre by General Kleber and the Turkish Grand Vizier. Sir Home Popham, who had started for St. Petersburg in November, 1799, bearing a letter from King George to the Tzar, and charged by Lord Grenville with explanations on every point likely to provoke discussion, being delayed by contrary winds, did not reach his destination till late in the following March, when cordial alliance had given place to complete estrangement. Paul's enmity to the Republican government of France had not yet diminished, but it was now counterbalanced by enmity to Thugut and his Italian policy. And he fell back into alliance with Prussia and the Prussian system of vigilant inactivity, to watch his enemies exhausting themselves in a final struggle, and intervene at the crucial moment to dictate terms of peace.

With the end of the year came Bonaparte's letters to the chiefs of the coalition, proposing peace. Lord Buckingham, to whom

Lord Grenville sent a copy of the Consul's letter to George III., as a new year's gift, counselled his brother to return a "moderate" answer, it being for the interests of the Ministry to conciliate public opinion, which inclined strongly to negotiation. The British reply, or rather replies, were wholly written by Lord Grenville, though altered from the original form in deference to suggestions from Pitt and Canning. Thomas Grenville informed Lord Buckingham that the answer to the Consul's letter caused a good deal of dissatisfaction even among supporters of the Government. It was in fact a public declaration of the convictions already expressed in Lord Grenville's confidential letters to his brothers and to Wickham. "His very Corsican Majesty," without adequate resources in men or money for carrying on war, or independent support from either of the two hostile parties that divided France, could only maintain his position by making peace. It would be sheer folly, therefore, on the part of the allied powers to negotiate instead of crushing him, and thus ending the war on their own terms. And this opinion of Bonaparte's extreme weakness found support in the inaction of the French armies during the winter, in striking contrast to the all-conquering energy he had hitherto shown in war. But events in France had already disproved the assumptions on which Lord Grenville based his train of reasoning, making it clear that the great mass of the French population were neither Jacobins nor adherents of Louis XVIII. They would no doubt have preferred some form of constitutional monarchy, such as that accepted in 1791 by Louis XVI. to the feeble and corrupt Jacobinism of a Directory which trampled on civil and religious rights and prolonged war to serve its own selfish ends. But the Frenchmen who would have welcomed back a monarchy of divine right, the ancien régime with its inequalities and abuses represented by the emigrant princes, at the price too of national humiliation and diminished territory, formed only a small minority of the nation. The return from Egypt of the victorious general who had dictated the peace of Campo Formio, the most glorious in the national annals, awakened in France a sense of profound relief. His seizing the reins of government was sanctioned by general support. The conciliatory measures that followed, repealing proscriptive decrees, opening the churches for Christian worship, inviting able men of all parties to unite in serving the State, increased public confidence. With confidence, credit revived, and the great obstacle in his way, financial distress, rapidly diminished. Instead of the three and a half millions sterling to which his prospect of borrowing was limited in the reports sent by Wickham, he contrived to raise thirteen and a half millions—an amount insufficient for the needs of the Consular government, but enough to give it a fair start.* If the French people ardently desired peace, Bonaparte also sincerely desired it as necessary for France and for the establishment of his own power. But it was peace on lines not too dissimilar from those of Campo Formio. He knew well that peace on terms to which the British Government would consent must destroy the reputation for success on which his authority rested. It is probable, therefore, that the haughty and scornful answer returned to his overture to George III. was far from unwelcome to him. Meant as a trumpet blast to rouse up opposition against him, it appears to have produced a contrary effect. It gave Talleyrand an opening for a telling retort. It silenced the cry for peace in France; and it stimulated the opinion which, as we shall see, was rapidly gaining ground on the Continent—that England, from selfish motives, prolonged a war by which she alone profited, while all other nations suffered.

The Tzar took no notice of Bonaparte's letter to him. To that addressed to the Emperor, Baron Thugut returned a courteous reply, putting aside rather than rejecting the overture, and leaving a door open for discussion which continued to the end of the war. This temporising policy gave Lord Grenville and his colleagues no little uneasiness. But Thugut refused to make any disclosure of the First Consul's proposals until the British Government had accepted his terms for an offensive alliance against France. Bonaparte was more successful in restoring the good relations between France and Prussia which had been interrupted in the previous summer. By giving assurances of his intention of withdrawing French troops from Holland at the conclusion of peace, and of supporting Prussian interests in Germany, he came to a friendly understanding with the Court of Berlin. Count Haugwitz testified his good wishes to the Consular Government by fruitless endeavours to reconcile it with the Tzar, and to dissuade the Elector of Bavaria from joining the coalition.

Negotiation did not retard strenuous preparations by all the belligerent powers for the renewal of hostilities in spring. Count d'Artois having notified in December his intention of putting himself at the head of the Breton insurgents, Pitt agreed to send him with a large body of British troops to the peninsula of Rhuis in the following spring, on condition that the plan of this expedition prepared by M. de Rozière, a French strategist, provided a safe landing place, a defensible position on the peninsula, and adequate facilities for re-embarkation in case of defeat. De Rozière insisted that his plan fully satisfied these requirements. But General Sir Charles Grey, to whom Pitt referred it for advice, condemned it in unqualified terms. Before any decision was announced, all opportunity of testing the merits of the project passed away. One of the first matters to which Bonaparte turned his attention on becoming Chief of the State was the pacification of western France. With this object he offered the insurgents full redress of all their grievances in return for submission, and authorised General Hédouville to arrange an armistice in order that terms of peace might be discussed. The theatre of civil war was divided into two sections by the River Loire. During the obstinate struggle for religion rather than for monarchy, ended by General Hoche in 1796, La Vendée, to the south of the river, had been turned into a desert. It still remained in a very impoverished state, besides being, during the greater part of the year, shut in from external aid by a treacherous coast. In the departments north of the Loire, particularly those of Brittany and Normandy, the fire and sword of Jacobin conquest had made much less havoc; and frequent communication with Count d'Artois, and consignments of money and arms from England kept the spirit of insurrection from flagging.

The disintegrating influence of these differing circumstances manifested itself in a conference of Royalist leaders held at Pouancé at the close of the year 1799. The southern delegates, swayed by the advice of Abbé Bernier, an able and politic ecclesiastic who had convinced himself of the stability and good intentions of the Consular Government, were for accepting Hédouville's poposals. Those from districts north of the Loire, following instructions from Monsieur, stood out for an additional pledge that monarchy should be restored, and despatched two of their number—Hyde de Neuville and Andigni—to Paris to treat with Bonaparte on this subject. An interview at the Tuileries effectually dispelled any illusions the envoys may have cherished that the First Consul intended treading in the footsteps of General Monk. And when, on their return, the chiefs at Pouancé sought to gain further time by spinning out negotiations, Bonaparte put an end to the armistice, and placed General Brune, a red-hot Jacobin, at the head of 60,000 troops to proclaim martial law and crush the revolt. The Vendéens immediately accepted the terms offered by Hédouville. The royalists of Anjou, Maine, and Brittany, after a feeble attempt at resistance, laid down their arms on the same conditions. The Norman chief, Count Frotté, who submitted last, was taken and shot in violation of good faith. The other leaders, with the exception of Georges Cadoudal, who retired to England, accepted the new order of things in France with more or less of good will. And the British Government found the chief avenue through which it hoped to assail the Consular Government effectually closed against it. For although it offered shortly afterwards to land Viomenil and his Russians on the Breton coast, it refused to risk British troops in such a desperate adventure.

In the middle of February the British Cabinet had definitely fixed the main lines of its policy for the year 1800 ; and Lord Grenville communicated its decisions to Mr. Wickham, Lord Minto, and Sir Charles Whitworth. Wickham was informed that all his plans had been approved and his advice adopted. He was authorised to conclude treaties with the Electors of Bavaria and Wurtemberg, and minor states of southern Germany for troops to serve under Archduke Charles, at a cost to the British Exchequer of £1,000,000, afterwards raised to £1,500,000. £500,000 more was placed at his disposal, as secret service money, to defray the expenses of royalist armies under Generals Pichégrou and Willot. And the British Government undertook to send 20,000 British troops to the Mediterranean to co-operate with Willot.

Grenville's despatch to Lord Minto replied, as follows, to Baron Thugut's proposals. In addition to Wickham's expenditure, and £200,000 granted for the pay of Piedmontese troops, to serve under General Melas, £1,600,000 would be advanced to the Emperor in monthly instalments, without interest, to be repaid for a new Austrian loan at the end of the war. George III. renounced all claim to interfere by advice or criticism with Austrian military operations, and engaged to give them powerful support during the next campaign by expeditions to the coast of France. He approved of the territorial exchanges Thugut proposed making with the King of Sardinia, who should be allowed to return at once to his dominions. If the Emperor did not wish to keep the Belgic provinces, they might be given, at his option, to the Prince of Orange, to Archduke Charles to hold as a fief of the empire, or to the Grand Duke of Tuscany as a means of facilitating Austrian arrangements in Italy. Whichever mode of settlement might be agreed on, the British Government would afford Austria the financial relief Thugut desired by transferring to them the whole burden of recent Austrian loans. In return, the Emperor was required not to consent to the retention of any part of the Netherlands by France, and not to negotiate separately with that power.

This altered attitude in regard to the disposal of Belgium was explained in a private letter to Lord Minto. The Cabinet, Lord Grenville wrote, did not expect repayment from Austria, and had in view an arrangement for preventing a great and constantly recurring waste of time and money in raising and training a new army at the beginning of every war. This was to garrison Belgic fortresses with British troops, and require of the new ruler to pay and maintain the garrisons in lieu of interest on the transferred loans. In this way, it was thought, Belgium might be secured against French aggression, and England, without expense to herself, might possess an army ready for immediate service whenever she found herself engaged in hostilities with any other power.

At the same time Lord Grenville, in a most secret despatch, instructed Whitworth to inform the Tzar that the British Government no longer needed Russian troops, and had concluded a new treaty with the Emperor, affording Austria considerable financial aid. He was to use every effort to remove any bad impression this intelligence might make on Paul's mind.

The task here imposed on the English Minister at St. Petersburg would have taxed the skill of a far abler and more tactful representative, after the repeated assurances given to Paul that the British Government would enter into no new engagements without his concurrence. It mattered little, therefore, that Whitworth was no longer in a position even to attempt it. His indiscreet language in conversation with Count Cobentzl, coming to the ears, or probably the eyes, of the Chancellor Rastopsin, who as Postmaster-General had discovered the key to the Austrian Minister's ciphered despatches, gave deep offence at the Russian Court. Paul no longer granted him audience, and at the beginning of February applied through Count Woronzow for his recall. Meantime, the relations of Russia and Austria became every day worse. An Austrian Court of Inquiry found the Russian charges against General Froelisch, commanding at Ancona, proved, and suspended him from his employment. This inadequate penalty inflamed to a higher pitch the anger of the Tzar, who recalled M. Katichew from a special mission to Vienna, and returned friendly letters from the Emperor and Empress unopened. Count Cobentzl, finding patient endurance of the slights daily put on him profitless, retired from St. Petersburg. In these circumstances its avowed preference for an Austrian alliance could not fail to alienate Paul from the British Government. Treating Whitworth as he had treated Cobentzl, he refused passports for the official messengers of the English embassy. Sir Home Popham arrived late in March at St. Petersburg, and after a month passed in fruitless efforts to obtain audience from a Russian minister, or answers to official letters, returned home. About the same time Whitworth, lately solaced by elevation to an Irish peerage, received leave of absence from Lord Grenville. Paul, who had asked for his recall, then sent orders to Count Woronzow to repair to the Continent for the benefit of his health; and all friendly intercourse between the two Governments ceased.

Lord Minto expected, on receiving Lord Grenville's answer to Baron Thugut's proposals, that it would bring the two Governments into complete accord, and dispel all reserve as to Austrian negotiations with Bonaparte. To his astonishment, it threw the Imperial Chancellor into a towering passion. The British Government, Thugut complained, had not complied with his demands in essential particulars—a loan of £2,000,000, an immediate advance of £200,000, an undertaking to support the Emperor in annexing the Legations. Hot controversy followed, and Minto only averted a quarrel by conceding the points in dispute, with the exception of that relating to the Legations, which he referred to Lord Grenville. Thugut in return made a partial disclosure of his correspondence with Talleyrand, now French Minister of Foreign Affairs. He assured Minto that Bonaparte was willing to allow him his own way in Italy, and that the Emperor only continued the war in defence of English interests in the Netherlands. It was known, however, from Wickham's reports, that Bonaparte refused to surrender the Rhine provinces. And as Thugut felt confident of winning on the field of battle better terms from France than he could now obtain by negotiation, Minto had no doubt of the resumption of hostilities in the spring. Finally, the British Government agreed to advance £2,400,000 to the Emperor in three instalments of £800,000, payable on the first days of April, June, and September, 1800; to advise the King of Sardinia to consent to the exchange of territory required by Austria; to acquiesce in an Austrian annexation of the Papal Legations. The treaty was to remain in operation till February, 1801, and the articles relating to Sardinia and the Netherlands were not to be published. The King of Sardinia, however, rejected the proposals made to him by Lord Grenville on behalf of Austria, and appealed to the Tzar, who promised to defend him. And although all Thugut's demands had been virtually conceded, the Emperor did not sign his new treaty of alliance with King George III. till the sword had again decided the fate of Europe. For some months Austria and Great Britain acted in concert, so far as the latter acted at all, without any binding agreement; Austria receiving no financial aid, and being at liberty to negotiate separately with France. This hesitation astonished, as well as embarrassed, the British Cabinet. But all classes in Austria, as we learn from the despatches of British Ministers at Vienna, opposed a continuation of war for the expulsion of the French from the Netherlands, or a restoration of the French monarchy. And Thugut probably thought that, by one or two Austrian victories at the beginning of the next campaign, he might obtain all he wanted, without committing himself to a pursuit of objects more particularly affecting the interests of Great Britain.

In the meantime Mr. Wickham was making treaties for the hire of German troops with the Electors of Bavaria, the Duke of Wurtemberg, the Circle of Swabia, and finally, the Elector of Mainz. His most difficult task was first accomplished. Bavaria had been saved from annexation to Austria by Frederick the Great of Prussia. Since then the Electors had regarded the Kings of Prussia as political allies and the Emperors as political enemies. Bonaparte spared no effort to keep Bavaria out of the coalition. And King Frederick William III. of Prussia, supported by the almost unanimous voice of public opinion in the Electorate itself, brought all his influence to bear on the same side. On the other hand, the Elector was swayed towards an Anglo-Austrian alliance by Count de Montg  las, a Minister hateful to his states and people as an innovator of the same type as the Emperor Joseph II. As Montg  las's principles naturally inclined him to favour France, Wickham could only account for his political action by a desire to relieve the pecuniary needs of his sovereign, and make him independent of the Bavarian states. It would seem, however, from a remark in one of the English Minister's later letters, that the secret service fund at his command enabled him to use arguments convincing to Montg  las. Distracted by these rival influences the Elector appealed to the Tzar for advice, who, still eager to restore the French monarchy, turned the scale by counselling him to join the coalition, and promising him protection. But though successful in Germany, Wickham found his plans for raising troubles in the interior of France collapse before the growing power and popularity of the Consular government. The pacification of western France, the recall of Souvorow, Bonaparte's energy and comprehensive toleration, cowed or conciliated disaffection in the east and south. Pich  gru found no support in Franche Comt  , nor Pr  cy at Lyons; and Willot went on his mission tardily, and with little prospect of success. Frenchmen of all shades of opinion had rallied to the call of Bonaparte. Political exiles of every class—Carnot and Barth  lemy, former members of the Directory; Malonet and Mounier, devoted servants of Louis XVI., friends and councillors of Lord Grenville when living in England during the Reign of Terror—returned to France as supporters of the new system, and were welcomed back to public employment. Count de Prov  nce sent letters to the First Consul through Abb   Montesquieu and the Third Consul Le Brun; regicides and nobles of historic pedigree jostled each other in the salon of his wife. Wickham still inferred public penury from the unprovided state of the French armies. But, as he discovered too late, Bonaparte had already closed the gulf of national insolvency. One of the first measures the Consul obtained from the new Legislative Assembly was an Act transferring local administration, including the assessment of taxes, from councils chosen by popular election to Prefects and Sub-Prefects appointed by himself. From the searching and exact methods of these functionaries, not only a large increase of annual revenue, but a gradual gathering in of accumulated arrears, might safely be expected. The leading bankers of Paris, associated by Bonaparte to form the Bank of France, began to discount Government bills, and the more pressing needs of the State were thus supplied. Another circumstance adverse to the coalition was the retirement of Archduke Charles in March from his command on the Rhine. This step, attributed officially to ill-health, but resulting mainly from impatience of Thugut's yoke, caused great dissatisfaction not only in the Austrian army, but also in the German states to which Wickham was accredited. Still this minister's letters to Grenville during March and April showed no abatement of confidence. Improvement in the financial condition of France operated gradually; and Bonaparte skilfully concealed his resources as well as his plans. He had transferred Masséna to Italy, and placed Moreau in chief command of the French army of the Rhine, which he raised by reinforcements to 100,000 men. But, as Wickham reported, it was ill-paid, ill-fed, ill-equipped, and discontented. It had no cavalry, the horses having died of famine; and the French Government being unable to purchase others, Moreau could engage in no offensive operations. Moreover, according to the reports, the Consul had exhausted all his resources to strengthen the army of the Rhine, leaving the army of Italy without reinforcement or supplies, in a miserable condition of weakness and want. The army of reserve at Dijon, composed of a few hundred of raw conscripts and invalids, was the jest of Europe. On the other hand, Wickham depicted the Austrian army of the Rhine, which he strengthened daily by German auxiliaries in British pay, as being in the highest state of spirit and efficiency. Marshal Kray, its new commander, the victor of Magnano, and a general of acknowledged merit, enjoyed Thugut's entire confidence. He had the additional advantage of being advised by three famous strategists—Schmidt, Weyrother, and the Marquis de Chasteler—who had been chiefs of the staff to the Archduke and Souvorow. For Weyrother's abilities, Bonaparte, as well as Souvorow, had expressed the highest admiration. "Between Schmidt, Weyrother and Chasteler," Wickham wrote on March 27, "there is at this moment a reunion of talents at the Austrian head-quarters such as never has been assembled before. If all this was destined to be beaten, 'he could only say that Providence has some great object in view beyond the reach of our faculties of which the Consul is to be the leading instrument.' " The accounts from Paris transmitted by him were equally encouraging. Bonaparte, being hemmed in by difficulties of every kind, had formed no plans. The Jacobins, enraged at his monopoly of authority and his partiality for Royalists, conspired against him under Bernadotte and other generals of note. Talleyrand secretly betrayed him. In this state of insecurity he could not venture to quit Paris, and had sent Berthier to represent him at the camp of Dijon. And, while Wickham thus buoyed up the hopes of the English Cabinet, Lord Grenville's frequent announcements to him of formidable British expeditions about to set sail for the French coasts, satisfied the Austrian leaders that no troops could be drawn from the interior of France to reinforce the armies of Moreau and Masséna.

The Austrians were the first to take the field. Early in April General Melas cut in two the long thin line of Masséna's army by a victory at Voltri; forced the French commander, with the greater part of his troops, to fall back into Genoa; and leaving General

Ott with 30,000 men to besiege that city, drove General Suchet, with the smaller section of the beaten army, across the River Var into France. By the general plan of campaign drawn up at Vienna, and communicated by Wickham in cipher to Lord Grenville, Marshal Kray was to remain stationary on the Upper Rhine till the surrender of Genoa should enable Melas to despatch 25,000 men across the Alps to assail Moreau in the rear. Then Kray, choosing according to his discretion one of the plans submitted to him by his three chiefs of the staff, was to cross the river and attack Moreau; while Melas forced the passage of the Var, and supported by Willot's levies and 25,000 British troops brought from Minorea by Sir Charles Stuart, pushed on into the interior of France. Genoa, closely blockaded on land by General Ott and at sea by Lord Keith, was known to be so short of provisions that its capture could be a question only of weeks, or perhaps even of days. But Masséna, by an extraordinary example of resolution and endurance, gained time for Bonaparte to execute a daring plan of counter attack, of which it does not appear that the famous Austrian strategists had formed a conception. Towards the end of April, while Kray, expecting every moment official news of the fall of Genoa, held his army in readiness to move, Moreau, deceiving him by skilful manœuvres, crossed the Rhine at Schaffhausen, turned the left wing of the Austrians, and captured their magazines at Stockach. Pursuing his success, he defeated Kray in well-contested battles at Engen and Möeskirch, and drove him across the Danube to Ulm. Only a great superiority in cavalry and artillery saved the Austrians from a decisive defeat. Their loss in killed and wounded did not much exceed that of the French, but their sudden discomfiture so completely demoralized them that Kray, being badly beaten in an effort to resume the offensive at Biberach, found himself reduced to absolute inaction. Moreau, having secretly despatched 15,000 men to cross the St. Gothard into Italy, and interposed between Kray's army and Switzerland, sat down quietly at Augsburg, to watch his antagonist. In the meantime columns of troops of all arms, fully equipped, marched across France to the head of the Lake of Geneva. When advices reached Paris that Moreau had passed the Rhine, Bonaparte started for Dijon, passed on to Villeneuve, and led 40,000 men across the Great St. Bernard, while 10,000 more crossed the Little St. Bernard. Melas was at Nice when a report reached him that Berthier, with the army of reserve from Dijon, had descended into Piedmont. The news troubled him little, recent intelligence from Vienna having assured him that it could only be a feeble attempt at a diversion. But he returned to Turin, leaving General Ulnitz to carry the tête du pont of St. Lorenzo which guarded the passage of the Var. An Austrian officer sent to Chivasso, having recognised Bonaparte, his report opened Melas's eyes to the gravity of the situation, and the Austrian army was ordered to concentrate without delay at Alexandria. General Ott, unwilling to lose a prize that seemed already within his grasp, delayed a day to offer Masséna the most favourable terms of capitulation; and the French general, long isolated from all intelligence, and not having one day's rations for his troops, marched out of Genoa with the honours of war. Ulnitz failed in repeated assaults on the bridge of St. Lorenzo, and hurried away to the Austrian rendezvous, hotly pursued by Suchet, who formed a junction with Masséna in Melas's rear. In the meantime Bonaparte had turned aside to Milan to meet the French troops sent by Moreau, and take possession of the Austrian magazines in Lombardy. Having accomplished these purposes, he marched against Melas, and won a decisive victory at Marengo on June 14. Two days afterwards the beaten commander signed the convention of Alexandria, which allowed him to withdraw his army behind the Mincio, on condition of giving up Genoa and all the fortresses of Piedmont and Lombardy to the conqueror. Moreau's prolonged inaction was at first attributed, in accounts sent to England, to weakness resulting from losses in battle. But no sooner had advices reached him of Bonaparte's passage of the Alps than he crossed the Danube, dislodged Kray's army from its strong position at Ulm, and drove it before him like a flock of sheep till it found refuge behind the Inn. Being now master of Munich and nearly all Bavaria, which paid heavily in contributions for the policy of Montgélés, he referred an application from Marshal Kray for an armistice to Paris. And Bonaparte, having entered into negotiations for peace with the Emperor, agreed to a general cessation of hostilities till September.

Wickham's first reports to Grenville of the Austrian reverses on the Rhine, while frankly acknowledging, made light of them. Bonaparte, he wrote on May 8, had relinquished Italy in order to conquer it in Germany. His plans had been most skilfully conceived and admirably executed. He had paid up Moreau's army, and inspired it with such enthusiasm that, as all Austrian officers agreed, it surpassed in fighting power any French army hitherto sent into the field. Nevertheless, he had lost the game. Kray, whose situation was for a time critical, had now gathered all his scattered corps into a safe position, and was superior to the enemy in strength. And the surrender of Genoa, by leaving Melas at liberty to carry out the Vienna programme, must change the fortunes of the campaign. But Kray's disgraceful defeat at Biberach seems to have opened Wickham's eyes. Writing again a few days afterwards he described the Austrian camp as a scene of discouragement and confusion. The three chiefs of the staff were at loggerheads. Weyrother, whose plan Kray had adopted, was disabled by a fall. Schmidt, since the rejection of his plan, would give no further advice. The army hated Chasteler, and had lost all confidence in Kray. Only rest and the return of the Archduke could restore it to efficiency. Moreau's passive attitude puzzled him. And it was not till the end of May that intelligence from France enabled him to read the riddle, and inform Lord Grenville that the campaign would be decided by Bonaparte himself in Italy. His want of earlier information, as he explained afterwards, was a consequence of Thugut's quarrel with the Archduke. Fasbinder, head of the Austrian Intelligence Department, resigned with the Commander-in-Chief; and the branch of the service which he directed fell into complete disorder. At the end of April André sent Fasbinder word that Bonaparte was about to lead 50,000 men over the Alps; and on May 1 sent to Wickham himself full details of the expedition. But the courier bringing them was detained for eighteen days at the Austrian out-posts, and they reached the English minister too late to be of service. His reports during the following months of the state of the Austrian army gave no hope of improvement without a change in the command. We hear no more from him of its famous Chiefs of the Staff, but his confidence in Archduke Charles seemed to increase with disaster. The ultimate success of the campaign, he wrote on July 15, depends on the question—"Shall we have the Archduke or no? If we have him we shall drive the enemy headlong over the Rhine in a week." And, again, on July 25, "with a commander-in-chief enjoying its confidence, it (the Austrian army) would beat the French army to pieces, even with Bonaparte at its head, and the ghost of Desaix to boot, to direct and encourage it in battle." In the meantime he concluded a new treaty with the Elector of Bavaria for additional troops, those already hired having fought with conspicuous valour. This negotiation, involving a joint guarantee of the Electorate by Great Britain and Austria, took him again to Vienna. He found the whole population—court, nobles, citizens—as he had already found the Bavarians, crying aloud for peace. Thugut alone stood firm against the clamour, governed, Wickham thought, not so much by policy as by passion. His hatred of Souvorow had caused the fatal quarrel with Russia; his hatred of the Archduke led him to reject the sole means of resisting France. Wickham found also at Vienna, as well as in Kray's army, much dissatisfaction with Great Britain. The troops led by Bonaparte into Italy had been drawn chiefly from the west and south of France, to which the British Government had undertaken to send expeditions, so as to keep the whole sea-board in perpetual alarm of invasion. But, it was complained, they had failed to redeem their pledges. This was a reproach which Mr. Wickham must have found it difficult to answer. The military plans and operations of the English Cabinet during the year 1800, as presented to us in confidential letters of Pitt and Dundas, are a strange exhibition of miscalculation, wavering purpose, and ineffectual action. The "immense effort" announced by Lord Grenville to Wickham towards the end of 1799, which was to produce 70,000 troops for expeditions against France in the following spring, does not appear to have given Government the command of 30,000 troops for any enterprise during the whole of the year 1800. At the beginning of this year Pitt, as we have seen, was eagerly bent on sending a considerable force with Count D'Artois to Brittany. When this plan, which included the capture of Brest, hung fire, the Cabinet determined to send all available troops under Sir Charles Stuart to co-operate with the Austrians and insurgent royalists in Provence; and Dundas despatched that general on a preliminary mission to concert operations with Mr. Wickham and General Melas. But Stuart's sudden resignation from dissatisfaction at instructions given to him to restore Malta, when taken, to the Knights of St. John, caused this scheme to be postponed till it was no longer practicable. The English Ministry then turned its attention again to Brittany, and particularly to the capture of Belleisle. Pitt and Grenville seem to have believed for a short time that an attack on that island had actually begun. But at the last moment the officers employed differed in opinion in regard to the chances of success. And as Dundas would run no risks, the attempt was abandoned. Pitt's mind seems to have veered from week to week, backwards and forwards between Brittany and the Mediterranean, under conflicting arguments of Grenville and Dundas, without ever settling on any definite conclusion. While English ministers discussed and consulted, Bonaparte withdrew every man fit for active service from the menaced coasts to win the battle of Marengo, which, by completely establishing his authority in France, gave them more effectual security against invasion. Sir Ralph Abercromby, who succeeded Sir Charles Stuart as commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, in obedience to instructions from Mr. Dundas, employed the forces under his orders, originally destined for descents on France, in less hazardous expeditions to the coasts of Spain.

Probably at no other period of its history did the military reputation of England, in all respects except bravery in the field, fall so low as during Pitt's first ministry. It was not only the Emperor Paul who refused to allow his troops to serve under an English general; neither Baron Thugut nor General Melas could be induced to detach a body of Austrian cavalry to act in France under Sir Charles Stuart. Nor was this unflattering judgment merely the verdict of foreign opinion. The incapacity of British officers specially selected for important duties on the Continent is a subject of constant reproach and misgiving in the confidential letters of Lord Grenville and Mr. Wickham. On March 27, 1800,* Wickham wrote in reference to British officers sent to organise and pay a Swiss army corps—"I have sworn never to have anything to do with your military men again unless they will learn their own business better before they come abroad, or have a more moderate opinion of their own knowledge, and suffer themselves to be instructed. Besides, it is not to be conceived (bravery and presence of mind in the field excepted) how very cheap we are holden on the Continent." Again, on May 8—"Our officers, particularly those that call themselves staff-officers, are totally unfit for anything of the kind; and it is only since I have meddled with military arrangements myself, in consequence of their evident incapacity, that I have been able to judge of the extent to which that incapacity is carried." Lord Grenville replied on May 20—"I have long seen reason to judge as you do of the capacity of our officers. Something may be allowed for want of opportunity to learn; but if when that is thrown into their way they will not learn, they are incurable." Lord Elgin, British Minister at Constantinople, wrote on December 29, 1799, in reference to officers sent from the Horse Guards to train the Sultan's troops in a knowledge of military science: "Seeing Englishmen in authority in Turkey takes away all delight in reading Don Quixote."†

From the middle of July to the end of November, 1800, hostilities between France and Austria were interrupted by negotiations. Immediately after his victory at Marengo on June 14, Bonaparte sent Count St. Julien, one of his prisoners, with a second letter to the Emperor proposing peace. Unfortunately for Austria the envoy arrived at Vienna too late, the treaty with England, so long under discussion, having been signed by Francis II. on June 20, a few hours before receiving news from Italy of the defeat of General Melas. The Emperor, in order to gain time, despatched St. Julien to Paris, whither the First Consul had returned, with a pacific answer. It gave the messenger no authority to treat; but Talleyrand persuaded him to sign preliminaries of peace; and Bonaparte sent him back with them to Vienna, accompanied by his aide-de-camp Duroc, who had orders to require acceptance or refusal of them within five days. St. Julien had to expiate his indiscretion in a Bohemian fortress. But Thugut wrote to Talleyrand announcing the mutual engagements of the Austrian and British Governments, and the willingness of the latter, as expressed to him by Lord Minto, to join in negotiation for a general peace. Conferring subsequently with Lord Minto on the conditions that might be obtained from Bonaparte, Thugut suggested that the secret articles of the Anglo-Austrian treaty should be abandoned as no longer attainable. But Lord Grenville declared in reply that the British Government would not be a party to any political arrangement which allowed France to retain Belgium. A congress with its protracted discussions must obviously, in the present state of the Continental campaign, be far more advantageous to Austria than to France. At the same time the French garrisons in Malta and Egypt, closely blockaded by British fleets, stood in pressing need of reinforcements and supplies. Talleyrand, therefore, demanded of the British Government, through M. Otto, a French agent in London, a naval armistice, with full liberty of communication by sea, as compensation to France for the benefits that would accrue to Austria from a prolongation of the military armistice. On this condition the French Government was willing to consent to a meeting of representatives of the belligerent powers at Luneville to discuss the terms of a general peace. The British Government desired negotiation as a means of gaining time, Wickham's reports having convinced it that the Austrian armies in their present demoralized condition could not continue the war on the Continent with any prospect of success. On the other hand, it knew that the fortress of Valetta must soon surrender for want of food. It had derived a very erroneous impression of the weakness and unprovided state of the French army in Egypt from intercepted letters of General Kleber and other discontented officers, written after Bonaparte's departure, with little attention to veracity, in order to justify to the Directory an unauthorised treaty with the Grand Vizier, which would enable them to return to France. And it wished to be at liberty to capture Spanish treasure-ships coming to Europe from America at the close of the year. With the view, therefore, of deferring the renewal of hostilities in Germany and Italy on any decisive scale till the following year, without materially compromising the particular interests of Great Britain, it offered to agree to a naval armistice of less than three months' duration, which would allow Valetta and Alexandria to be provisioned for ten days at a time. {Lord Grenville's sanguine temper and disposition to undervalue an antagonist were curiously exemplified in the belief he entertained that Bonaparte would eagerly grasp at this concession. A report reaching him from Paris through a foreign channel that the French people called loudly for peace with England, he wrote to Pitt that this intelligence "may certainly enable us both to raise our demands as to terms, and to insist strictly on the conditions of our project of armistice."* He also wrote to Lord Minto that if England and Austria only stood firm, they might impose their own conditions on France. And he applied for passports for Mr. Thomas Grenville, whom he appointed to represent Great Britain at Luneville, where Joseph Bonaparte had already arrived as the representative of France. But the First Consul, on receiving Lord Grenville's answer, at once ordered ten days' notice to be given to the Austrian armies in Italy and Germany of the termination of the armistice. He then, as an ultimatum to the British Government, required liberty for six French frigates to go to Alexandria, and return, without scrutiny or hindrance. And on this demand being rejected, he refused passports for Mr. Grenville, and gave Austria the option of separate negotiation or war.

Wickham had reported on July 25, that to send the Austrian army on the Inn again into the field without a change of commanders would be "risking its utter destruction." Later on he wrote that Baron Thugut had made no attempt during the armistice to restore its spirit and discipline either by removing Marshal Kray or ridding it of incapable and jealous generals who caballed against him. When Moreau gave notice early in September of a renewal of hostilities, the Emperor repaired to the camp on the Inn to put an end to disorders by assuming the command. Count Lehrbach accompanied him as Minister in attendance, and General Lauer as Chief of his Staff. He found his army in no condition or disposition to fight. By Lehrbach's advice, but without consulting Wickham, he purchased a prolongation of the armistice for forty-five days, at the price for which alone Bonaparte would grant it—namely, the surrender of the blockaded fortresses of Ulm, Ingolstadt, and Philipsburg to Moreau. Wickham would have preferred, as he wrote, "to go back fighting to Vienna," and left the Austrian camp "to avoid committing himself."† Lord Grenville, in a letter to Count Staremberg, condemned this convention of Hohenlinden as "most shameful." Lord Minto wrote that Thugut had shed tears of rage and mortification at the dishonour of his country, and resigned his appointments of Chancellor and Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Emperor then placed Lehrbach at the head of the Foreign Office, with injunctions to be guided by the advice of Thugut, who still held office as Minister for Italy. But the old statesman could not brook this arrangement. If not at his instigation, certainly with his privacy and concurrence, Lord Minto demanded audience of the Emperor, and remonstrated in strenuous language against Lehrbach's appointment as an insult to Great Britain. Francis II., with a spirit which evidently astonished the British Minister, repelled the pretension of a foreign power to dictate to him his selection of public servants. And Thugut, seeing that he had allowed his passions to carry him too far, persuaded Minto to withdraw the obnoxious protest, and formulate the objection to Lehrbach in less offensive terms. The Emperor then placed Count Cobentzl in charge of the Foreign Office; and being incensed against Thugut for what Lehrbach and the public voice of Vienna denounced as disloyal intrigue, he heaped reproaches on his old favourite, and never fully trusted him again. Having thus cast off the influence by which he had been so long governed, he appealed to Archduke Charles to resume command of the army of Germany ; appointed General Bellegarde to succeed Melas in Italy ; sent Count Cobentzl to Moreau's headquarters to ask for a further prolongation of the armistice ; and applied to the British Government for the second instalment of the £2,400,000 it had agreed to advance. The first £800,000 had been paid in August after the ratification of the Anglo-Austrian treaty at Vienna ; and Lord Minto now wrote that the Emperor was in dire need of the second, to supply the wants of his troops. Archduke Charles being disabled by illness from active exertion, a younger brother, Archduke John, took command of the Austrian army on the Inn, and began weeding out old officers, and making other reforms, which had been too long deferred. Cobentzl, having made his application at the French headquarters, proceeded to Luneville to confer with Joseph Bonaparte ; and thence, of his own accord, to Paris, at the invitation of the First Consul. Pitt and Grenville, inferring from this journey an intention to treat separately for peace with Bonaparte, refused payment of the second instalment of the Austrian loan. But Cobentzl, during a short stay at Paris, firmly refused to discuss any question but the armistice with Talleyrand, except in concert with Mr. Grenville. Returning to Luneville from a bootless mission he tried to persuade the British government to remove the obstacle to a conference by conceding Bonaparte's demand of free communication with Egypt. Lord Grenville refused, declaring that he had yielded too much already. Being now, however, somewhat reassured on the subject of Austrian good faith, he informed Lord Minto that £800,000 would be remitted to Vienna when news reached England of the actual renewal of hostilities in Germany. It was in these circumstances that the French and Austrian armies again took the field in the last days of November.

During the armistice between France and Austria the British government had directed its military operations against Spain. Spain was a member of the first coalition, and followed the lead of Prussia in making peace with the French Republic in 1795. After a short period of neutrality, irritation, caused by attacks on Spanish trade by British cruisers, led the government of King Charles IV. into uncongenial and unnatural alliance with the mortal foes of the House of Bourbon. When, however, the French Directory tottered to its fall in the summer of 1799, the Spanish government, which, owing to the imbecility of the king, meant his queen, an Italian princess, and her favourite, Godoy, Duke of Aleudia, showed a strong disposition to make peace with Great Britain. Bonaparte, partly by presents to Godoy, partly by working on the queen's ambition for the aggrandisement of the House of Parma, whose heir had married her daughter, changed incipient defection into feeble support. For the great monarchy of Charles I. and Philip II., supreme on land and sea during the greater part of the 16th century, had fallen into impotence, even for defence, under Charles IV. In the autumn of 1798, Sir Charles Stuart, in command of a small British force, finding Minorca practically undefended, had taken possession of the island without firing a shot. A secret report from the minister of Sweden at Madrid, written in August, 1800, and communicated by Mr. Arbuthnot, British consul at Lisbon, to Lord Grenville, gives an astonishing picture of the weakness and impecuniosity of a power which still held sway over the richest countries of the new world.* Still the geographical position of Spain, its magnificent harbours and arsenals, its natural resources and high national qualities which two centuries of misgovernment had done little to impair, made its alliance of considerable importance to England or France. Portugal, since the Methuen treaty of 1703, had been closely united to Great Britain. Although also fallen on evil days, the Prince Regent, a son-in-law of the Spanish King, being unable, according to a confidential report from the British minister, Mr. Frere, to protect life and property even in the capital, it contributed troops and ships for the siege of Malta; and the Tagus at Lisbon afforded a safe and most convenient station for British fleets. In order to deprive Great Britain of this advantage, the Spanish government, by a compact with Bonaparte, undertook to compel Portugal to renounce its ancient alliance. Failing in persuasion, it resorted to threats, but could not equip an army to enforce them. The British government sent a small body of troops to aid its ally, and planned expeditions against Spanish arsenals, and galleons from America, to give the enemy employment at home, and gather in the rich harvest of plunder that lay at the mercy of an enterprising antagonist. In July Sir James Pulteney sailed from Minorca with 15,000 troops to capture Ferrol. The place seems to have been defended at first chiefly by the bravado of the Spanish commander. But this sufficed to hold Pulteney in check, till hasty musters reinforced the garrison; and then he re-embarked his army without venturing on an assault. A small share of the heroic audacity so conspicuous in the operations of the naval service would, no doubt, have made him master of the place.

In October Lord Keith carried Sir Ralph Abercrombie with over 25,000 troops to besiege Cadiz. This enterprise also failed. On closer view it seemed too hazardous to the British general, and he returned to Minorca without loss, but without any increase of honour. Another expedition, under the same commander, sailing for Leghorn, to aid the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Austrians, was forestalled by the unscrupulous energy of the French. General Dupont marching into the country before the armistice terminated, dispersed the Tuscan levies, occupied the capital, and seized an immense depot of British merchandise at Leghorn. Early in September, however, Malta surrendered to General Pigot.

So many miscarriages, and particularly in attempts which had seemed to offer all the conditions of easy conquest, caused great dissatisfaction in England. Dearth of food and of employment produced much misery and turbulence in many parts of the kingdom during the year 1800; and George III. seems to have been averse to despatching troops that could ill be spared at home on such uncertain ventures. It is evident from some of Dundas's letters that his relations, as war minister, with his sovereign, and with the Duke of York, involved a good deal of friction in the course of the summer. We learn also from the Diaries of Mr. Windham and Lord Malmesbury that a little later in this year, the king meditated a change of ministry, which would have installed those statesmen in the offices of Mr. Pitt and Lord Grenville. Dundas, however, with little support from the rest of the Cabinet, organised the bold and fortunate expedition to Egypt, in which Abercromby amply redeemed any discredit that might have attached to him from previous ill-success, and closed a meritorious career by a splendid victory. Two letters, written in March, 1801, and included in this volume, from General John Moore, afterwards victor at Corunna, to his father, the author of "Zuleika," give us interesting accounts of the landing of the British army at Aboukir; and the subsequent action, in which Abercromby received a mortal wound.

While the coalition against France crumbled to pieces under the blows of Bonaparte in the south of Europe, a coalition to resist alleged abuses of the maritime supremacy of Great Britain took form in the North. Lord Whitworth's explanation of the rupture of friendly relations between England and Russia was, that the Tzar had gone mad. Paul, he averred, had been spoiled by flattery; in order to bring him to his senses he should be treated with indifference. No doubt Paul had been flattered and humoured to the top of his bent by envoys from many states of Europe imploring aid against the French Revolution. Among these, Whitworth himself had been conspicuous for the assiduity and success with which he paid court to the Russian sovereign. But a review of all the circumstances of this estrangement leaves the impression that a saner autocrat than Paul might well have felt aggrieved by the conduct of his partners in the coalition. The flagrant ingratitude of Austria when, owing in great measure to his support, it had risen from depression and peril to such a height of advantage as, in Baron Thugut's opinion, gave the Emperor control of the political situation, had been acknowledged by Lord Grenville as a just ground of quarrel. Yet the British Government, which had pledged itself repeatedly to act only in concert with the Tzar, in all whose plans he had cordially joined, not only refused to combine with him in saving from Austrian rapacity sovereigns whom he had taken under his protection as sufferers for the common cause, but concluded, without consulting him, a treaty which gave that rapacity free rein, and large help in men and money. No doubt Pitt's ministry shaped its altered course by the light of fuller knowledge of the political and military conditions with which it had to deal. And the credit it might fairly claim of acting from a sense of duty was not affected by the circumstance that its new views of British opportunities and interests, in exaggerating the military strength of Austria, and almost ignoring Bonaparte, proved quite as deceptive, and more disastrous than the old. But the change of policy might have been accompanied with more of consideration for a discarded ally, and more of forbearance for resentment which must have been foreseen. In fact Paul, however intemperate in his manner of treating individuals who incurred his displeasure, seems to have exercised, as a politician, considerable self-restraint. By reinforcing Souvorow's army when it halted on the Austrian frontier, and listening to the overtures Bonaparte made to him through the King of Prussia, he might have completely paralysed Austria, or compelled the Court of Vienna to give the satisfaction he demanded. And, although he withdrew from the coalition, he continued to help the interests he had joined it to promote. Lord Grenville himself seems to have felt at a later date, as Mr. Pitt certainly felt, that if, in compliance with Paul's wish, an able and tactful diplomatist had been sent to replace Lord Whitworth, and aid the efforts of the Russian Vice-Chancellor, Count Panin, and of Count Woronzow in London, to maintain an English alliance, a violent breach of it might have been averted. But it was one of those emergencies in which Lord Grenville's distinguishing qualities as Foreign Minister asserted themselves. His public spirit was so high that it shrank from even the appearance of condoning an affront, especially from a power of the first rank. And he resented Paul's refusal of pass-ports for Lord Whitworth's messengers as an insult to George III. Moreover, from over-rating the value of a Russian alliance to Great Britain, he had passed to the opposite extreme of undue depreciation. It would even seem as if his tardy discovery of the defects of the Russian military organisation unconsciously brought with it a sense of injury, as if he had been duped. Instead, therefore, of listening to Count Woronzow's appeal to him to overlook the Tzar's breaches of international usage, as freaks of disordered impulse, he followed his own inclination and the counsels of Lord Whitworth, passing abruptly from flattering attentions to "indifference" and "affected neglect." Bonaparte adopted a different line. He considered the friendship of Russia an object of the highest importance for France; and, undiscouraged by the repulses his first advances had met, pursued it with remarkable skill. Having little prospect of being able to relieve Valetta, he offered to hand over the fortress to Paul as Grand Master of the Order of Knights Hospitallers. At the same time he took another step equally adapted to serve his purpose. 6,000 Russian prisoners captured in Holland and Switzerland still remained in France, the British Government having refused to take them in exchange for French prisoners in England. Bonaparte collected these soldiers, had them newly clothed and armed, and presented them to the Tzar as a tribute of respect to the Russian army. These marks of attention, directed to points on which he was particularly sensitive, from one whose exploits excited extraordinary admiration throughout Europe, could not fail to gratify Paul. He accepted both offers; authorised Baron Krudener, his minister at Berlin, to treat for peace with General Beurnonville, the Minister of France; and despatched General Springporten to take command of the Russian troops in France as a garrison for Malta. But though no longer hostile to the Consular government, he entered into no alliance with it, even when old relations with Denmark and Sweden brought Russia into conflict with Great Britain.

The Scandinavian kingdoms had been parties to the Armed Neutrality of the North in 1780, and to the Declaration of Maritime Rights issued in its name by the Empress Catherine II. of Russia. One of the propositions enunciated in this manifesto was that trading ships of a neutral power, under convoy of a ship of war flying the national flag, were exempted from search by a declaration of the naval officer in charge that the cargoes belonged to the country he represented, and contained nothing "contraband of war." Pitt's government, on the other hand, asserted its right, as a belligerent, to search neutral vessels under all circumstances, for an enemy's goods or "contraband of war"; and British cruisers took forcible possession of Danish and Swedish frigates resisting search, as well as of the merchantmen they convoyed. All parties concerned in these collisions claimed redress for breaches of maritime law. And the violent interruption of their trade, to the great benefit of British trade, stirred public feeling in the countries thus aggrieved to the highest pitch of animosity against Great Britain. In August Lord Grenville sent Lord Whitworth, escorted by a naval squadron under Admiral Dickson, to demand satisfaction at Copenhagen for resistance offered by a Danish frigate in the Downs. Count Bernsdorff retorted that it was not from the victims of unjust violence that reparation was due; and, as Lord Spencer, at the Admiralty, thought the time inopportune for proceeding to extremities, a compromise was patched up, which delayed an open rupture, but settled nothing. The Tzar published a manifesto in defence of his allies, and laid an embargo on British merchandise until Admiral Dickson's fleet left the Baltic. Pitt had an uneasy sense of a storm brewing in the north. The Austrian alliance, on which he elected to lean, had already proved a broken reed; and the whole aspect of Continental affairs was discouraging. He suggested to Grenville, towards the close of summer, to send Mr. Garlike, Secretary of Legation at Berlin, to St. Petersburg, unofficially, but with dormant credentials, to confer with Count Panin. A proposal of the same kind came to Grenville from his brother-in-law, Lord Carysfort, now British Minister at the Prussian Court. Carysfort reported that Russia and Prussia were agreed to set bounds to immoderate views of acquisition whether of France or Austria. From communications made to him by Baron Krudener, he inferred a disposition at St. Petersburg to co-operate with England in re-establishing peace on equitable terms. Lord Grenville, however, gave the project of an unofficial mission only cold encouragement. No one knew better that reconciliation with Paul involved the condition of restoring Malta to the Knights Hospitallers, in regard to which he and his colleagues had changed their minds. The cessation of diplomatic intercourse with Russia he thought fortunate, inasmuch as it deprived the Tzar of an opportunity of putting embarrassing questions on that subject; and he cautioned his brother-in-law against discussing it with Baron Krudener.

Malta, now a rock of offence to several great powers, was given by the Emperor Charles V., in 1630, to the Knights Hospitallers, after their expulsion from Rhodes by Solyman the Magnificent, to hold as a fief of the kingdom of Naples. From that time it had been the headquarters of the Order until surrendered to Bonaparte in June, 1798. A treaty signed at St. Petersburg, in December, 1798, bound the British Government to hand over the island to the Tzar as protector of the Knights, when it should be recovered from the French.

Letters of Grenville and Dundas, written in April, 1800, show that the British Cabinet still adhered to this engagement, and that Sir Charles Stuart threw up his command in the Mediterranean because his instructions ordered him to give effect to it. So late as June, 1800, Sir A. Paget, British Minister at the Court of the Two Sicilies, gave explicit assurances to his Russian colleague, Chevalier Italinski, that the treaty would be scrupulously observed. Meantime, however, glowing accounts of the natural resources and vast advantages of the island began to pour in on Lord Grenville from various quarters. Mr. Wickham was particularly urgent with him not to part with it; and aspired, at the close of his diplomatic mission, to the governorship of it, as an appointment little inferior in importance to any other under the British crown. There is also some indication in Lord Grenville's correspondence with Lord Minto that the Ministry, seeing the hopes it had founded on an Austrian alliance evaporate, resolved to retain the conquests of Great Britain at sea, as a counterpoise to those of France on the Continent. And, in regard to the treaty with Russia, Lord Grenville seems to have considered the British Government absolved from it, by the Tzar's conduct in accepting the island from Bonaparte, and espousing the cause of his Scandinavian allies. At all events, Dundas's instructions to Sir Ralph Abercromby, who succeeded Sir Charles Stuart as commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, directed him to take possession of Malta for the British crown. Sir A. Paget reported in September that General Acton, the Neapolitan prime minister, had questioned him on this point, and intimated confidentially that if the British Government no longer intended to restore La Valetta to the Order of St. John, his sovereign would recall the Neapolitan troops engaged in the siege. By this time, however, La Valetta had surrendered to General Pigot, and King George's ensign was floating on the old stronghold of the Knights. The report of this circumstance seems to have so affected the Tzar as to throw him into paroxysms of rage which endangered his life. He confiscated all British property in Russia till the treaty of December, 1798, should be carried out; and issued a proclamation to explain and justify the proceeding. Being still more exasperated by Lord Grenville's answer, stronger perhaps in invective than in argument, he dismissed Count Panin from the office of Vice-Chancellor; sent M. de Kalitchew, Panin's successor, on a mission to Paris, and revived the Armed Neutrality of the North. The King of Prussia, in retaliation for the seizure and confiscation of a Prussian merchantman, sent troops to occupy Cuxhaven, the port of communication between England and the Continent, into which the prize had been carried, and joined the Northern League. The British Government on its side treated the revival of the confederacy as a declaration of war, and despatched Sir Hyde Parker with a naval armament to assail it at Copenhagen, where it was most vulnerable. But the main events of the conflict—the bombardment of the Danish capital by Lord Nelson, the annexation of Hanover by the King of Prussia, the murder of the Emperor Paul, which dissolved the Northern Confederacy—occurred after Lord Grenville's retirement from office, and do not fall within the compass of this volume.

Lord Carysfort's confidential letters from Berlin contained in this volume are valuable as bringing to our knowledge an important element of public opinion on the Continent at this time, in regard to which Lord Grenville's other official correspondents appear to have joined in what may be termed a conspiracy of silence. He was an amateur diplomatist who had accepted a mission to the Prussian Court at Lord Grenville's request. And his independent position and intimate relations with the Foreign Secretary enabled him to speak his mind with candour, and tell unpalatable truths without fear of consequences. His letters leave little doubt that the show of moderation and the pacific efforts which the circumstances of France, and his own, dictated to Bonaparte, contrasting forcibly with the implacable attitude and the oppressive maritime policy of the British Government, had not only arrested the hostile tide of Continental feeling against France, but turned it full against England as the common enemy of Europe. Instead of the honour justly due to the champion of outraged right, ordered liberty, and all the highest interests of civilization which Lord Grenville claimed for her, England under his auspices had become odious—not in one country alone, nor merely to popular prejudice, but, as Carysfort declared, universally, and to educated conviction in its most conservative manifestations, whether political, social, or literary, as a sordid monopolist—keeping war alive for her special objects and particular profit, without regarding the evils her selfish egotism entailed on the rest of the world. It may be mentioned in this connection that, when negotiating early in the year with the Emperor, the British Government demanded Austrian support for its maritime system, as the condition of English support of an Austrian annexation of Genoa and other territory bordering the Mediterranean, Thugut, as Lord Minto reported, preferred relinquishing Genoa to incurring the public odium to which compliance with this demand would expose his sovereign.* Carysfort proposed to employ Gentz, a brilliant German publicist, who stood with Burke and Mallet du Pan in the foremost rank of literary champions of the old order against revolutionary innovation, to combat hostile criticism, and educate foreign opinion to a juster appreciation of British policy. Ill-will, which he thought utterly unreasonable, does not appear to have given Lord Grenville much concern; nor did he care much, perhaps, to convert antagonists whom he so frankly despised as "fools and madmen." Still he allowed his brother-in-law to retain Gentz's literary services to explain and defend English policy, by a pension of £200 a year. An Introductory essay or Memoire, by the German writer sent to Lord Grenville, and included in this volume, amply confirms Lord Carysfort's representations, and shows in what discouraging circumstances Gentz advocated a cause which must have seemed well-nigh desperate, until the fears excited by Bonaparte's unbridled ambition caused another revulsion of European opinion.

At the end of November the war between France and Austria entered its last phase. But the issue was no longer doubtful. The French armies, flushed with victory, re-equipped at the expense of Germany and Italy, and re-inforced by Bonaparte, were in superb condition. The Austrians, inferior in number and broken in spirit, had the additional disadvantage of being badly supplied with food and clothing in the depth of a severe winter. The British Government, while constraining the Emperor to continue the war for an object no longer attainable—the separation of Belgium from France—and heaping reproach on the timid expedients by which he had sought to avert imminent defeat, allowed unjust suspicion of his good faith to withhold the money absolutely needed, as Lord Minto wrote, to send his troops into the field, until intelligence should have reached England that hostilities had been renewed. When this intelligence arrived, it was an announcement that the Austrians had suffered a crushing defeat; and then Pitt decided to make no further payment. Archduke John having failed in an attempt to turn the French position between the Isar and the Inn, was beaten by Moreau in the decisive battle of Hohenlinden. He tried to rally his troops at Salzburg for a stand against the pursuing enemy. But, disheartened by want and fatigue, they flung away their arms and fled. Then the Emperor prevailed on Archduke Charles to resume the command. This change, on which Wickham had so confidently relied as the certain harbinger of victory, added disgrace to defeat. The army, taking it to mean a prolongation of the war, could hardly be restrained from open revolt. Its chief officers, without awaiting the arrival of the general who had been their idol, sent Prince John of Lichstentien to the Emperor to represent the absolute necessity of making peace. Archduke Charles, on reaching the camp, found himself confronted, as Wickham wrote, by “a general combination of cowardice and mutiny.” Meantime, General Brune in Italy drove his Austrian opponent, Bellegarde, from the lines of the Mincio and the Adige, back into the passes of the Tyrolese Alps. The unfortunate Emperor, in order to save Vienna, consented to treat separately for peace. He wrote to George III. excusing this breach of a treaty which had still some weeks to run, by the plea of imperative necessity. Lord Minto and Mr. Wickham bore testimony to the scrupulous fidelity with which he had adhered to his engagements under very severe trials, and to the prostrate condition of the Austrian monarchy. The answer of the British monarch acknowledged his ally’s good faith in handsome terms, and gave assurance of undiminished friendship. Thugut seems to have cherished the illusion of being still able to conclude peace on the “Campo Formio basis,” which he had rejected before the campaign opened; and, perhaps, even of luring Bonaparte into a general conference, as barren of results as the Congress of Rastadt. But the First Consul, while consenting, at the request of the Tzar to spare the Kings of Sardinia and Naples and the Elector of Bavaria, compelled the last Roman Emperor to pass under the yoke of unconditional submission. The treaty of Luneville, signed in February, 1801, pushed back the Austrian boundary in Italy from the Mincio to the Adige; forced the Emperor to cede the left bank of the Rhine to France, not only as a German sovereign, but as representative of the whole Germanic body; stipulated that lay rulers dispossessed by this cession should be compensated in Germany, but gave the Ecclesiastical Electors, staunch adherents of the House of Hapsburgh, no claim to indemnity; deprived the Emperor's brother of the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, and bestowed it on the son-in-law of the Queen of Spain, who assumed the title of King of Etruria.

After the conclusion of the peace of Luneville Baron Thugut disappeared from the political stage on which for ten eventful years he had filled so large a space. Nothing, perhaps, in his conduct on it became him less than his manner of leaving it. His unavailing struggles, as described by Mr. Wickham, and with more of sympathy and indulgence by Lord Minto, to retain the direction of public affairs, without enjoying the confidence of his sovereign, or being willing to accept arrangements which the welfare of the monarchy made imperative, betrayed a lamentable want of personal dignity and public spirit. The Emperor broke his fall, and acknowledged his services, by the grant of an estate in Galicia.

On the subject of the political measure which involved, as an unforeseen consequence, the downfall of Pitt's first administration, Legislative Union of Great Britain and Ireland, the correspondence in Volume VI. is significantly reticent. It tells us nothing of the means or methods by which failure in the Irish Parliamentary session of 1799 was converted to success in that of 1800. Lord Grenville, no doubt, was kept well-informed of all essential particulars by the Irish Chief Secretary. But Lord Castlereagh, instead of committing them to paper, appears to have reserved them for personal communication in London. Lord Grenville seems to have been equally cautious in his mode of conveying intelligence to the Marquis of Buckingham, whose eager interest in the measure, chafed under this unaccustomed reserve. Brief notes from Mr. Cooke, Under Secretary at Dublin Castle, recorded for Grenville's information the daily progress of the Bill through the Irish Parliament. These bulletins, though doubtless very acceptable at the time, possess little historical interest. The writer's evident anxiety in regard to the stability of the Government majority, as numbers rose and fell in the division lists during the course of the debates, recalls the Lord Lieutenant's statement to General Ross, that half of those voting for the measure would be at least as much delighted by its defeat as any member of the Opposition. A temperate letter from Lord Farnham, an Irish peer, dealing with the fiscal part of the new settlement, seems to show that the arrangements fixing the proportion of taxation for each island pressed very unequally on Ireland. This communication does not appear to have been answered. Pitt's letters contain no allusion whatever to the Act of Union. A still deeper silence covers everything bearing on the introduction of the measure intended to supplement that Act, by substituting a political for a religious test as a qualification for public employment. Two brief notes from Pitt to Grenville, dated February 1, 1801, refer obscurely to differences of opinion between Ministers and the King, and serious consequences involved. Lord Buckingham wrote to his brother on February 3 warmly approving of the course adopted by the Ministry in resigning office. On the 6th Lord Grenville wrote to Lord Carysfort announcing the resignation of a majority of the Cabinet, in consequence of the King's refusal to sanction a Bill for the removal of the religious disabilities of the Irish Catholics; the formation of a new administration by Mr. Addington from colleagues and followers of Mr. Pitt; the writer's determination to give the new Ministers zealous support, and earnest hope that his personal connections would follow his example. Of the unlooked for dissensions in the Cabinet, or the secret intrigues disclosed in Lord Stanhope's Life of Pitt, we find no hint whatever. One of the earliest appointments made by Mr. Addington gave Lord Hawkesbury charge of the Foreign Office. Lord Grenville wrote on February 11, in most cordial and characteristic terms, to place at his successor's service whatever knowledge might have been acquired by the writer in the course of "ten years' observation of those wretched things which are called governments on the Continent of Europe." Then the King's health broke down under the strain of the political crisis, and the formation of the new Ministry was suspended for several weeks. But Lord Grenville retired to Dropmore, and beyond responding to Lord Hawkesbury's requests for advice and information, seems to have taken no further part, except what was absolutely required by official formalities, in the deliberations of the Cabinet or the transaction of public business.

VOL. VI.

LORD GRENVILLE to LORD MINTO.

Private.

1799, November 1. Cleveland Row.—“I have little to add to the voluminous dispatches which you will receive by Captain Forster. Certainly M. Thugut will have no reason to complain if, at the moment he is doing us all the mischief he can, we return good for evil, and induce the Emperor of Russia to agree to leave Piedmont in the hands of Austria. This part, however, of the arrangement (if it can be by an ample equivalent to the King of Sardinia be reconciled to the principles of honour and justice) will, I think, in its effect be advantageous to our future interests; as it will so fundamentally overthrow that favourite system of French policy, the surrounding that country with small and weak states. What relates to the Netherlands I do not like as well; but as this is part of the bear-skin which yet remains to be cut off, we may be more liberal of it.

“You will probably think our plans for next year are at least formed on a scale sufficiently large. It is, however, I am convinced, by such efforts only that we can obtain our object.

“It was this year within our grasp, if Austria would have consented to be placed in a state of power, security, and prosperity, such as it has never yet seen. This, however, was not to be, and we must make the best of things as they are. Even so a campaign that has driven the enemy from Verona and Reggio to Nice, is not to be considered as one of inconsiderable glory or benefit.

“I fear we shall have endless difficulties when we come to treat for magazines and supplies with the most shabby set of people in Europe. It will require no small degree of firmness at the outset to convince them that we are not at their mercy, which we really are in this respect, though we must not let them think so.” Copy.

1799, November 1, at night.—“We have accounts that the whole mass of Royalists in all the north-west provinces of France has risen. We are preparing to support them by money, arms, and stores, if we cannot yet do so by troops. I have just received the enclosed from Mr. Wickham. The suggestion appears to me so just that I think I cannot do better than send it to you confidentially in his own words. I well know they will accord with your ideas, but Thugut's mind is a most unfriendly soil for the cultivation of any just or liberal sentiment on that subject." Copy.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 3. Harley Street.—“ Je vous envoie la lettre que j'ai reçue hier du Comte Stakelberg de Suisse. Comme sa main est difficile à lire je joins une copie à l'original, en vous priant de me renvoyer le dernier. Si vous avez quelques nouvelles postérieures ou plus détaillées sur tout ce qui regarde ces affaires, et particulièrement sur ce qui regarde notre grand maréchal, je vous supplie de me le communiquer. L'idée de prendre ses quartiers à Vienne [Vérone] ou Milan me paroît trop étrange pour être vraie. Je vous rend mille grâces pour l'information secrète de ce qui se fait à Vienne, que vous avez eu la bonté de m'envoyer avant hier.”

Enclosure.

COUNT C. J. STACKELBERG to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, October 15. Feldkirch.—“ Je viens de recevoir la lettre que votre Excellence m'a fait l'honneur de m'écrire le 12^e 8^e Septembre. Très flatté de ce que vous avez bien voulu acquiescer à ma demande relativement à l'ouverture d'une correspondance officielle, mon regret est de voir qu'elle cessera bientôt, vu le manque d'intérêt qu'elle auroit pour votre Excellence. Je prévois le terme de l'offensive et la fin d'une campagne qui, sans la perfidie du cabinet Autrichien, auroit été décisive, et peut-être la dernière, par le rétablissement de l'ancien ordre de choses en France. Le Maréchal Souvaroff, victorieux des hommes et des élémens, a poursuivi sa marche triomphale depuis l'Italie jusqu'au Vorarlberg; mais voyant son armée diminuée, manquant de vêtemens, il s'est sagement décidé, au lieu de se porter en avant comme il en avoit été question, à aller vers Shaffhouse se réunir avec M. de Korsakoff, pour où il est parti ce matin, se dirigeant par Bregentz, Mersbourg et Singen. Arrivé dans ces environs, les deux armées amalgamées ensemble, son projet (à moins qu'il ait changé depuis hier) est de mettre le marché à la main à l'Archiduc et de lui offrir un dernier effort sur la Suisse; mais seulement à la condition d'une co-opération loyale et vigoureuse de sa part; si non, d'aller avec son armée réunie prendre des quartiers d'hiver. Sur le choix de ceux-ci, le maréchal n'étoit pas décidé, mais penchoit pour Vérone ou Milan. Je voudrois que ce projet pût être exécuté, devant fort embarrasser la cour de Vienne comme obstacle à ses négociations avec le Directoire qu'on dit reprises chaudement. Dans tous les cas, je me flatte que nous ne ferons la campagne prochaine qu'à bonnes enseignes et avec la certitude de n'être pas la dupe du Baron Thugut. Qu'on conviendra d'un plan d'opérations fixe, avec la spécification précise du rôle que devra y jouer l'armée Autrichienne, enfin qu'on parviendra à faire prononcer la cour de Vienne sur ses prétentions, en cherchant surtout à la lier de manière à n'être plus dans la continuelle inquiétude de lui voir abandonner la cause commune. En écrivant à Petersbourg, je ne cesse pas de parler en ce sens, mais que pourroit ma foible voix si elle n'étoit soutenu par d'autres, méritants, à juste titre, d'être plus écoutées.

"Tout ce que dans votre lettre vous avez bien voulu me dire au sujet de M. Wickham m'a paru de la plus grande justesse. Son mérite n'a pu m'échaper, et je crois qu'il rendra justice à la confiance que je lui témoigne, sollicitée d'ailleurs par l'union des deux Cours." Copy.

W. WYNDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 3. Park Street, Westminster.—"Bad as the present state of things is, it furnishes no reason for relaxing our endeavours, nor, with respect to operations more immediately dependent on us, for changing their direction. The Royalists, however culpable or unfortunate for having begun so suddenly and prematurely, however doomed, I fear, to ultimate and perhaps speedy ruin, must yet be supported to the utmost of our power; and, if we would give to our efforts a chance of success, be supported with all possible promptness and alacrity. The least difference of success or failure in the outset may change the whole face of their affairs; and nothing is more obvious than that such success or failure may depend upon the arrival, sooner or later, of a cargo, or even upon a letter satisfying them to what extent they may depend upon us, and what measures they may take in consequence.

"I allude here particularly to the determination to be taken, and the power to be given to them in consequence, of trying the effect upon the Republican army of taking into pay those who should join the Royal standard. Without some impression of that sort, it is difficult to conceive how they should succeed; with such an impression, operating even to no great extent, there is no saying what effects may not be produced. The whole tenor of the information which I have at all times received, joined to opinions and facts occurring in the last communications, strongly favour the belief of the possibility at least of such an impression, especially if the trial should be made before any reverses shall have checked the confidence that might be entertained of the final success of their cause.

"With the concurrence of Mr. Pitt, I have thrown out in a letter to one of the chiefs what may encourage them to take that step within moderate bounds, should the necessity of their affairs drive them to the expedient, and the advantages of it appear likely to be important and decisive. In fact it is one of those measures which can hardly operate further than as its operation must be wished. If it should produce great expense, it must produce proportionate advantage. If I had been writing for myself I should certainly have made my encouragement much more explicit.

"Unfortunately this indirect permission, whatever operation it may have, is lying at present on board Captain Keats' at Portsmouth, and may not reach them, I know not when. It is melancholy to think that nearly the first evidence of our good will, the first sign of life that they will receive from us, will not come till three weeks, or a month perhaps, after they have been in full insurrection. It is the more necessary that all possible activity should now be used, and the evidences of our intentions be the most speedy and decisive. Mr. Pitt mentioned your idea of recommending to Monsieur to repair to Jersey. I doubt only from the consideration of its quickening the exertions of the Directory before the Royalist party shall have got sufficient consistency; yet the effect of such a proclamation as was proposed I understand, at the same time, may be looked to as very considerable. And if the proclamation is to be issued, there seems to be an end to the objections which might otherwise be felt to placing Monsieur at Jersey. I am to see him to-morrow, and, without directly making the proposal, will endeavour to learn what his own ideas and feelings upon the subject are.

"What I had in view principally in beginning this letter was to state some ideas growing out of conversations which I have had lately with De la Rosière. By the way, having come over here for the purpose of attending Monsieur when there was a question of his going to Switzerland, he would be much obliged to you, in case his presence here should be further desired, to say a word to Mr. Walpole by which he might stand excused to the Government in Portugal.

"Combining what I collected of his opinions with such as one may form for oneself, it seems as if the course of events between this and the next campaign (supposing that there is to be another campaign, on the part I mean of the Austrians) would of itself necessarily place the Austrians in that position, in which there would be the best chance of making them fall in with our views in the prosecution of the war. If the Austrians should be unable to make peace, which I cannot but think is likely to be the case, and the French should make a winter campaign, which in the event of war continuing may still more be relied on, the part in which, according to Rosière's opinion, the French ought to make their irruption, is low down upon the Rhine between Coblenz and Mayence.

"Now this is near the part where, according to the plan which Rosière would form for the next campaign, the allied armies ought to enter France, which he thinks ought to be a little above Mayence, by Spire, Worms, and Manheim.

"His general plan of campaign rests upon what seems to me the only rational basis, namely that of standing on the defensive with respect to all distant possessions, and directing all offensive operations against the body of France itself, aided by a civil war to be raised where the materials for it shall be found most abundant, and most capable of being used to advantage. In this instance his defensive operations would be in Italy, in the Black Forest, and in the Grisons; while his offensive operations, being in fact the only efficacious defence, should be an irruption into France in the quarter above-mentioned, aided by a civil war within.

"Surely if such a general plan were well pressed upon the Austrians, particularly after they may have been beaten into a temper somewhat more tractable by their experience during the course of the winter, the obvious truth of its principles may produce its effect upon their minds, more especially if this royalist war should be capable of being maintained, and they should be taught practically its value by the necessity of looking often to its assistance. I cannot but think, therefore, that good might arise if, by some contrivance, Rosière might be sent to Vienna to explain and enforce his own plan. I don't recollect for certain whether, at the time it was intended he should go, his journey was put off from any considerations that would create an obstacle to his being listened to at present. His name stands high in Europe, and his authority upon a subject of this sort can hardly fail to make some impression. There may be the further recommendation to his plan, that it so far agrees with the favourite project at Vienna as that it brings the chief of their force low down upon the Rhine.

"To return to the insurrection in Brittany; everything must depend upon the vigour and promptness of our exertions. It is a state of things that cannot brook the delays of official or diplomatic proceedings. It is a military operation, the fate of which hangs upon hours. Dutheil informed me to-day that, by intercepted accounts from the agents of the Directory, the situation of Normandy was such, the temper of the people so strongly Royalist, and the difficulty so great of paying the Republican troops that, in their opinion, should the Royalists be supplied with arms and money, the province must be lost. He wished, therefore, above all things, that money should be sent to St. Marcouf. But, alas! no money is to be had. The dollars, except those brought in with the Spanish prizes, are all gone to Hamburg. Surely now is a time when we might have recourse to the measure which I wished for long ago, of coining louis at Birmingham. Between Louis XVI. and XVIII. there can never be any difficulty of evading the law, if there could ever have been any uneasiness upon that score; and the apprehension is not now, I conceive, in force about sending coin out of the country. At all events, if from any over-strained scruple, from any remissness or want of attention, we suffer this insurrection to fall to the ground when it might by any means have been supported, there will [be] no end to our remorse, any more than to the reproach which must justly attach upon our conduct.

"Arrangements have, I understand, been made for appointing cruising squadrons; but according to the best judgment I can form, subject of course even in my own mind to further information, the service will never be properly carried on, nor the full benefit be felt of our naval superiority, till Quiberon is made a station for the fleet."

LORD GRENVILLE to W. PITT.

1799, November 4. Dropmore.—"By the Bishop of Lincoln's desire I send you the enclosed, which I received from him. It certainly well deserves attention; the facts are truly alarming, especially as relating to a part of England where one might least expect to find such a state of things. What must it be in London and its neighbourhood, and in the manufacturing countries? The remedies are good so far as they go, but are, I fear, very inadequate to the mischief.

"I am not now sufficiently acquainted with the extent and nature of the jurisdiction which our bishops may legally exercise over their clergy, to decide whether there is a deficiency in that respect, or only in their practice and habit on that subject. But without wishing, I am sure in the smallest degree, to join in, or to countenance, the cry which is raised for ill purposes against the body of our clergy, I cannot but think that no reformation would be more effectual (though others would certainly be wanted in addition to it) than one which should ensure to every parish the residence either of the parson, or of his curate; and should provide in his ecclesiastical superior a real and practical (not a nominal) inspection and control over the general tenor of his life and manners, and over his regularity and diligence in the discharge both of certain fixed and stated duties, now growing daily more and more into disuse, and of that general duty of attention and care which a clergyman owes to his flock. It is evidently the object and intention of our ecclesiastical constitution that such superintendence and control should be exercised, and without it our church Establishment must be one of less subordination than that of the Presbyterians.

"You are not one of those very wise men who think that the religious habits of a people are indifferent to their civil government. I know it has been a complaint at all times that the principles of religion and piety were gradually losing their hold on the people of this country. But it would be a strange blindness not to see that this complaint, whether just or not at other periods, is now but too well founded. The moment is peculiarly well fitted for applying a remedy to this evil, and I trust you will take it into serious and active consideration.

"The only objection I have ever heard against such a regulation as should require residence (either of the parson or curate) in every parish, is the scantiness of the provision in many parishes, which must reduce the person who had no other dependence for his support to a condition far below the decent station of his profession. If that be the case the remedy is in the hands of Parliament, and no reasonable man, or well wisher to the establishments of this country would be dissatisfied with any provisions tending only to remedy this evil, if they were accompanied with suitable restraints to prevent the mischiefs which now exists.

"I know that all these things must be touched with a tender hand, but we live in a period when the old rule quieta non movere, excellent as it generally is, has been found inapplicable to almost every branch of our Government. These things are all stirred by the restless spirit of the times, and our duty is to give them a right direction and keep them, if we can, in a due course." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to the BISHOP OF LINCOLN.

1799, November 4. Dropmore.—“I was very much obliged to you for the attention you were good enough to pay to the letter with which I troubled you, and I had real pleasure in finding that the evil had been exaggerated to me; though, even on the result of your enquiries, it certainly appears that a number of legal or justifiable excuses in particular cases produces a general state of things such as is by no means to be wished.

“The paper you enclosed to me affords a most satisfactory proof of attention to the subject, and I am confident that good must result from it. The statement of facts is truly alarming, and I consider it the more so because I apprehend those facts must exist in a far greater proportion in London and other great cities and towns, and in their neighbourhood, as well as through all the manufacturing countries, than in such a district as that to which this paper relates.

“I have, as you desired, transmitted it to Mr. Pitt, with some observations that occurred to me on the subject.

“You will, I am sure, not suspect me of wishing to countenance the cry which ill disposed people, or which fanatics, raise against the body of our clergy; nor do I by any means impute to them the blame which ought to fall on the general carelessness and growing irreligion of the people of this country. But there are two points which I think require and admit of correction, and you will not be hurt at my stating them to you freely. I am inclined to believe that in both cases it is the law itself that is as much or more defective than the practice, but of that point I speak ignorantly, and you can easily correct me.

“The first is this; the very constitution of our church Establishment, the very name and function, as I apprehend it, of bishops, supposes a constant superintendence and control over the clergy who are subordinate to them—over their general lives and conduct, and over their zeal and diligence in the discharge of their peculiar duties. A spirit of liberality, a commendable dislike to the appearance of too much assumption and exercise of power over inferiors, and perhaps something of the prevailing ideas of the times extending itself to those inferiors, have, as it seems to me, diminished that superintendence, till it is become in many cases merely nominal; and in hardly any so regular, apparent, and constant, as to answer many of the chief purposes of its institution, particularly those which relate to public opinion. I have occasionally heard in conversation upon this subject, that the legal power of the bishop is really defective in this respect, and that some instances of failure, where the authority has been attempted to be exercised, and has with impunity been set at defiance, have led to a prudent forbearance, in order not to expose a function to irreverence and contumacy which cannot suffer either without great public mischief.

“Should this be the case, I think the remedy is not difficult. No man will suspect the present bench of bishops of a desire to assume that sort of spiritual authority which, extending itself far into the temporal concerns of the laity, has formerly been justly odious in this kingdom; nor would it be necessary, or perhaps proper, that the proposal should proceed from them, though their assistance would be wanted to frame, to digest, and to execute it. I am persuaded that reasonable and temperate measures tending to give to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the bishop over his clergy such a degree of weight and efficacy as to provide an effectual control and superintendence where our church Establishment supposes it to exist, would meet the approbation of all moderate men in the present moment; because there seems to be among persons of that description a general persuasion that increased exertions are necessary to counteract the dangers with which we are threatened.

"Next to this, and as a part of it, I consider that which is adverted to in your letter. I mean a provision for securing to every parish, and in every case without exception, the constant residence either of the parson or his curate; the cure of souls being unquestionably a duty which cannot be discharged without both the influence and the knowledge which residence alone can give.

"The objection, I know, which is commonly urged against this in practice—for in theory and principle I have heard none—is that the provision is in many cases inadequate, when single, to maintain a clergyman in the decent station which befits his profession, and will compensate the charge of his education. If this be the only difficulty the remedy is in the hands of Parliament, and if the details were attentively collected, and a plan well adjusted to enable the Legislature to enforce residence in all cases—of course I mean prospectively only and so as not to interfere with present rights—I do believe that the expense of supplying the deficiency which might be necessary to be provided for in such a system would be readily and cheerfully borne.

"I have taken the liberty to suggest to your consideration these two ideas, because they arise out of the subject of the paper you sent me, but are not, and could not be expected to be, adverted to there. I am far from seeing any objection to the legislative remedies which are suggested in that paper to the evils there stated, and I cannot but admire and applaud the impression which is there expressed of the necessity of an increased zeal and assiduity as the best mode both of refuting the calumnies, and of counteracting the acts of those who are converting the religious sentiments, where they do still prevail, of the lower orders of the people into a means of destroying the religious establishment of the state.

"I should be very happy when you return to town to converse with you on this whole subject. If it is viewed politically it is of no small concern, but it is not possible to consider it in that relation only." Copy.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 5. Stowe.—"I fear from what I hear from Tom that there is very little chance of bringing you down to Stowe, and the roads and weather are very little tempting to induce me to pass to Dropmore for a day or two. I must therefore urge you by letter to consider what I have been turning very much in my mind for the last eight days; I mean the question of a winter campaign in Normandy, co-operating and combining with it supplies of clothing, arms, and money towards Nantz, where the Chouans appear in such force. When we last talked on this subject, and discussed the inconvenience of a winter campaign, we argued upon it as a question on which we might choose. I fear that this is no longer our situation. I am convinced that the Emperor will be bought off by negotiation during the course of the winter by France unless she really has sufficient confidence in her situation as to deem herself able to overthrow by force his situation and government. But they have so much to gain by a peace with Austria, and so much to tempt him with in Italy, that I feel certain that such a peace will be made, leaving them with a secure frontier (for the struggle of the Empire can be nothing) from Holland to the furthest extremity of their old or their new line; excepting only such part of it as Suwarow can threaten with his existing force, cut off by the Emperor's neutrality from reinforcements or even from supplies. Their first operation will be (if it is not already done) to crush every attempt at counter-revolution by the Chouans or Royalists; and in the spring we shall be to expect to see them in that force on their coasts which they will be able to collect, having their arms completely at liberty; a force certainly sufficient to protect Normandy or France against us, and perhaps sufficient, with the support of 53 ships now in Brest and Rochfort waiting only for the Duke of York's present of 8,000 seamen to man them, to give us serious alarms for Ireland. You will likewise remember that we shall not be stronger in point of men than we are at this moment, whilst at the same time the French will every moment be gaining ground by adding conscripts.

"Such are my reasons for thinking that, from the unfortunate military mismanagement in Holland, you have no longer the same choice, but that you must, in your own defence, use the 50,000 effective troops whom you now have for offensive winter operations in Normandy. I say nothing upon the plan of your operation, for that must depend upon so many circumstances not within my reach; but the general line of attack and movement seems simple and obvious, and would be much assisted by the operations of the insurgents as far as I can trace them from the newspapers. And, at all events, we shall have, even malgré lui, the co-operation of the Emperor added to that of Suwarow; a co-operation which, by detaining French troops on the Neckar, the Rhine, in Switzerland, and in Piedmont, must assist us out of any possible calculation. If you ask me whether I am sanguine enough to hope to finish the war by such an attempt, I dare not answer yes; but I clearly see ruin if we postpone all idea of offence to a period when it will be physically impossible that we should succeed. You will observe that I have not touched upon any of several collateral considerations that must occur to you, if you have the patience to read this letter with attention. I am perfectly sensible that all this must have occurred to you, and yet it is a satisfaction to me to state my thoughts upon our situation, which I fear will be very critical. I do not, of course, ask you for any detailed answer upon this subject, but pray put my mind at ease by telling me 'that our ideas do not materially differ'; though I am well aware how many contingencies may ultimately be to decide upon your operations."

Postscript.—"You will think me very mischievously inclined when I tell you that I have been reading George II.'s proceedings upon the convention of Closter-Seven; and having clearly settled in my mind that the Duke of York ought to be disavowed, I am equally clear that he will be avowed; and so I must be content, as I am not quite ready to hang you for your share in it."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT STARHEMBERG.

1799, November 6. Cleveland Row.—"J'ai reçu votre billet au sujet de la négociation de M. le Baron de Mylius. Il est très simple que notre Cour insiste sur l'exécution d'un traité conclus et signé. Il ne l'est pas moins que Sa Majesté ne puisse pas consentir à prendre à sa solde des troupes qui ne seroient pas à sa disposition, et je serois bien éloigné de conseiller Sa Majesté de se départir de ce principe, même pour un objet bien plus important que celui dont il est question. Il paroît donc que la négociation tombe d'elle-même, et je ne vois aucun mezzoterminé capable de concilier ces deux points." Copy.

LORD GRENVILLE to the MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM.

1799, November 6.—"I have been ruminating on some ecclesiastical projects, but I do not know whether I shall be able to bring them to bear, nor do I yet possess all the knowledge of the actual state of things which is necessary in order to enable me to fix my own judgment. They relate to the two points of episcopal jurisdiction and superintendence, and residence of parochial clergy.

"My notion is to strengthen, if necessary, the legal powers of the bishops, so as to give them effective means both of suspension and deprivation in all cases both of improper life and manners, and of remissness in the execution of certain stated duties which they are to be required to exact from all their parochial clergy. To enable them, from the chapters in their dioceses, at their own choice, to augment the number of their archdeacons or visitants, under whatever name may best suit the old constitutional forms of our Church. To require them, or in their absence the archdeacon or other proper person, to hold fixed and invariable annual visitations, at which, calling if necessary to their assistance a certain number of their beneficed or dignified clergy, they should receive the reports of their archdeacons and other visitants, and should at such visitation, or at furthest at the next visitation, proceed by sentence either of suspension or deprivation against all persons who should appear on such reports to be of scandalous life or conversation, to have published irreligious, immoral or seditious books, or to have been remiss in the performance of such stated duties as above. Lastly to compel the bishops to return these reports, and their proceedings thereon at their visitations to their metropolitans, by whom they should be annually laid before the King, with their observations thereon.

“As to parochial residence, the idea would be to require that no person shall, on any pretence, be non resident on his living without appointing a curate to be there constantly resident in his room. And to charge on the consolidated fund a sum sufficient to make up every living throughout the kingdom to the amount of £70 per annum, with the single exception of such parishes as, being adjacent to each other, it might be fit to conjoin for this purpose by the act of proper commissioners to act with the bishop. Where, therefore, the living fell short of £70, the parson would receive the difference from the public, but be compelled to personal and constant residence ; and some provision might be made for the residence and maintenance of his curate in the single case of absence with the bishop's license from extreme necessity of sickness. Where the living amounted to £75 or upwards, he would have the choice, as at present, of residing, or finding some legal excuse for non-residence ; but, in the latter case, he would be obliged to provide a curate constantly resident ; and in both cases proper certificates of residence would be required to be produced to the Visitants.

“The hardship, whatever it was, which this regulation would bring on the body of the clergy at large (I do not speak of particular cases) would be amply compensated by the addition which the Legislature would thus make to the smaller livings ; and the expense of this last measure would be much more than compensated to the public by the benefit which must arise from the constant residence of a clergyman in every parish throughout the kingdom.

“By what I have called stated duties above I mean that, from these resident clergymen who would no longer have the plea of other duty to perform, I would certainly exact, by enumeration, many points of their duty (evening service, catechism, visitation of sick, and other points) which are now growing, or grown into disuse.

“You would much oblige me by your ideas on these points. On the first I have been told that it is no more, or little more, than the law as it now exists. All I can say is that I am sure it is not the practice as it now exists ; and that this is not the only case where it has been found to be highly useful to re-enact, with small variation, the existing law, in order to call the attention and excite the zeal both of those who are to execute the law, and of those who are to obey it.

“You are not, I am very certain, one of those extremely profound politicians who have, among other happy discoveries of this age, found out that the religion of the people has no influence on its morals, or its morals on the prosperity and good government of the State. You will not therefore think that an attention to this subject is either unbecoming Government and Parliament, or is ill suited to such a moment as the present.” Extract.

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 8. Harley Street.—“M. Frère m'a fait savoir hier-au-soir que vous désirez que je vienne aujourd'hui chez vous, et que ce soir vous enverrez un courier en Russie.

"Je me rendrai chez vous entre midi et une heure ; mais quand au courier, je vous supplie de me faire la faveure de ne l'expédier que demain, samedi au soir ; car le Duc d'York m'ayant ordonné de passer chez lui aujourd'hui à trois heures, voilà toute une matinée employée sans pouvoir rien écrire, et je ne puis m'appliquer à aucun travail après avoir mangé, sans avoir le lendemain une attaque de bile qui me tourmente dix à quinze jours après. Vingt-quatre heures ne vous feront pas une différence, et m'épargneront une maladie."

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 8. Somerset Place.—"I do not feel quite at ease upon the result of yesterday's Cabinet. The deliberation was pretty far advanced before I was able to join you, and indeed if it had been otherwise, I am so far from having a separate opinion to state, that I confess myself totally at a loss to figure any speedy effects to arise from Continental alliance ; and, under that impression, the leaning of my opinion, for it is really little more than that, would have been to have kept ourselves to a very general declaration both to Vienna and Petersburg that we had exhausted every endeavour we had in our power to unite them in any effectual or beneficial co-operation, and must therefore leave it to themselves to consider very seriously the situation into which those unfortunate jealousies and animosities had brought them ; that if they, taught by fatal experience, and looking distinctly to the probable impending consequences of the triumphs of France, should form any plan in which the aid of Britain, by subsidies to Russian troops, could be of real utility, we should be glad to listen to it with every disposition to co-operate with it ; but, if no such plan was laid before us, we had nothing left but, upon our own resources, to maintain firmly the same dignified line of conduct we had hitherto pursued, which was to maintain at all events the power and independence of Great Britain. In my communication with Russia I would, of course, distinctly state that, be the result of the difficulties of the present moment what it may, it was our fixed and deliberate purpose to maintain and cultivate our connexion and friendship with the Court of Petersburg.

"Perhaps when you carry into execution the minute of Cabinet which you yesterday laid before us, it may not go much further than I have stated ; but you will better understand my ground of diffidence on this subject when I state to you that, after the perusal of Mr. Wickham's letters recently received, I am impressed with a perfect conviction that it is in vain to look for any effectual aid from the armies of Russia in the course of next campaign. They are brave men, and are, I suppose, as good materials as can be for the formation of a powerful army ; and, even in their present state, are in Russia itself, or in Turkey, as irresistible troops as can be supposed. But on the other hand if they are to act either in Italy or in Switzerland, they must be totally new modelled, and every principle in their formation and constitution must be altered and of new arranged. I cannot disguise from myself that, in so far as my judgment goes, this is a work of such extent and so complicated in its operations that, after having come under heavy pecuniary obligations which we must fulfil, we shall find ourselves disappointed in our expectations, and the country so disgusted with repeated mortifications and disappointments as will render it impossible for us to rally their spirits, or to make them submit with patience to the struggle they may be called upon to encounter. Perhaps if the material fortresses of Italy could be garrisoned with Russian troops, where they could be regularly fed, and deprived of the means of plundering, a small Austrian force in Italy might be sufficient for the rest of its defence ; and then the great strength of the Austrian force might be employed in other quarters ; and to that force we might add considerably by subsidizing the Bavarian troops, or any others that the States of Germany could furnish in addition to the proper troops of Austria. By an arrangement, joined to the diversions we would have it in our power to make from home and in the Mediterranean, I think I see daylight before me to lead to a campaign that would occupy all the armies that France could collect. In the meantime the Russian troops at home as well as those employed in garrison in Italy might be forming into such a state of discipline and new arrangement, as would enable them in a future campaign to take their share in active military operations, wherever it may be most expedient to employ them.

“Compte Woronzow is of opinion the Russian troops cannot be sent home without previous communication with the Emperor ; and he is likewise of opinion that Sir Home Popham ought to go by the most expeditious route without any détour.”

W. PITT to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 8. Hollwood.—“Nothing occurs to me on reading the despatches to vary in any degree the line we talked of this morning ; but there arise two separate points on which some answer seems necessary, and on which I should like to know your ideas ; I mean what relates to our own views at the peace, and to the new proposal about the ratification. Would it not be right also to bring under Thugut's view the strong probability that the projects of France may force a winter campaign whether he will or no, and to endeavour to learn whether he is prepared with any and what plan of military operation adapted to that case ?”

LORD GRENVILLE to HENRY DUNDAS.

1799, November 9. Cleveland Row.—“I think our decision of Thursday as stated in the minute then taken, and since explained more in detail in the despatch to Lord Minto, does not go a great deal further than the ideas contained in your letter. But I am, on the whole, of opinion that it is better to take the chance of doing what we can with the Russians next year, and I do not see why we should not reckon pretty confidently on the success of any force composed in the manner which Suwarow has recommended, and on which we have agreed to insist.

"I have talked a little to-day with Sir Home Popham about the Majorca expedition. He seems so much to agree with me in thinking the proposal likely to be peculiarly acceptable to the Emperor, that I own I should be extremely glad to find that it was one which, on further examination, was judged practicable. The possession of those islands and of Gibraltar would, I think, enable us, with an active officer in the command of the Mediterranean fleet, to keep the Spaniards in constant alarm for their coasts and ports in that sea, and would be more likely than anything else to drive them to the necessity of peace. I hope the thing may be so far examined before he goes as to enable him (if it is adopted) to lay it in some detail before the Emperor. And, in that case, the ships ought, if possible, to be ready to sail as soon as the answer is received, which may be in less than two months from this time." Copy.

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 9. Stowe.—"I am very sorry to see your mind so decidedly made up against the idea of further offensive operations during the winter; because I certainly see very black clouds gathering for the spring, and all collateral assistance by co-operation or diversion most uncertain, I should even say most certainly out of the question. You must see that I do not offer to you this measure as one that I adopt from choice, but from necessity. The communications from the moment the cold weather sets in are as certain as northerly to easterly winds can make them; and if it was possible to begin with the surprise of Havre, Cherbourg, or St. Malo, you would turn the difficulties of the season on the enemy, if you obliged them to make head against their insurgents, as well as against you in winter. Havre may hold a long time against a land siege, so may Cherbourg if the montagne is occupied; I know less of St. Malo. I agree perfectly with you that the insurgents have risen too soon; but if they are not supported during the winter by something more than the desultory attempt of landing a few arms, and a little money, the whole of that exertion, whatever it may be, will be crushed very long before your period of March or April; and your fifty thousand men will then most certainly be too weak for the force that will be employed against them. I understand that you had got from this last militia levy twelve thousand men, a few days ago; you bring back, as you say, thirty thousand from Holland; you had seven or eight thousand disposable men who did not go there, such as light infantry of the Guards corps half-completed, and others more forward in point of numbers; exclusive of the garrisons of Jersey and Guernsey, part of whom would, of course, be applicable to a movement on the coast of Normandy. This would complete your force to fifty thousand, without waiting for your Irish militia recruits, or your exchanged prisoners, or your Dutch royalists. I wish likewise to remind you that from the moment that it is understood you mean to remain quiet all the winter, you must double your Irish garrison, and pro tanto you will weaken your offensive army, as it is most clear that the French, acting on their plan of invasion in force (of 1759 and 1779, and again under Hoche in 1796) will not let the months of November and December roll over without an attempt.

"My mind is so strongly impressed with the necessity that I cannot avoid again and again pressing you to adopt some measure of this nature ; but if not, give at least the impression of it, and endeavour to derive some advantage from the experience.

"I do agree with you most cordially and entirely in your ideas respecting the clergy ; and have very long groaned over the very many abuses which I am willing to suppose the Bishops cannot correct, because most certainly they do not wish to grapple with them ; but I conceive that your task is so far easy that a reference to ancient principles and practice will save you much trouble. The idea of constant parochial visitation, independent of that of the Bishop or Archdeacon, exists in the ancient establishment of Rural Deans ; an appointment now hardly known, but spoken of in the highest terms by our ecclesiastical writers.

"Your scheme of a constant resident on each of the 9,000 cures in England and Wales at not less than 70*l.* appears primâ facie too extensive, and perhaps unnecessary ; but when you couple with this plan a further idea, absolutely necessary, of meeting the increased population of manufacturing counties by new ecclesiastical establishments, to prevent the poor from being forced by want of room into Methodist meeting-houses, I am convinced that the sum wanted from the sinking fund will be very large ; but whatever it may be, I am sure we shall agree in thinking that it ought to be raised and paid if we mean that any good government should exist in times more quiet, and consequently more relaxed than the present. But I contend most strenuously that the Bishops have shewn themselves not, as a body, fit to be trusted with the uncontrolled liberty of allowing non-residence, in the cases in which you seem inclined to give them this discretion. Such a licence ought to be controlled certainly by the Metropolitan, and, if given for more than 12 months, by the Crown. I would propose to you the system of coadjutors to Bishops when infirm or incapable, and possibly some arrangement for the care of dioceses too large or populous. I will likewise put into your hands some clauses drawn for a Bill which I prepared in 1797, for the establishment of a provincial or deanery commission for managing and leasing the parochial lands given in exchange for tithes ; a system that now operates to the ruin of the land (of which no lease can be given) and to the scandal of the Church, by the wicked frauds practised by the clergy in the management of their land ; but, above all, you will strike at a great source of idleness and perversion of character amongst the parochial clergy, if you will enact that no clergyman shall be qualified to kill game, or to keep dogs, or hunt, or fish, or do anything under the game laws by or in respect of any lands, tenements, tithes, or other property arising out of any ecclesiastical cure or benefice whatsoever. You will easily see that I care not for game; but I do abhor and utterly detest a hunting or shooting parson. You would likewise probably limit in future the dispensation for two livings to a shorter line, and to one more distinctly ascertained than the present, which is most fraudulently uncertain; and it would be wise to put by that distinction of value in the King's books that enables a man to hold three, four, or indeed an indefinite number of livings, and of (what ought to be made real cures) non-cures. But you are doubtless aware what a nest of hornets you are stirring, and of the thankless labour you undertake; but if you do not move in it I am confident no one else will, and I am most willing to work with you ostensibly, or in any possible mode in which I can help what, I solemnly protest, I think essential to the being of our Government, independent of other considerations which I know do weigh (and I bless God for it) very much with both of us.

"I have now only to beg that, in some way or other, you will let me know or see the details of Irish union. I am persuaded that no intention exists on the part of Mr. Pitt to put me wholly out of that question; but I think it possible that the plan may be arranged and sent to Ireland without any further communication with me, which from every reason you would not like, and which I should be sorry for. Remember I do not want to trouble you; but, as my interest and that of my family is now so large in that country, as my residence down to a very late period gives me much the means of judging, and as I have the most anxious wish for the measure, I should like to consider the ideas now under arrangement, and I cannot write to Lord Auckland for obvious reasons. Do not imagine that I am peevish on this subject; but remember that I am most anxious upon it."

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 9. Harley Street.—"Vous observerez sans doute que je ne parle pas de l'expédition sur Majorque. C'est qu'en revenant chez moi, et ayant songé sur ce sujet, je trouve qu'outre l'incertitude de la réussite (et il ne faut pas multiplier les non-réussites) cette expédition ne sera pas une diversion pour la France, qui ne s'embarasse pas de l'Espagne. Il faudra laisser une garnison dans l'isle, il faudra par conséquent diminuer l'armée de Souvorow, et ça devient une diversion en faveur de la France. C'est contre cette dernière qu'il faut redoubler nos efforts. Je soumet ces considérations à votre sagesse, et j'attens ce que vous me direz sur ce sujet."

LORD GRENVILLE to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, November 9. Cleveland Row.—"Je vous restitue le brouillon que vous m'avez envoyé. Je l'ai trouvé parfait à l'exception peut-être de quelques expressions de la première page. Je suis parfaitement d'accord avec vous que ce sont les idées militaires du M. Suwarrow et nullement celles du Baron Thugut qu'il faudra suivre. Mais je crois, en vérité, qu'il y aura un avantage très réel à demander au dernier son plan pour les opérations de la campagne, avant qu'il connoisse celui du maréchal.

"Si on lui propose un plan, au lieu de déférer aux lumières et aux talens supérieures de ce grand homme, il ne manquera certainement pas d'y trouver des objections. Il y soupçonnera des vues cachées (quand on les a, on les soupçonne toujours aux autres) et il s'y refusera; ou, ce qui seroit encore pis, il mettra des entraves à l'exécution de ce qui seroit convenu. En lui laissant l'initiative, on soumettra ses idées à la considération du Maréchal, on se réservera le droit de les discuter ici et à Petersbourg, on pourra même y faire des changemens, ou des modifications essentielles, mais ce sera toujours la proposition de la Cour de Vienne qui en fera la base, et le Ministre Autrichien n'aura plus de prétexte pour en contrecarrer l'exécution.

"J'apprends que Lord Mulgrave est parti de Vienne. Cela dérange un peu nos plans. Peut-être qu'en rencontrant mes dépêches il y retournera, mais en tout cas, Lord Minto aura les pleins pouvoirs, et il suivra, comme de raison, les conseils du Maréchal, dans la probité duquel on peut avoir autant de confiance que dans son génie." Copy.

Private. The EARL OF ELGIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 10. Constantinople.—"I was very sorry on stopping at Palermo to find Sir William Hamilton in a very bad state of health; so much so indeed as to render it most probable your Lordship will soon be called upon to appoint a successor to the mission he now holds; and as this accidental visit has suggested some observations which, in the event alluded to, may probably have some interest with your Lordship, I cannot withhold them under circumstances where no view of my own can by any means exist.

"Your Lordship should have before your eyes the universal confusion occasioned in Italy by the French invasion, and the opinion universally entertained of British greatness and British integrity of character, to understand the importance which the mission of Naples has acquired in the present conjuncture. The want almost of a form of constitution and the weakness of the executive government did, upon the appearance of the French army, carry over to them a greater proportion of persons of family in this, than in any country where the French have hitherto penetrated. And, on the other hand, Cardinal Ruffo in Calabria, and the partisan called Il Gran Diavolo towards Rome, used no means of preventing the further progress of the enemy but that of giving to their adherents the pillage of all the country they could get possession of. Accordingly, there exists scarce any family of property in the country some of whose members are not involved in the crime of rebellion, and whose estates are not materially damaged. Meanwhile the King, who owes the deliverance of Naples solely to the aid of Foreign Powers, and in particular to the operations of the British fleet, has, by remaining 37 days in the Bay without landing at Naples, and prosecuting with the utmost vigour during that time the punishment of those who had assisted the French, shown to his enemies a vindictive and unconciliatory disposition, and to his friends the utmost distrust and pusillanimity. I protest I had no opportunity whatever of knowing enough of what has passed to form a judgment of the propriety or impropriety of the part that has been taken in the name of Great Britain in those late occurrences. But undoubtedly the Court of Naples depends wholly on the countenance of England; the British Minister, as well as the naval officers, are continually called upon to act where it is impossible for them to have the benefit of instructions from home. Whether one considers the spirit which appears to animate the councils of this Government, or the popularity and influence of Great Britain in these countries, I cannot conceive a situation where more steadiness, experience, and independence is requisite than in the British Minister at the Court of Naples."

LORD MULGRAVE to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 10. Cuxhaven.—"On my arrival here yesterday I was informed that Captain Foster had left this place the day before on his way to Vienna with dispatches for me. I have sent an estafette to recall him, and shall therefore not set off with this day's packet, as I had intended; and I shall wait a short time in the hope of seeing the dispatches he carries for me. I shall, however, not wait beyond a day or two, as I am nearly certain there is nothing in them to detain me.

"Lord Minto and I had felt so convinced that I could do nothing more at Vienna, that I had desisted from accompanying him to Baron Thugut's; and we at length agreed that the best thing for me to do was to return to England, and give you such information as you might require on the subject of my mission. I left Vienna on the 24th of October, and was overtaken a few days afterwards on the road by a very pressing letter from Mr. Wickham requiring my presence in Switzerland. Had I received his letter at Vienna I should have taken the route of Switzerland to gratify that excellent and zealous Minister, although I knew that no measures could be adopted there that did not originate in Vienna, or at least receive a sanction from thence; and although the state of my health would have rendered a lengthened journey very inconvenient, the inflammation of my blood from previous exertions having filled me full of boils and troublesome sore eruptions, I wrote to him from Prague to inform him of the impossibility, from the state of the roads as well as my own, of my arriving in time to concert measures for active exertions in Switzerland, even if there were any discretion or disposition there to adopt my opinions."

THE EARL OF ELGIN TO LORD GRENVILLE.

Private.

1799, November 11. Constantinople.—“I feel quite ashamed on finding my correspondence of this day so voluminous, but the difficulty of my situation is peculiarly great, as your Lordship will readily admit, when you consider that removing the French from Egypt (which I conceive of the most important consequence) will leave the Turks entirely at peace, and open to the intrigues of France whose influence here is, I am informed, still very great. But I trust to hear from your Lordship as fully as the case appears to require.

“I enclose, in this private conveyance, copy of a letter I have just received from Tamara. His present idea is inconsistent with the consent he gave to the Turks in his conference. Nor do I see how the allies can deny protection to the French leaving Egypt on capitulation, any more than disregard any other stipulations made by either power in the course of the war.

“I can have no doubt it is your Lordship’s intention that my mission should be the only one, during its continuance, accredited at this Court. Sir S. Smith calls himself still Minister; and although there never can be any misunderstanding between so intimate a friend as he is, and myself, still business may be impeded unless your intentions are known.”

SIR CHARLES WHITWORTH TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 13. St. Petersburg.—“After having taken up so much of your Lordship’s time, there remains little to trouble your Lordship with in a private letter. I have the honour to acknowledge that from your Lordship of the 15th ultimo. No one can be more sensible than I am of the truth of what your Lordship alludes to in that letter. The infamous conduct of Essen exceeds, in my opinion, the imprudence of that of his predecessor. I have been obliged, notwithstanding this conviction, to treat this matter with the utmost delicacy; and if your Lordship could be as sensible as I am of the danger, you would approve of my reserve. It certainly cannot be our wish to alienate the mind of one so irritable as his Imperial Majesty; and the less so as he has perhaps but too strong an inclination to give every effect to his ill humour. My dispatches will prove to your Lordship how fruitless have been all our endeavours to prevent the adoption of the fatal measures which have been pursued; and I am well aware that it will require all our attention to prevent those troops which have been employed on the expedition against Holland from being recalled, as are those under the command of Marshal Souvarow. We are in a dreadful crisis, and I scarcely see how we shall be able to calm the Emperor’s mind. His indignation against the Court of Vienna is carried beyond all bounds; and indeed so much so, that one would almost be tempted to suspect it was affected; or at least fomented and made use of as a pretext for withdrawing his troops, and returning to that passive system which we so long lamented. It is a dreadful consideration to reflect that all these misfortunes are to be attributed entirely to the character of the sovereign, in whom, I am sorry to say, vigour of mind, and patience under adversity are so much wanting as they are necessary. If Baron Thugut is considered, as in truth he may, as dangerous to the cause, those who govern the councils of this Court are certainly but too liable to the same imputation.

"I have this moment heard that General d'Essen is dismissed the service. I cannot vouch for the truth of it; but if this act of justice has not been already done, it most certainly will shortly."

THE BISHOP OF CHESTER TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 13. Oxford.—"I have the favour of your letter, with copies of letters to Bishop of Lincoln, Mr. Pitt, and the Marquis of Buckingham which I shall enclose with this.

"I have not seen the paper to which your letter to the Bishop of Lincoln refers, but upon the subject of that paper I have already submitted to Mr. Pitt, by Mr. H. Browne, the evil as it exists in my diocese, and what I conceive one important means of remedying it, namely, the subjecting by Act of Parliament all tolerated teachers or ministers, upon the number of which there is not any restraint by law, to those restrictions to which the Established clergy are now by law actually subjected, namely, to bring a certificate of their moral lives, to certify what doctrines they profess to teach, and to be confined in their function to certain districts, and in buildings distinct, and appropriated to divine worship only.

"At present they hurt the community by immoral lives, by indefinite doctrines, by itinerant functions, and in secret conventicles, in buildings not separated from dwelling houses. Their congregations are indefinite, they have often none, when they begin to profess dissent.

"I am much flattered with your approbation of my charge; when requested to print it, I could say with truth 'it would be more to the credit of my clergy than that of their bishop.'

"I have little to correct in the conduct of my clergy. To the exception of pluralities in non-residence, I have added only that of schoolmasters; but I have everywhere resident, in those cases, curates upon a fair stipend. The power of the bishops is not inconsiderable, but their authority is weakened by the delays of the courts. I have been seven years in enforcing the residence of an incumbent, at the hazard of much expense had I failed of success; but their power is most impeded where it should be most easy in its operation, in punishing flagrant crimes in the clergy.

"But in an increasing population, the want of churches and of clergy is lamentable. For every thousand pounds expended in gratuitous accommodation of the poor, I could save a thousand persons to the Establishment who now dissent, if the money were managed skilfully, and find a stipend for the clergyman into the bargain.

"The detail of duties you mention are now all strictly incumbent upon the clergy by law, and though in practice they fail us miserably, they never, I believe, since the Restoration were better enforced on the part of the bishops. The truth is, the connection between the bishops and the clergy is not enough considered except in cases which call aloud for redress in the public opinion. In the ordinary course of duty, the one does not consider himself as responsible to the other. It has not been unusual to reside, or leave residence, indifferently, without notice to the bishop. 'Upon my honour,' said one to me whom I had called back to residence, 'I did not know that a bishop had anything to do with me until upon receipt of your letter I looked into Burn.' Whether that general sense of superintendence ever existed in either party to the degree which is requisite, and which you look for, I cannot say. It gives me singular satisfaction and comfort in the state of mind in which I delivered my charge to find the subject in your contemplation. All who know me know that I unwillingly foresee anything unpleasant; but, without some aid from the Legislature, and without some means of exciting a stronger zeal in the clergy throughout the kingdom, for I cannot complain of the clergy in my own diocese, the established religion cannot exist much longer in the country; and I think the line from Manchester through Yorkshire to Richmond, the extremity of my diocese, will convince anyone of this truth who shall pass it on horseback. I wish the Dissenters may not now be the majority in that tract. But I will trouble you with no more on this subject at present, purposing to avail myself of your kind invitation to Dropmore on the 23rd or 24th of this month, if that time shall happen to suit you. The 24th is indeed Sunday, but I in that case shall sleep at Beaconsfield, at the house of Mrs. Cleaver's mother on the Saturday.

"I am glad to find your ingravings so forward. I have written to Porson in hopes of his collation of the valuable MSS. of the Odyssey in the British Museum in due time; as it would greatly add to the value of the book."

W. WYNDHAM to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 14. Florence.—"The kindness which your Lordship has at all times shown to my family, and the particular favour and indulgence with which your Lordship has honoured me both in recommending me to His Majesty for the situation in which I now am, and during the whole period that I have had the honour to serve His Majesty, encourages me to entreat your Lordship's further protection towards me, and that you will not abandon me under any difficulties which may occur from the intrigues of Vienna, or the consequent necessary dispositions of the English Court. It is therefore to request your Lordship's interference in my favour, and even for promotion at this Court, that I venture to trouble your Lordship with this letter. I can pretend to no claim to your Lordship's intercession in my favour, beyond what may be allowed to real zeal and attention to the duties of my office, my abilities being such as rather to require your Lordship's indulgence than support ; but I can venture with truth to state to your Lordship that, during the six years I have had the honour to serve His Majesty in Tuscany, I have held a dangerous, expensive, and irksome post, and have maintained and supported the rights and dignities of His Majesty and the British subjects with zeal, perseverance, and unremitted attention.

"His Royal Highness the Grand Duke has often confessed that I have preserved his State for near three years by prudent and judicious conduct, and I have at various times had the repeated satisfaction to receive the honour of His Majesty's approbation through the obliging medium of your Lordship's despatches ; and your Lordship's indulgence has proved that my conduct has had the good fortune to be countenanced by your Lordship.

"His Majesty's subjects composing the factory of Leghorn have on all occasions demonstrated their fullest approbation of my services, and have favoured me with the highest marks of their gratitude and esteem.

"Your Lordship knows that I have at all times been solicitous to obtain intelligence, and have sometimes, I flatter myself, been so fortunate as to have been useful to His Majesty's service. I have acted with firmness and strict obedience to His Majesty's commands, and to the duties of my office upon all occasions, particularly during the two different periods of the invasion of this country by the French, epochs which necessarily involved me in danger and considerable expense. In the latter case your Lordship knows that, in strict conformity to my duty, I was made a prisoner and sent to a distant country, from whence I returned at the earliest intelligence of the insurrection of the Tuscan people, much instigated in its commencement by myself, and afterwards stimulated by the active part my zeal for the cause induced me to take with the army of Arezzo ; in which I not only had a principal share and influence, but, being favoured by the confidence of the Tuscan senate, the Aretin deputation, and the army, I contributed by the exertions of my mind and body to expel the French from the Tuscan territory, and was the first to enter Florence, escorted by only a few dragoons, to deliver the prince and the people from the tyranny of the French yoke.

"I will venture to assert to your Lordship that every rank of Tuscans from the prince to the peasant acknowledged my services and confessed themselves grateful and indebted to me. The plan of the Austrians, confessed to me by their generals, was not to have entered Tuscany by two or three months so early as they did, had not the rapid progress of the Aretins insured them a complete success ; and their progress would certainly have been much less rapid, had I not taken the part which I conceived it my duty to my king and to mankind to embrace. But this was also undertaken with expense and danger, and I beg leave to represent to your Lordship that, as the youngest brother of my family, I have a very small income, incumbered with debts unavoidably accumulating, and have a numerous family of children to support, which, with my present means, is nearly impossible.

"Were I to state my losses and expenses of journeys, voyages, ruin, and plunder occasioned by the arrival of the enemy in Tuscany, my return to my mission and re-establishment here, I should do myself an injustice were I rate them at less than near three thousand pounds, and I am now in a state of real want of resources.

"This city, though certainly less expensive than many other Courts, and particularly Naples (where no person but of a considerable private fortune can well sustain the character of His Majesty's minister), is infinitely more expensive in every point of view than it was in the time of my predecessors, or even at the commencement of my mission; and I do not exaggerate when I state from demonstrated proofs that the necessary articles of life are more than double since Lord Hervey's ministry at this Court; yet my predecessors, even in time of peace and inactivity, enjoyed the honour of the title of His Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary with the salary annexed to it, infinitely greater than that which I now receive after six years hard service.

"I am aware that the present proposition of the Court of Vienna for Mr. Jackson's and my recall may be considered as an obstacle to my request, even should there exist no other; but, if your Lordship should kindly agree to espouse my request, and render me your valid assistance, that obstacle may be got over by various ways; by a temporary residence near the Grand Duke's person, by occasional absence from the capital, or any other means by which I may still have the honour of giving your Lordship intelligence in Italy, and by which the cunning intent of the Baron de Thugut may be done away. Your Lordship must be possessed of more than usual indulgence to pardon this letter, and the boldness of this request, but I flatter myself that I shall at once receive your Lordship's pardon and support. Your Lordship has too much goodness to refuse entering into the circumstances of my case, and it is in that presumption that I dare to recur to your Lordship's generosity to entreat some indemnification for my losses; and, above all, as the primary object of my ambition and happiness, to beg your Lordship to recommend me to His Majesty's gracious favour to obtain the same rank at this Court with which my predecessors were honoured.

"When I first entered into this line of profession, I looked up to your Lordship as my patron and protector, and with the view of meriting your Lordship's future favour I have unremittingly studied to deserve your countenance and esteem.

"I am apprized of the sentiments of my own family, and how anxiously they look up to your Lordship to confer this favour upon me; confident in this and in the tried friendship of my brother Lord Egremont, I have likewise entreated him to join his request to mine that your Lordship will be pleased to advance me here, and I fully rely in your Lordship's kindness and my brother's friendly intercessions to obtain from His Majesty my additional rank at another Court. The expenses attending the journey and removal of effects, the dress and luxuries of other Courts would involve me in new dilemmas, yet, as my whole dependence is on

His Majesty's bounty and your Lordship's protection, and my whole ambition is to serve my King in this capacity, I supplicate your Lordship to interest His Majesty for the post of Naples in my favour, whenever it may become vacant, unless it should be possible to continue me at this Court with the additional rank enjoyed by my predecessors, which is of all other favours that which I covet and desire.

"Besides, without vanity, I may venture to say that the esteem I have acquired at this Court and with the Tuscan people, my knowledge of the laws, the customs, and politics enables me to be of more service here than I could elsewhere, and perhaps more so than many other persons (even of much superior abilities) who might succeed me.

"The salary which the other Ministers at the higher Courts enjoy, though infinitely greater than mine, bear no proportion with the small salary and expenses attached to my mission, for the difference of expenses, for example, between Vienna and Florence are by no means so considerable as the disparity of the amount of the salary, since Florence attempts to copy and rival Vienna in luxury and mode of living, and is a place of passage, both going and coming, for innumerable English and other travellers of distinction, whom the Minister resident from custom is obliged to receive and to treat.

"I therefore entreat your Lordship to recommend me to His Majesty's bounty for promotion in my mission to the Grand Duke in preference to any other Court whatsoever; but, should that be impossible, which I hope and trust will not be the case, I would then request your Lordship's goodness to allow me to succeed Sir William Hamilton whenever the mission to the Court of Naples may become vacant, it being the nearest to this residence, and somewhat similar in point of climate, which is necessary for me on account of repeated complaints on my breast and lungs, which would render it dangerous in the extreme for me to inhabit a cold climate.

"Mr. Jackson, having lately been appointed to the Court of Turin, even whilst the Court is not there, and Mr. Drake and others having enjoyed their rank and salary when absent from the seat of their mission, makes me hope and flatter myself that the Grand Duke's temporary absence will not be considered as an obstacle to my appointment should your Lordship be otherwise inclined to comply with my petition; particularly as every act here is transacted in His Royal Highness's name, His Royal Highness's arms and colours are on all the fortresses and public edifices, His Royal Highness's government continues in his name, his commands are received weekly by the senate, and his seal is affixed to every act throughout the Grand Duchy.

"The sovereign consequently is always present on the throne of Tuscany. I could act, if it met with your Lordship's approbation, as Mr. Jackson has done recently, by paying my respects to His Royal Highness in Germany, and return here for the winter to procure information of all public events, and on account of my health, since my health on account of my breast in winter time would not permit me to reside in a cold country ; and I am now sure that a residence in a northern climate, and even in England, would very soon terminate with my existence.

"I will not trouble your Lordship any further, nor occupy your time on my account except most fervently to entreat your Lordship's pardon and kind acquiescence in my request, and to believe that I shall never be ungrateful of your Lordship's protection and support."

AFFAIRS OF THE NETHERLANDS AND FRANCE—REPORT BY [MM.
D'YVOY AND DE LA PALUE].

1799, November 15. Emeric.—"Bientôt le sol Hollandais va être entièrement évacué des Anglais ; on assure qu'il ne reste pas à embarquer 2,000 hommes de cette nation, et que le reste consiste en Russes. Les forces maritimes Anglaises ne diminuent pas sur les côtes de Flandres et celles de Hollande. Les dernières nouvelles du Brabant disent qu'on a eu des inquiétudes pour Ostende, où on a aperçu à différentes reprises un nombre considérable de vaisseaux, dont plusieurs sont même entrés assez avant la rade. Le Général Tilli en a été averti par un courier, et s'est rendu à toute diligence à Ostende. On est persuadé maintenant que les efforts des Anglais se dirigeront contre la France, et qu'ils sont résolus de secourir efficacement les insurgés de l'intérieur ; au moins c'est l'opinion des Français qui sont en Hollande ; ils sont persuadés que la moitié de leurs troupes va rentrer dans l'intérieur, et qu'ils n'iront pas sur le Rhin, ainsi qu'on l'avoit annoncé.

"On ne sait comment expliquer le motif de l'ordre envoyé, il y a huit jours, au commandant du Nimégue, celui d'inonder les approches de cette place ; on a repris aussi les ouvrages du Greve, et on va les prolonger jusqu'au Wahl ; on ne conçoit pas le motif de cette précaution qu'on n'avoit point employée dans le moment le plus critique, et qui paraît dans ce moment-ci entièrement inutile ; il est difficile d'appliquer les variantes de la politique.

"L'espoir d'une neutralité pour la Hollande commence à s'évanouir ; on se raccroche à de prétendus articles secrets de la capitulation entre le Duc d'York et Brune. Des personnes sensées assurent qu'il en existe, et qu'ils compensent les avantages que les Anglais ont paru céder. Je sais qu'un membre du Directoire Batave s'est plaint que dans un traité qui regardait spécialement la République Batave, on lui eut fait un mystère de certains arrangements. Nous savons que plusieurs membres des Conseils avoient préparé des discours sur ce sujet, et qu'on leur a fortement imposé silence. Il existe donc, d'après cela, quelque clause particulière entre le général Français et le général Anglais.

"On parle du prochain départ des troupes que nous avons ici et environs. On dit que la ligne de démarcation va s'étendre dans le pays de Berg jusqu'à la Vupere, et que le régiment qui est ici ira occuper Erbfefeld. Il est certain que les troupes ne peuvent demeurer où elles sont, elles ont déjà un grand nombre de malades ; le Général Staden doit en avoir rendu compte au Duc, et les officiers s'attendent à une dislocation prochaine.

“ Si on en croyait tout ce qui se dit et s’écrit, les Chouans seraient dans un nombre effrayant, et leurs progrès très rapides. On prétend qu’un de ces matins on apprendra qu’ils sont maîtres de quelque place maritime importante. Lorsqu’ils ont entré à St. Brieux, on a cru que de là ils marcheraient à St. Malo : leur système de guerre est maintenant regulier, et il régné parmi eux la plus grande discipline. Ils ont la confiance des pays qu’ils occupent ou qu’ils traversent. Si on pouvait ajouter foi à ce que m’a dit un prêtre arrivé des environs d’Angers, et même réparti pour y rétourner, tous les membres sont liés par un serment religieux, et les plus utiles ne sont pas ceux qui sont sous les armes. Ils sont répandus partout, et dans tous les états. Ceux-là ne se connaissent pas, et se surveillent mutuellement sans le savoir. Ce même prêtre m’a assuré que dans l’affaire du Mans, ils avaient des leurs [leurres] parmi les troupes républicaines. ‘ Si nous avions de l’argent’, me disait cet homme, ‘ nous aurions pour nous la moitié de ceux qu’on enverra pour nous combattre. Il me tarde que les réponses que nous attendons arrivent pour avoir des renseignements certains sur tous ces objets, et sur bien d’autres qui doivent être importants. Si on répond affirmativement, alors j’entrerais dans les détails qui nécessiteront mon déplacement. D’ici là, ce n’est pas la peine de s’en occuper ; en attendant ma tête travaille sur les moyens de tirer parti de la circonstance. Si une fois j’ai le pied bien fixé dans l’étrier, on peut compter sur mon zèle et mes soins.’ Je ferai gagner l’argent de mon homme ; cet article est le sine qua non ; il demande, et cela est juste, qu’on tienne exactement les conditions du traité, et promet de tenir fidèlement ce qu’il a promis.”

THE MARQUIS OF BUCKINGHAM TO LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 17. Stowe.—“ I have not lost any time in considering the first papers transmitted by you to me ; and I will fairly own that I do not yet see my way to my satisfaction through the principle by which you are to applot the compensation to the several holders of borough interest ; for, in point of fact, a committee meaning to act equitably on this subject would be much embarrassed ; and as the buyers are to negotiate or to arrange with some of those who are the most hostile, I see less daylight in the possibility of settling any general rule ; and many of the difficulties that disgusted me at last with my own ideas apply almost as strongly to this ; and I fear that, as the last defeat arose from the too great sacrifice of county-interest, this plan may suffer from pressing too heavily on the boroughs. I agree fully with you that you cannot avow and abide by the principle of paying to borough holders as in contra-distinction to electors ; but I do not see how you can satisfy the holders by giving the compensation to the electors. I likewise agree most fully that the very semblance of these two Houses should be so destroyed that you should alter the clause that assembles the Lords for elections in the House of Lords, and of the Commons for their ballot in the House of Commons ; and you should assemble the Lords in the Court of Chancery, and Commons in the Court of Exchequer, and make some of the executive officers of those courts the returning officers; and I am sure you will agree with me that the Lord Lieutenant should be instructed to convert the present buildings into some more useful office or to some better purpose than the present, as soon as may be; which cannot be the case if you order by law that they shall meet in the present House of Lords for the next or all future elections. I wish however to think over these points more fully, for I am not satisfied with any ideas that I have yet collected. I have sent you some observations on your first resolutions; those which have occurred to me on the 1st and 2nd appear material, particularly the 2nd if you are not as sure as you ought to be of carrying the question triumphantly in the course of the next three months. You have not sent me any thing on the subject of the Catholics. You know that they are your sheet anchor (in this project) with the lower ranks of people, and that every care must be taken to knit them both now and for the future with Government. Their ecclesiastical situations should be now arranged, as well as their schools and seminaries, which ought to be carefully attended to; and I trust that these arrangements will be so far an article, or part of the union, that they may assist in carrying it through, and in upholding it after it is completed. I know the importance of this matter, and am therefore anxious to see the proposed resolution and article respecting it.

“Another very serious difficulty still hangs upon my mind respecting the appeal to the House of Lords. I fear that the expense and distance of such a tribunal would be a very serious inconvenience, even if the accumulation of so much legal business was indifferent. Might you not make the words so general as to admit of a committee, named from our House of Lords, of Seigneurs Trieurs, to whom the appeal might be referred upon petition of either party, if the House should approve; and I should see no objection to the same thing for Edinburgh, though there would be probably fewer resident peers there than in Dublin, where the Chancellor and chiefs would always be resident in term time. My father’s bill would likewise be wholly defeated by sending the electors of the county of Galway to a Committee of the House of Commons in London; and I protest that this appears the most difficult of all the doubtful points.”

AFFAIRS OF THE NETHERLANDS AND FRANCE—REPORT BY [MM. D’YVOY AND DE LA PALUE].

1799, November 17. Emeric.—“Les Français n’envoyent pas leurs troupes d’Hollande sur le Rhin, ainsi qu’on l’avait dit. 5 à 6,000 hommes sont déjà rentrés dans le Brabant, et vont, dit-on, marcher dans l’intérieur pour être employés contre les Chouans. On mandait hiér, mais comme un bruit, dans une lettre d’Amsterdam, que cette ville ne serait plus désormais gardée que par des Français, et qu’un corps Batave marcherait en France: on ajoutait qu’on craignait qu’on ne prit des conscrits Bataves pour les incorporer dans les troupes Françaises. Toutes les conditions que ceux-ci exigéront, seront désormais implicitement remplies. On ne doute pas qu’incessamment le ministre Français soit chargé de donner au

Directoire Batave le mémoire des indemnités pour la campagne, et on sait que ces marchands de liberté tiennent leur denrée un peu haute.

“Tous les rapports confirment qu'on a dessein d'établir un modérantisme mêlé de surveillance, qu'on n'en voudra plus aux opinions, mais aux actions. Il est clair que ce nouveau système de conduite est dirigé contre les Jacobins, qu'on veut réprimer, sans cependant les anéantir. On espère par là diminuer le nombre des mécontents, et les accoutumer à l'ordre actuel de choses. Ils ont beau faire; ceux qui veulent avoir part au gâteau trameront sourdement, jusqu'à ce qu'un nouveau 18 Fructidor vienne leur donner des places à remplir.

“Toute la sollicitude Directoriale se tourne en France du côté des Chouans, et on se prépare à leur faire une guerre régulière; on cache avec soin leurs progrès et les avantages qu'ils ont déjà remportés sur des troupes républicaines. On assure qu'ils attirent à eux de vieux soldats par l'appas de l'argent. On parle de 400 hommes qui ont passé de leur côté avec armes et bagages: on dit que cette désertion jette de la confusion parmi ceux qu'on leur oppose, et qu'on redoute de nouvelles trahisons, très difficiles à empêcher et à découvrir dans un genre de guerre où il n'y a point d'ensemble, et où il faut combattre par petits corps. Tout ce que je viens d'écrire m'est transmis par la voie de la Belgique, où il paraît déjà des signes de chouannerie, et qui se manifesteront encore d'avantage, si les Français n'y envoient pas troupes; on assure que le nombre de ce qui y existe actuellement n'excède pas 6,000 hommes.

“Si tous de l'expédition d'Holland, les 15 mille hommes que le Duc d'York disait avoir de trop, parcequ'il ne pouvait les employer, si on les ait jettés sur les côtes de la Belgique, on eut soulevé dans un instant tous les peuples de ces départemens. Il est inutile de revenir sur le passé; il nous reste à souhaiter que l'expérience du passé serve pour l'avenir. On a vu les Français obligés, pour parer au danger, dégarnir des postes importants; si on en eut été instruit comme on pouvait l'être, on eut pu en profiter.

“Il n'y a rien de nouveau dans la situation de ce qui nous entoure; on parle toujours, mais vaguement, de changements.

“Je resterai à mon poste, jusqu'à ce que les réponses soient arrivées, et qu'on m'ait donné mes instructions; il faut me rendre utile; sans quoi, c'est du temps, de l'argent, et de la peine perdus.”

COUNT PANIN to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 17. St. Petersburg.—“J'ai reçu exactement la lettre que Votre Excellence m'a fait l'honneur de m'écrire le 8 October dernier. Les sentimens dont j'ai toujours fait profession pour vous, par la haute opinion que j'ai conçue de la manière éclairée dont vous dirigez le département qui vous est confié, ont dû me faire ajouter beaucoup de prix à cette marque obligeante de votre attention. J'ai cherché à témoigner à monsieur votre frère, pendant notre commun séjour à Berlin, combien j'étoit pénétré du désir d'acquérir quelques droits à votre confiance. Les qualités respectables de ce ministre lui avoient acquis toute la mienne, et je ne voyois dans l'union de nos vues et de nos principes qu'un résultat naturel d'un de mes vœux les plus chers, celui de consolider l'alliance et l'heureuse harmonie de nos Cours respectives. Je ne mérite donc point toutes les choses obligéantes que Votre Excellence daigne m'adresser à ce sujet.

“Je désirerois beaucoup de pouvoir, dans le nouveau poste que j'occupe, donner à ces sentimens et à ces principes toute l'étendue dont ils sont susceptibles, et que mes moyens pussent répondre à mon zèle. En attendant je vous prie d'être bien assuré que je me ferai toujours un devoir de justifier votre confiance, et de ne pas me juger en qualité d'homme public sans avoir approfondi les causes. Tout ce qui pourra me venir de sa part aura toujours les droits les plus fondés à mon empressement.”

FRENCH AFFAIRS.

Secret Report from Paris.

1799, November 17. [Paris.]—“Le lendemain que j'ai reçu votre lettre, j'ai été de bonne heure chez la personne qu'elle indiquait ; je lui ai remis le billet qui était pour elle, et je lui ai montré la lettre que j'avais pour son amie de la rue St. Dominique, que j'ai deviné de suite. Elle a lu sa lettre, a désirée voir la mienne, et en me la rendant elle m'a promis de faire son possible pour que je puisse remettre l'autre moi-même. Pendant quatre jours, j'ai été tous les matins la voir pour en presser le moment ; mais je n'ai pu être admis qu'aujourd'hui. J'ai été introduit par un domestique qu'on m'avait prescrit de demander : après avoir attendu une heure et demie, j'ai été conduit dans une chambre où j'ai trouvé la personne que votre lettre m'avait fait deviner (et chez laquelle votre amie m'avait prévenu que j'allais) en me nommant le domestique auquel je devais m'adresser. J'ai, suivant votre expresse recommandation, employé toute mon attention à bien retenir tout ce qu'on m'a dit, à bien examiner son visage pour lire dans son coeur.

“ ‘Vous avez ’ m'a t'elle dit (en fronçant un peu le sourcil) ‘une lettre d'une personne de mon pays à me remettre ’ (elle m'examinait avec attention).

pensé que peut-être elle désirerait la voir : elle examina d'abord le cachet avec beaucoup d'attention, elle en fit la lecture assez vite, puis elle examina les cachets des deux lettres qui étaient très semblables, et bien marqués, sur le pain à cacheter le c en était très distinct, et entouré de points très profonds ; elle tint les deux lettres à la main quelque tems regardant son feu en réfléchissant. Tournant la tête vers moi, elle me dit ; 'Je serais bien aise de rendre service à la personne qui vous a écrit, mais il faut qu'elle vienne promptement ; je suis étonnée qu'elle ait perdue son activité, elle devrait être ici au lieu de sa lettre : elle devrait savoir que ses affaires ne peuvent se traiter que par elle ; mandez lui de suite qu'elle ne m'écrive plus, et ne cherchez plus à me remettre de lettre de son part.' Sans me donner le tems de répondre elle ajouta, 'vous n'avez pas besoin de votre lettre, je vais la bruler ;' et de suite, elle a jetée au feu les deux lettres, et sans cesser de les regarder bruler, elle a ajouté, 'vous l'avez sans doute vue à son passage il y a quelques mois, c'est-elle bien changée ?' Je lui dis que vous aviez fait plusieurs voyages en Amérique, que vous aviez essuié beaucoup de fatigues, mais qu'ayant conservée votre gaité, vous jouissiez d'une bonne santé, et que vous étiez moins changée que je ne l'avais imaginé. 'C'est ce qu'on m'a dit ; j'en suis charmée, mandez-lui, le plutôt possible, que je serai bien aise de l'aider dans son projet, qu'elle vienne promptement, avec les pouvoirs de ses associés. Surtout recommandez lui la plus grande prudence ; qu'elle aura des frais nécessaires à faire ; mais qu'il y a beaucoup de grains dans ce pays, et que sa spéculation est très bonne ; écrivez dès ce matin.' Alors elle m'a salué légèrement, et je me suis retiré par la porte par laquelle j'étais entré ; j'ai retrouvé le même domestique qui m'a conduit jusqu'à l'escalier.

"Je rentre dans le moment chez moi ; je ne vous parlerai pas de toute l'inquiétude que cette visite me cause ; je me bornerai à répondre, suivant ce que vous me prescrivez, aux questions de votre lettre, n'entrant dans aucuns détails sur tout ce qui est arrivé ici depuis peu de tems.

"D'abord la personne que j'ai vue est très changée. J'ai trouvé son air naturellement mélancolique augmenté ; je crois qu'elle met beaucoup plus de blanc qu'autrefois, ses dents sont plus mauvaises, elle parle aussi plus lentement, sans doute pour moins ouvrir la bouche ; elle a toujours beaucoup de grâces et son même air de bonté ; elle doit m'avoir reconnu, car elle m'a beaucoup examiné, mais elle ne m'a pas parlé de ses enfans quoiqu'elle ait vu dans votre lettre que vous désiriez que je vous en donnasse des nouvelles. Je lui aurai fait part de votre désir si elle n'avait pas lue ma lettre : mais ne m'en parlant pas elle-même, j'ai craint de lui faire de la peine par mes questions ; elle est très réservée ; elle n'a pas, ni moy, prononcé une seule fois votre nom : c'est encore une très belle et aimable femme. Je ne crois pas qu'elle soit heureuse : mais je crois qu'elle prend encore à vous beaucoup d'intérêt ; je pense que vous pouvez compter sur son amitié pour le succès de vos spéculations. Elle doit être satisfaite de la réserve que j'ai mis dans ma conduite pendant ma visite.

"A présent, mon bon ami, permettez—moy de vous dire que je suis tourmenté par les plus vives inquiétudes, car s'il faut que vous veniez vous-même suivre vos affaires ici, telles avantageuses qu'elles puissent être à votre fortune, vous devez y renoncer. Les événements arrivés nouvellement ici ne vous présentent pas plus de sûreté qu'auparavant : et malgré les puissantes protections que vous pourriez avoir, vous y courriez de très grands périls. Au nom de Dieu, ne renouvellez pas les mortelles inquiétudes que vous nous avez causées. Je dois d'ailleurs vous observer qu'une affaire sur les grains n'est plus aussi avantageuse, car beaucoup de négociants étrangers, même de chez vous, ont obtenu la permission que vous sollicitez ; il y a beaucoup de blés et d'autres grains achetés pour être exportés, et que les prix en sont déjà considérablement augmentés ; ajoutez qu'il faut beaucoup dépenser en présents.

“ Si la personne qui promet de vous aider vous tient parole, vous pouvez certainement faire de bonnes affaires, mais un de vos associés, un commis entendu, peut les faire de même. Je lui donnerai de bon cœur tous les conseils et les soins que mon âge et mon connaissance des affaires de ce pays pourront me dicter pour vos intérêts.” Copy.

COUNT STARHEMBERG to LORD GRENVILLE.

[1799, November 18.] Twickenham.—“ J'ai l'honneur de vous joindre ici un mémoire et les pièces justificatives, le tout très peu intéressant, mais qui m'ont été envoyés d'Italie pour vous les remettre. De grâce, permettez à votre ami de vous prier d'éclairer son ignorance sur des objets qui doivent l'intéresser. Je ne sais plus rien au fond de ma tanière, où je pleurs non pas mes péchés mais ceux d'autrui. J'ignore ce qui se passe dans le monde.

“ Est-il vrai que Buonaparte, Moreau, et Siéyès gouvernent la France, et qu'ils parlent de paix ? Vous m'avez promis de me mander aussi si vous receviez des nouvelles qui vous satisfaisoient ou déplaisoient au sujet de notre calomnie en Suisse ? Savez vous l'objet de l'envoi du Prince Esterhazy en Suisse ? Pardon, pardon de toutes ces questions, mais vous êtes trop juste pour ne pas comprendre ma curiosité. Je ne vous demande pas de secret d'ailleurs. Je sais que, vu les circonstances, ce n'est pas le moment d'en exiger, mais n'oubliez jamais, je vous supplie, que quelques soient les torts des autres, mon caractère personnel ne variera point, et que le pauvre petit représentant de la malheureuse Autriche sera toujours aussi bon Anglais, et surtout Grenvilliste de cœur et d'ame, que ceux qui peuvent l'être par devoir, indépendamment de leur sentiment.”

COUNT WORONZOW to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 19. Harley Street.—“ Il m'est arrivé un maudit courrier avec des dépêches qui me mettent au désespoir.

“ On n'agit chez nous que par passion et violence. Avec les intentions les plus pures, et les plus généreuses, on n'a pas le moindre brin de la prudence la plus ordinaire. Vous verez par les pièces que je vous communique la manière brusque et imprudente avec laquelle on a rompu chez nous avec la cour de Vienne, et la résolution qu'on a prit de rappeler l'armée Russe qui est en Suisse ; sans considérer qu'on n'étoit pas le maître d'en disposer, et que cette armée vous appartient, et sans considérer qu'on invite la cour de Vienne par nos incartades à faire sa paix avec la France. On ne sauroit assez se presser d'envoyer d'ici un courier pour faire des représentations très fortes, et un autre à Mr. Wickham pour l'engager à faire son possible de retarder la marche rétrograde du Maréchal ; car il se pouroit bien que la cour de Vienne pourait être intimidé, et chercher à apaiser l'Empereur, ce qui remettrait les choses dans leurs assiete naturelle, et on pouroit alors faire un plan plus fix pour les opérations futures. Je n'ai pas eu le tems de metre au net les traductions du Russes que mon fils a fait, ni de faire copier les copies des lettres de l'Empereur au Roi et à l'Empereur d'Allemagne, c'est pourquoi je vous supplie de me les renvoyer demain. Quand serez vous en ville, et quand pourai-je vous voir pour concerter ce qu'il y a écrire à Petersbourg ? Je ne doute pas que vous ne soyez persuadé qu'il n'y a pas de tems à perdre pour réparer tout ce qu'on gâte chez nous."

PAUL I., EMPEROR OF RUSSIA, to COUNT WORONZOW.

1799, October 15. Gatchina.—“ Vous verrez par les copies incluses du rescript au Maréchal, Prince Italique, et des lettres à l'Empereur des Romains et au Roi de la Grande Brétagne, que la conduite de la Cour de Vienne m'a forcé d'en venir à la fin à une tupture avec elle. Son obstination à ne pas s'ouvrir sur ses intentions pour ce qui regarde le rétablissement du gouvernement monarchique en France, l'avidité de faire des acquisitions prouvé déjà par le fait, mes troupes en Suisse sacrifiées par l'envie et la méchanceté, tout cela m'a fait voir que sans le secours et la coopération sincère de la Cour de Vienne, mes forces et celles de l'Angleterre ne sont pas suffisantes pour arriver au but qui a uni ces trois puissances, et que tous nos efforts ne serviront qu'à l'avantage de la cour de Vienne ; et, sans avoir exterminé le gouvernement Français, ils serviront à établir une autre puissance tout aussi dangereuse pour le bien public.

“ Quoique mes intentions et mon plan proposés au Roi d'Angleterre sont déclarés dans la lettre que je lui écris, cependant, pour vous diriger dans vos conférences et dans les affaires que vous aurez avec le ministère Anglais, je vous informerai de mes intentions plus en détail. Ma situation envers le Roi de Prusse est telle que, malgré le désir que j'ai de me lier de plus près avec lui, je ne veux pas risquer de recevoir quelque réponse désagréable ; ainsi vous direz à Lord Grenville que la retour de son frère à Berlin peut être très utile dans la situation actuelle des choses, et peut accélérer le succès désiré, en dirigeant sa conduite de manière que ne demandant aucunement au commencement des démarches actives du Roi de Prusse, et à mesure du consentement du Roi de Prusse aux propositions du M. Grenville, ou de quelque autre plénipotentiaire Anglais, de lui découvrir tout notre plan contre la Cour de Vienne, le faire entrer dans les mêmes vues pour mettre des obstacles à la Cour de Vienne, et l'empêcher d'exécuter son intention de s'emparer du Piémont, de Gènes, et des trois Légations, au lieu de rendre ces pays à ceux à qui ils appartiennent de droit. Si le Roi de Prusse consentira à ce plan, je suis prêt à lui écrire une lettre pour s'appeller au secours de l'empire Germanique, et pour délivrer l'Italie des l'avidité de l'ambition sans bornes de la maison d'Autriche. On peut faire sentir au Roi de Prusse que dans un tel cas, ni moi ni le Roi d'Angleterre nous ne l'empêcherons pas de faire quelques acquisitions sur le Rhin, en lui laissant à lui-même le choix des moyens. Notre plus grande attention doit être sur la maison d'Autriche, et tous nos efforts pour faire une alliance avec le Roi de Prusse, lequel, joint à la Russie, à l'Angleterre, à la Porte Ottomane, à la Suède, et au Danemarck, fera une très grande force dans le nord, capable de donner la loi à toute l'Europe. J'ai envoyé ordre au conseiller d'état actuel Baron von Krüdener, rappelé de Copenhague, de rester à Berlin, et d'avoir de là une correspondance avec mon ministère, sans prendre sur lui aucune capacité officielle.

La Cour de Vienne, sentant l'impossibilité de résister à la France sans mon secours, conclura certainement une paix qu'elle a déjà entamée, pour qu'en finissant la guerre, elle puisse s'assurer la possession des pays conquis. Il reste à savoir à présent jusqu'à quel point la France consentira aux propositions de paix faites par l'Autriche ; surtout quand elle sera informée de la rupture qui a eu lieu entre moi et l'Empereur des Romains, et de l'ordre donné à mes troupes de revenir en Russie.

Cependant comme, malgré les moyens, les forces, et la résolution du gouvernement Anglais de continuer la guerre contre la France, on ne peut pas combattre éternellement, si la position interne de la France ou l'inclination du ministère Anglais tend vers la paix entre la France et l'Angleterre, vous saurez que cela me sera indifférent, et je préférerois même de voir l'Angleterre en paix avec la France plutôt que la Cour de Vienne, si les conditions de paix étoient les suivantes.

“ 1. De joindre les Pays—Bas à la Hollande, et d'établir le Stat-houder sur les dix-sept provinces.

“ 2. De borner la France à ses anciennes limites.

“ 3. D'établir le statum quo ante bellum en Italie, et,

“ 4. La même chose dans l'Empire Germanique.

“ 5. De laisser au Roi de Prusse quelques acquisitions sur le Rhin.

“ 6. De laisser à l'Angleterre ses conquêtes aux deux Indes.

“ Ma propre position envers la France est telle qu'après avoir été dans le courant de cette guerre une puissance auxiliaire contre elle, en quittant l'alliance je rentre dans ma situation antérieure, et je n'ai pas besoin de traiter directement avec elle. Je serai le dernier en Europe à la reconnoître pour République, et je ne le ferai qu'après que l'Angleterre l'aura fait. Vous connoissez les ordres que j'avois donné en 1797 au Comte Panin, et pourquoi ses négociations avec Caliard ont été rompues.

“ Le changement que j'occasionally dans le système politique en rompant l'alliance avec la Cour de Vienne est d'une telle espèce qu'il ne faudra pas perdre du tems à s'arranger avec Berlin. J'espère donc que vous emploierez tous vos efforts pour que le ministère Anglais entre le plus-tôt possible dans ces vues.

“ Depuis le tems que la Cour de Vienne a refusé d’aller en avant contre l’ennemi commun, et qu’elle s’empare de tout pour elle-même, j’ai comencé à perdre l’espérance d’arriver à mon but, ayant pour règle que les intentions intéressées ne peuvent s’accorder avec des affaires honnêtes et justes, Je suis persuadé maintenant de l’hypocrisie de la Cour de Vienne, et j’aurois honte de rester plus longtems son allié. J’attends les succès des bonnes dispositions du ministère Anglais, et de votre zèle pour mon service, qui est aidé par l’estime que vous vous êtes justement attirée dans le pays dans lequel vous remplissez depuis si longtems et si honorablement la place importante qui vous a été confiée.” Copy.

HENRY DUNDAS to LORD GRENVILLE.

1799, November 19. Wimbledon.—“ I have this morning received the enclosed, and consider it is a question too delicate to be decided upon without mature consideration. If this Russian is delivered up to their General, there can be no doubt that he will be punished with the utmost severity, but that creates the very difficulty. In the case of subjects of any country committing crimes in their own country, it is a matter of discretion in the country to which they may fly for refuge whether they will deliver them up on a requisition made to them for that purpose. But here the crime committed is against the civil law of this country, and if you listen to the requisition which is made, you deliver the culprit to be punished in a manner unknown to the laws of the country. Let me know what Mr. Pitt and you feel upon it. I have desired Mr. Huskisson to call upon Count Woronzow, and to state to him that I had difficulties upon the subject, but that I would send an answer without much delay.”
